under the present law. If a district remains under the rural sanitary authority the incidence of taxation is very different from what it would be if it were to form itself into a local government district; and it really amounts to a mere accident under which of these authorities your taxes happen to be levied. Clearly, one or other of these systems of levying taxes must be unjust. I will give you another instance. I had a letter from the principal landowner in a parish containing two large villages. The rateable value of the parish is £34,000. The rural sanitary authority propose to adopt a drainage scheme for one of these villages and its neighbourhood, which would involve a rate of 1s. in the pound on the whole rateable value of the entire parish. My friend owns property at the other end of the parish, with the other village built upon it. He is divided from the district which it is proposed to drain by two miles, a river, two valleys, and consequently two water sheds, and could not by any possibility derive benefit, present or future, from the proposal. Yet his property will be subject to 1s. in the pound, or £120 a-year additional rates, for improvements from which neither he nor his tenants can derive any benefit whatever. Without the facilities for borrowing from the Public Loans Commissioners, works of this kind would not be attempted. In giving them the means of executing such works at the charge of future generations, we are bound to take some security that the proceeds of the loans are put under the charge of authorities more efficient than our present ones, and that the taxation to repay them should be more equitably levied than it now is. Such anomalies are constantly occurring, and will increase rapidly with the spread of the call for sanitary improvement. They began with the towns; they are now extending to the suburban and country districts; and I assert, and should at the right time be prepared to show, that such injustice is absolutely unnecessary, and that in applying a remedy to it we should remove some of the greatest difficulties in the way of obtaining suitable areas and suitable authorities for local government. This is not an occasion to go into detail in these matters, but I would again urge that the Government should appoint a Royal Commission to assist them in their investigations. A great deal of thought has been bestowed upon this subject during the last five or six years, and such a Commission would find at its disposal an immense amount of practical and useful suggestions. Having devoted for many years very close attention to the subject, I do not hesitate to say that there is not a difficulty attaching to the improvements required which cannot be met by simply using the results of our own experience. Every difficulty which affects the country generally has in one form or another been met by experiments in local Acts or otherwise, the results of which we have only to see, and in no case shall we be obliged to resort to any untried theories or experiments. This being the case, I conceived that this Government, possessing as it does among its supporters an unusual number of men trained in the work of local government, are utterly inexcusable if they delay any longer systematically to consider and undertake the reform of our local administration and taxation. In all my experience of and investigations into the subject, I have seen no reason to despair of local self-government in England. On the contrary, I feel strongly that it is the very vital source of the manhood and vigour of our individual and national life; and I think it will be a disgrace to our statesmen, and a discredit to the practical common sense of Englishmen, if we allow it to remain any longer in its present state of confusion, inefficiency, and waste.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, an unduly large proportion of the charge involved in the payment of the interest and capital of the loans which are raised by local authorities falls upon the occupiers, as distinguished from the owners, of land, houses, and other rateable property,"—
(Mr. Fawcett),

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, it was impossible to deny there was a great deal of truth in the remark of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) as to the incidence of the rates gradually accumulating on the occupiers throughout the country. He feared, however, that the only remedy for the state of things which the hon. Member had described was to be found in the good feeling of the owners of property. If they were not willing to come to the relief of those who held property under them, he did not see how the Legislature could interfere in the matter. The present Bill promoted and instigated still further the local expenditure of the country, and permitted the Government to raise money for the purpose of making loans for that object. Before they stimulated local expenditure, and prepared to raise money which would have to be repaid, they ought carefully to adjust the means by which that money was to be collected. That, however, had not been done. They had not taken the preliminary step of ascertaining their measure of value for the purpose of rating property for local taxation. This, he thought, was creditable neither to the House nor to the country. He had a very serious grievance to complain of in reference to the progress of a Bill which he introduced early in the present Session for the purpose of relieving, not only his own constituents, but the inhabitants of the metropolis generally, from a burden imposed on them in the matter of Imperial taxation. Under the imposition of the house tax the whole country was liable to be taxed upon the annual value of houses; but by the Metropolis Valuation Act that annual value was converted into gross rental, and this change made a difference of 20 per cent to his constituents and imposed a tax in addition to the house duty wrongfully upon £5,000,000, the sum by which the gross value of the house property of the metropolis exceeded the net or rateable value. This was the result of the persistent encroachment of fiscal rapacity. With regard to the Bill itself, he thought the large funds which the Government held in hand in the shape of savings-bank deposits might very properly be employed in making these loans. He thought it would be a very advantageous arrangement, and he was not aware that there was any constitutional impediment to it. He did not wish to prevent the Bill going into Committee, but he hoped some consideration would be given to the points to which he had drawn attention.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not wish to retard the public business, and therefore he should be very brief in his remarks. At the same time, it must be remembered that this was a somewhat important and quite a new occasion when they had placed before them in a very interesting manner the general state of local finance in the country by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. The Government, therefore, might fairly expect them to ask any questions with regard to the progress of local taxation which were suggested by their Local Taxation Budget. With regard to the Resolution moved by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), he would say the subject was a most important one, which thoroughly deserved the attention of the House. He had done great service in ventilating it; but, at the same time, he (Mr. Goschen) trusted that he would not divide the House upon the present occasion, because no action could be taken upon it at present. He would remind the House that a Committee had examined into the matter in 1870, and that the majority reported in favour of a certain proportion of rates being placed on the owners as well as on the occupiers. This was not, therefore, a new idea of the hon. Member for Hackney; it had the sanction of a Parliamentary Committee; and though there was some difference of opinion on that Committee, and though certain resolutions were carried by a majority of one, there was among the minority a considerable adhesion of opinion that a certain proportion of rates should be placed on the owner as well as on the occupier. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he spoke would not, even at that period of the Session, encourage the idea that it was absolutely impossible to deal with the question. The question well deserved the consideration of the Government. It was difficult to know how to get at the owner, but there was the precedent of the Income Tax. It was against the law for an owner to contract himself out of it, and the occupier was at liberty to deduct the tax from the owner. It was said that this was a question which did not excite much attention in the country districts. The reason why the farmers did not feel much interest in a division of the rates between landlord and tenant was, that they were afraid that its consequence would be a disturbance and re-arrangement of rents throughout the country. In a large part of the country the farms were not rack-rented, and the farmers feared that if the rates were divided between landlords and tenants there would be a general re-adjustment of the rents. It was said that in the end the rates were really paid by the owner. That was, no doubt, true as a general principle; but where there had been a large increase of the rates the increase chiefly fell on the occupier, who, as a rule, was not in a position to propose a change in the terms of his agreement with his landlord. And now, adverting to the interesting statement of the President of the Local Government Board, which showed in a graphic manner the progress of expenditure and of rating in different parts both of town and country, and the increase or decrease which had taken place, he would venture to call attention to the remarkable fact stated by the right hon. Gentleman, that the unremunerative rates had at length begun to decrease, while remunerative rates were increasing. He recommended that fact to the attention of the Local Taxation Committee, which sat in London, and boasted that they had prevented the passing of 16 Bills which would add to the burdens of the ratepayers. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer last night intended to give a reply to a question which he put to him when he said that the relief now given was "the crowning point." He ventured again to appeal to him, so that there might be no misunderstanding, and to ask if he was able frankly to state to the House that the programme of relief sketched and drawn for him by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) had been at length carried out. There were circumstances in the future over which he had no control, and it would be wrong to press him unduly on this point; but he should be glad to know whether they might understand by this expression, "the crowning point," that they had now arrived at the time when those who had insisted with great pertinacity on relief being given from local burdens were fairly satisfied that the Government had redeemed their promise to the ratepayers, and that from this time forward they would stand on clear ground in that respect. He understood that they repudiated the idea that the last boon was, in fact, to be considered as a small instalment for the agricultural interest. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be explicit on this point. The President of the Local Government Board gave the rates at 2s. 9d. in the pound in agricultural portions of the country, and he now put them at 2s. 6d., which he considered was not unduly high. The President of the Local Government Board was speaking as the authoritative organ of the Government when he expressed that view, and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would concur in the view he had stated.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY, referring to the difficulty which had arisen as to the construction of the Act of 1875, expressed a hope that the opportunity would be taken of inserting a clause in this Bill which would extend the discretion of the Public Works Loan Commissioners—if such was the intention of the Legislature—to restrict the term for which loans were granted. The term of 50 years was considered too long, and 30 years, which was the usual period for which loans were granted in Scotland, would be preferable. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consider this point.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER would first of all pay a tribute of thanks to the hon. Gentleman and the other Commissioners for the assistance they gave in undertaking this work. Representations had been made to the Treasury by the Public Works Loan Commissioners within the last few days on this very point; but, after taking the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, he saw there was some difficulty, and it might be advisable to take the opportunity afforded by this Bill of carrying out the object to which he had referred. What he proposed to do was to commit the Bill pro forma, to meet the points which his hon. Friend had suggested. He would say generally that, in introducing the Bill, what the Government desired was, as far as possible, to divest the Treasury of the inconvenient control and power of granting relaxations which it possessed under the old system. The Government thought that there were questions as to the manner in which the Public Works Loan Commissioners had exercised their duty which ought to be discussed in Parliament, for they believed it would be most desirable that Parliament should be cognisant of the manner in which the Commissioners exercised the discretion given to them in apportioning the loans under special Acts, the administration of which was entrusted to them. This was the principal point of detail in connection with the Bill, which would be open to consideration when it got into Committee. Her Majesty's Government had reason to feel gratified generally at the manner in which the House had appreciated their endeavours, and at the reception which the clear and succinct statement of his right hon. Friend had been received. He hoped, however, that the House would not yield to the temptations to discuss all the questions of local finance and taxation, running as they did into the question of local administration. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had raised a question very pertinent to the subject of the Bill, but which, if discussed fully, would lead into a very wide field. He would abstain from following the hon. Member and those who succeeded him into the question of the incidence of rates upon the owner and occupier; but he would say in answer to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen), when he asked him to abstain from committing the Government as to any division of rates between owner and occupier, that he was not only making a very moderate request, but one which had been answered by anticipation, because on more than one occasion the present Government had passed measures in which the principle of allowing the tenant to deduct a portion of the rates from the rent was recognized, as in the case of the rating of woods and mines. In the Highways Bill, now on the Table, the same principle had been carried out, and they would be always ready to act on that principle whenever it was applicable. Now, some distinction should be made between sums raised by way of loan for the public service and for what might be called public improvements, which might be distinguished as remunerative and unremunerative. The right hon. Gentleman had called attention to the fact that it appeared from the statement of his right hon. Friend that the burdens of the country in respect of unremunerative expenditure had, in fact, retrograded, and he took occasion to express a hope that we had come to an end of the systems of subventions and assistance to local taxation. But the House should bear in mind that if the rates were falling it was due in a great measure to the fact that we had given subventions. The policy to which Her Majesty's Government were pledged had borne very substantial fruit. The right hon. Gentleman would not expect him to make pledges or to embarrass the Government with respect to a future policy. In any adjustment of taxation they must consider local finance as an important point of the question. But he was ready to accept the view which the right hon. Gentleman asked him to accept—namely, that what had been done since Her Majesty's Government acceded to office had been in the nature of a redemption of the pledge which they recognized when they came into office. They had been told last night that they had developed these things by degrees; but they announced from the beginning certain points, though they developed them only by degrees. He wished it to be clearly understood that in this matter they were entering into no pledges for the future. He considered it the duty of the Government in the question of local taxation to pay due attention to the subject of local administration. Whatever they had done with regard to subventions would be most incomplete, and in some respects perhaps productive of mischief, if Her Majesty's Government considered that the whole task before them. They did not pledge themselves to bring forward any great measure of local administration; but they would be anxious, wherever they could do it, to introduce improvements, such as they had indicated on many occasions, for the improvement of local administration, and, therefore, for the relief of burdens, not so much by giving relief from the Imperial Exchequer as by rendering the burdens more lightly to be borne. As he had said already, some loans were applied for the purpose of promoting the public service, some for improvements; and with regard to these there were different considerations to be borne in mind. They must not throw upon the owners of property, for the benefit of the country at large, burdens they would have no share in regulating. Suppose they threw upon a county the burden of building lunatic asylums, they would not do that for the benefit of the owners of the county; nor, in general, had owners a voice in determining that such expenditure should be incurred. Then there were a great many other improvements which were forced upon the owners of property. His right hon. Friend had pointed out that a great proportion of the debt was cast on owners by special Acts of Parliament not promoted by them, but rather by the occupiers. What they ought to look at was that if they adjusted the burdens unjustly they threw a great impediment in the way of getting the work properly done. It did not always follow that the owner was a rich man; they had often to deal with poor owners, and that had been found one great difficulty in effecting improvements of great importance. In a pamphlet published some years ago by Mr. Edwin Chadwick, that gentleman stated that in many cases the cost of the improvements amounted to more than the whole rental of the property. Where money was raised by borrowing there was a natural solution. The money raised was charged on the occupier and was to be repaid by him in a certain time, which had reference to the probable duration of the improvement. If the occupier's tenure were equal to the duration of the improvement he enjoyed the benefit of it and paid back the loan, but if his tenure were less the charge remained on the land, and the incoming occupier would have to pay it, and of course arranged his rent accordingly, so that the matter was self-acting if the time for repayment were properly arranged. There was great danger in making the repayment fall within too short a time, for then it would fall too heavily on the occupier, while on the other hand if the time were made too short burdens might be thrown on the proprietor without his consent, and from which he would never derive any benefit. Of course, the balance of the Savings Bank Fund would be made available for the loans; but he could not say to what extent the Commissioners would be prepared to supply a certain proportion of the money. The question of the Valuation Bill and of the House Tax lay outside the immediate field of this measure. They had a Bill before the House on that subject, and he hoped it would be proceeded with if the House assisted the Government to economize time, but they were in a difficult position with regard to getting through everything that appeared upon the Order Book. They proposed to reprint the Public Works Loan Bill with Amendments, and he hoped the House would now allow them to proceed, so that they might get the money necessary for the advances.

MR. CHILDERS complimented the President of the Local Government Board on the admirable manner in which he had brought the subject before the House. The statistics stated by his right hon. Friend would dispel many illusions. One of these was that the burden of local taxation amounted to £26,500,000 a-year, whereas it was only £22,000,000. Another illusion dispelled was the exaggerated notion of the effect of the Government measures for the relief of local taxation. The charge, as far as the rural districts were concerned, had been reduced from 2s. 9d. in the pound to something between 2s. 6d. and 2s. 9d., or about 1½d. in the pound, whilst in the towns the rates had increased by 2d. or 3d. in the pound, and on the other side there had been an addition of 1d. to the Income Tax. Although he took exception to some of the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and hoped they would not in future years be taken as a rule to guide them, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had rendered good service in qualifying the rather summary refusal with which the President of the Local Government Board met the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney. That Motion touched a question of great interest, and, instead of going into it, the President of the Local Government Board snuffed it out with the remark that in towns it was impossible to get at the owner. He held it was perfectly possible to get at the owner and distribute the charge between the persons interested in house property. It was a problem which was by no means difficult to solve, and it must be solved if they wished to settle the question. They had also to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for another statement he had made, because for some time they had been drifting they knew not where in regard to the relief of local taxation from Imperial funds. In his Budget speech in 1874 there was no allusion to prisons, and when an addition was made to the points then enumerated they were justified in suspecting that further claims would be made. The right hon. Gentleman had now said, however, that the pledges of the Government in this matter had been redeemed, so that they knew that if further proposals should be made in the same direction in future they would be entirely new, and not in fulfilment of the promises made two years ago. He was of opinion that the pledges of the Government had been more than sufficiently redeemed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had now put the matter on an intelligible footing, and if for no other reason they ought to be very well satisfied with the course of the present debate. He trusted the example which the President of the Local Government Board had set on this occasion in the construction of his new Budget speech would be followed in future years.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he only wished to make one remark with regard to that which had fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to a boon which the people of Scotland thought they had a right to, in order to put them on an equality with other people. He understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that probably the public loans to Scotland would be at 4 per cent, and not 3½ per cent. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider this question. In Scotland the price of money was lower than anywhere else. The Scotch were a prudent people, and could get money cheaper than it was to be obtained by most. There were very few cases where the local bodies could not borrow at 4 per cent on their own credit, and it would be a great disappointment to them if the Government loans they thought themselves entitled to were not given at 3½ per cent. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer was influenced by something that was said by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), with whom he had sat on the Public Works Loan Commission. He (Sir George Campbell) took a different view with regard to the evidence given before the Commission with regard to loans at 3½ per cent to that of the hon. Member. The hon. Member had said that these loans were a loss to the public Exchequer; but he (Sir George Campbell) took a different view of the result of the evidence. It was true it was brought out in evidence that, taking into account what had occurred with regard to some old Irish loans, which no one expected would be repaid, and some others, there had been a loss to the Exchequer; but, on the other hand, he thought it was distinctly brought out that modern loans, such as they would give to the prudent people of Scotland, was not likely to prove a loss if given at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, for this reason, that the Government was able to borrow at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and when they lent the money so borrowed at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent there was a certain margin to cover any possible loss. Therefore, he contended, the kind of loan he referred to was not likely to result in a loss to the Exchequer, and they should be given to the people of Scotland at the rate they expected. He was aware that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney, and some others, did not desire that loans should be given from the public Exchequer for local purposes; but, on the other hand, he believed that the control which was obtained over the expenditure was beneficial. He hoped the people of Scotland would not be disappointed in their fair anticipation in respect of this matter.

MR. BIGGAR thought the same rate of interest ought to be charged for all loans raised for public purposes.

Amendment, by leave withdrawn.

MR. FAWCETT said, as Parliament was to be made responsible for the loans he hoped the Bill would specify the purposes for which the loans were to be granted and the rate of interest which they were to bear.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied that it was impossible to specify these matters in the Bill. The Public Works Loan Commissioners would exercise their discretion in making advances; but instead of the Treasury having power to make reductions in the rate of interest, as at present, that power would by the Bill be transferred to Parliament.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL.

[Lords]—[BILL 111.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

SIR HENRY JAMES wished to observe that the present condition of our judicial administration was very unsatisfactory. It was clear that we did not at present possess suitable machinery for the speedy administration of justice, and therefore it was necessary that those who had practical knowledge of the subject should lend their aid in improving the system. An opportunity for doing this was afforded by the introduction of the present Bill, and he felt certain the Government would carefully consider any suggestion which might be made. Under this Bill a serious question arose as to the constitution of the Intermediate Court of Appeal. For his own part, he should have preferred one Court instead of two Courts of Appeal, but the House had already given its decision on that point, and therefore it would be useless for him to argue it. In his opinion, the Intermediate Court of Appeal had proved to be very inefficient, although the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had argued that that Court had satisfactorily discharged its duties. The inefficiency of the Court was due first to the want of numerical strength; and, secondly, to the want of personal direction. There was no member of this tribunal, with the exception, perhaps, of Lord Justice Mellish, who had been a practising member of the Common Law Bar, and, therefore, the authority of the Court was the less respected when they overruled Common Law judgments. Under the 14th section of the present Bill provision was made to strengthen that Court by adding two permanent and fixed Judges, who, however, were not to be appointed until the death or resignation of certain members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The appointment of the new Judges ought not, in his opinion, to be deferred until that contingency occurred. He had consulted with many of his learned friends, and he believed that his views would meet with considerable, if not entire, concurrence from the legal Members of the House. The remedy he ventured to propose might at first sight appear to be of a somewhat dangerous description. He thought that permanent and fixed Judges should sit in the Court of Appeal, as great inconvenience arose from a Judge sitting as a Primary Judge one day and as an Appellate Judge the next. An Appellate Judge ought to be an Appellate Judge for all purposes. He suggested that two members of the Bench in the Common Law Division of the Supreme Court of Justice should be taken from the Primary Court and transferred to the Appellate Court as permanent and fixed Judges. It would be necessary for Her Majesty's Judges to apply themselves to this work, not according to old precedents, but according to the necessities of the time. It would never do to allow our Courts of Nisi Prius to be less than six in number, but many cases which were now argued before three Judges sitting in banco might well be disposed of by one. This would secure a great saving of time and economy of judicial power, and it could not be said that this was a new principle, for it had always been adopted in the Chancery Courts. By this arrangement they might have two Divisions of the Appellate Court always sitting. He would also allow one Judge to take special cases on the Crown Paper. Three Judges might be allotted for sitting at Chambers and at the Central Criminal Court. By this means they would have sufficient numerical strength on the judicial bench and justice would be better administered than at present. He had reason to believe that the suggestions he had made pointed in the direction of a great reform. It might not be beneficial to the Bar, and it might find but little favour with the Bench; but it would meet with the approval of the suitors who were asking, and asking in vain, for justice. He hoped the Government would not shrink from dealing with the subject in the manner it deserved.

MR. FORSYTH moved the adjournment of the debate, the subject raised by the hon. and learned Member being one of great importance, on which several Gentlemen intended speaking.

Sir Henry James

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Forsyth.)

SIR GEORGE BOWYER seconded the Motion.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked that the debate might be fixed to be resumed before the Members of the House who were members of the Bar went on Circuit.

MR. DISRAELI said, the debate would be resumed at a Morning Sitting on Friday.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Friday, at Two of the clock.

BISHOPRIC OF TRURO BILL—[BILL 185.]
(Mr. Assheton Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Assheton Cross.)

MR. DILLWYN, who had an Amendment on the Paper that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, that the object of this Bill could only be to turn the voluntary donations that had been given for the establishment of this Bishopric into a State endowment, and to create a high State official to be able to sit in Convocation, to possess certain legal powers, to hold a certain social position, and in his turn to have a seat in the House of Lords. He was not a Nonconformist; but he represented a large body of Nonconformists, and their objection to the Established Church was that they sincerely believed it interfered with and retarded the spiritual development of the country and the cordial co-operation of one class with another in society. In that House it retarded and prevented the passing of measures that would otherwise be conducive to the welfare of the community, and but for the religious difficulty the education of the country would be in a better condition than it was at present.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate was adjourned this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOP ACTS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. TENNANT rose to call attention to the Report of the Commission upon "the working of the Factory and Workshop Acts;" and to move—

"That, in any measure for the consolidation and amendment of the Factory and Workshop Acts, it is desirable, in the interests alike of employers and employed, that all trades and manufactures employing the same class of labour should be placed upon the same footing and under the same protective and restrictive provisions."

The hon. Gentleman said, he was aware that in calling attention to this question he was introducing a dry and uninteresting subject. It was important, however, affecting as it did the manufacturing interests of this country.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at five minutes after Nine o'clock.

(Mr. O'Shaughnessy, Mr. O'Reilly, Mr. Bruen, Mr. Redmond.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the object of the measure was to limit the age up to which Boards of Guardians in Ireland might board out of the workhouse orphan and deserted children who should come under their care. The law up to the present time had been regulated by two statutes—the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 83, and the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 25. The 9th section of the first of the statutes enabled Boards of Guardians to board out such children with persons of the religion in which they were registered, until they had attained the age of 5 years, or, under special circumstances, 8 years. The 32 & 33 Vict. c. 25 repealed this section and extended the limit of age to 10 years. The Bill, of which he now moved the second reading, proposed to extend the age to 13 years. In England the limit was 16 years; and he had been much urged by authorities in England to adopt that age for Ireland. He admitted the advantage of uniformity of the law in this respect, and had he followed his own views he should probably have adopted that limit. But none of those in Ireland who had most experience—the Boards of Guardians to whose discretion the carrying out the law was left, had asked for an extension to 16 years, and he had thought it preferable that their views should be carried out. If in future it was necessary to advance beyond the age of 13, it would be open to any one to introduce a Bill. At present the age of 13 would satisfy the Boards of Guardians who had expressed their wishes on this subject. The object of the Bill was that children who would come under its operation might be gradually absorbed into the population, and not subjected to the stigma of pauperism throughout their lives. The policy of absorption could not be carried out so long as the age was kept as it was now, at 10; for it was a subject of complaint that in too many cases the children when they had attained the age of 10 were sent back by the peasants who had nursed them to the Union, and thus there was the risk of their becoming permanent paupers. Unless, therefore, these children were absorbed into the population by being boarded out longer than they could be at present, he was afraid they must look forward to seeing the street corners and the public-houses crowded with them, grown up into men and women, a burden both to themselves and to the parish. He was disposed to say but little as to the general utility of the boarding out system, since he thought that at the present day it was pretty well acknowledged. The children formed family ties, learned to make themselves useful in whatever occupation the peasant with whom they lived pursued, and became accustomed to the ways of the population amongst whom they ought to spend their lives. The experience of rearing children in the workhouses in Ireland was not a pleasant one. The contamination of the minds of boys and girls was terrible to think of, and this state of things existed in spite of all the care and classification they could exercise and devise. The only remedy in Ireland was boarding out. In England the difficulty was met by district schools set apart for the education and training of these children, though the feeling was that these schools had not been so successful as the boarding out system. In Ireland these children had to be sent to the workhouse school. The peasantry to whose care these children would be committed were sober and moral people who had the respect of their ministers of religion and of the landlord, and he held it would be to the interest of the persons who had charge of the children to educate them properly, feed them, and not overwork them. The system had been a great success in Scotland, and in parts of England the boarding out system had been used with great success. No doubt in connection with the system, so far as it was carried in Ireland, there had been abuses, but he did not wish to go into them—they could be guarded against, and if the Local Government Board desired further powers he should be very willing to grant them. But what he really relied on most was this—The English Local Government Board, in dealing with this question, had, he believed, made it a sine quâ non that wherever this system was introduced, there a committee of ladies should be organized, with visiting powers, for the purpose of seeing after those children. He looked forward with great pleasure to the time when ladies in the districts of Ireland where this system was in force would interest themselves about these poor children, as they could not fail to exercise a beneficial influence both over the children themselves and the peasants in whose house they were. There was no religious difficulty likely to arise in this case, because the Act provided that the children must be in the houses of peasants of the same religion as themselves; and if this local visitation of ladies should be carried out it might create a spirit of unity, concord, and kindness between the different classes, to which, unfortunately, in some cases they had been more or less strangers in Ireland. With regard to the question of mortality, the statistics showed that the mortality amongst children between the ages of 2 and 15 in the workhouses was three times the average mortality amongst those out of it. And as regarded the cost of boarding out children it was very much less than that of keeping them in the workhouse. Sir Charles Trevelyan had stated that in Ireland the average cost of boarding out was £7 6s., and of maintenance in the workhouse £13. The Bill had received a large measure of support in Ireland from Protestants even more strongly than from Roman Catholics. Magistrates, clergymen, men of letters, and Guardians had all written to him in support of the Bill—there had been no Petitions against it, while 20 Boards of Guardians had petitioned in favour of it. While such was the feeling of all classes in Ireland he trusted the House would find no difficulty in reading the Bill the second time. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading.

MR. BRUEN, in seconding the Motion, said, he would not detain the House by travelling again over the arguments urged in the very able statement of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick; but he wished to take that opportunity of stating how gratifying it was for Members on his side of the House to support hon. Members on the other side on such measures as this, which had for their object the social improvement of part of the population of Ireland. He would be glad if he could more frequently join his hon. Friends opposite in passing Bills of this sort, and he could assure them it was conscientious motives alone which prevented them from co-operating more frequently in the measures they proposed. This Bill for the improvement of the social, and moral, and physical condition of orphan and deserted children seemed to him to be one that could not be opposed on its merits. It could not be denied that the State, standing in loco parentis towards children of this class, ought to fulfil, as far as possible, the duties of parents with tenderness and an anxiety that they should be well cared for. This result could only be attained by placing these children in the homes of the peasantry where their morals and health would be looked after. He could give a valuable illustration of the success of the system. In Ireland there had been for many years in operation a voluntary system for the care of orphans—he alluded to the Protestant Orphan Society. In every county in Ireland there was a Protestant orphan society, and in a great many counties, many years ago, institutions similar to industrial schools were built at great expense, in which these Protestant orphans were domiciled and taught trades. What happened? It was found from experience that the family ties and relations were so much more suitable for and conducive to the welfare of the children that these institutions were given up at great loss, and the children were now universally boarded out in the homes of the peasantry. In the county which he had the honour to represent the success that had attended this change had been most marked. He should have been pleased to have seen the limit of age extended beyond 13, but perhaps it was better in this matter they should advance by tentative steps.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK entertained a strong opinion that before long the age would be extended to 16 years. That was the age now adopted in England, in Scotland, and in America; and therefore they ought not to be guided by the local feelings of the Boards of Guardians so much as by the concurrent experience of those who had given most consideration to the question in these countries. He would remind the House that although there were many excellent reasons for continuing the system until the children attained the age of 16, the Act would not be compulsory; every case would depend on its own circumstances; all that was proposed was to give the Guardians power in proper cases to secure for the children a home until they were in a condition to support themselves. The age of 13 years was a dangerous one for sending children back to the workhouse, especially in the case of females, while if they could remain with the peasants for two or three years more they would be able to become independent by earning their own bread.

MR. SHARMAN CRAWFORD said, that although he was connected with one of the unions which had not adopted the system of boarding out, yet he had never been opposed to that system. But in his union the number of children in the workhouse was very small, and therefore it was differently situated in that respect from other unions in Ireland. Nor did he find that in their workhouses there was that mortality amongst the children which was said to occur in other places. This might be due to the fact of the large accommodation and airing grounds which were provided. As far as the principle of the Bill was concerned he gave his concurrence to it. He thought the age might well be extended to 13 years; but he saw no objection to 16 years.

MR. WHITWELL bore witness to the very satisfactory manner in which the boarding-out system had worked in his county (Westmoreland). Children had been brought down to the country in an unhealthy state, and they had greatly improved both physically and morally. Respectable families would not take girls from workhouses as domestic servants, but they would take boarded-out children without hesitation.

MR. WHEELHOUSE added his testimony to that which had gone before from both sides of the House, and strongly maintained the necessity for the adoption of this measure. For himself he wished the limit of age might be, if it were found reasonably possible, extended to 16, because he believed that the moment the feeling of workhouse life was broken off, and directly the child was made independent of workhouse ideas, he was placed on the lowest rung of the ladder of social life, and was in a fair way of becoming, at least, a respectable member of society.

MR. A. PEEL said, he would hail with great satisfaction any extension to Ireland of a system which had worked so well in England and Scotland. From his experience when he was Secretary of the Poor Law Board he could testify to the enormous benefit conferred by the boarding-out system upon the child population of the workhouses. Ophthalmia and other contagious diseases which characterized the children in those days disappeared, and the workhouse taint was removed. But in extending the system in the way proposed he would caution the authors of the Bill that the whole value of the system lay in the regulations that would be imposed to prevent the danger of the children being farmed out. In the early days of the system in England there was great danger lest some scandals should arise in its administration and cause a reaction and an alienation of the public mind from a good plan. No foster parent should be allowed to receive beyond a certain number of children, and organized supervision should secure that the regulations were carried out. He was opposed to the extension of out-door relief, but he did not regard this as out-door relief in the ordinary acceptation of the term. His belief was, that the boarding-out system would do more to prevent permanent pauperism than any other method which could be adopted.

MR. ARCHDALL briefly supported the Bill. The system had been carried out with good results in his county (Fermanagh).

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING considered the supervision of the children sent out a most important point. He regretted that the existing powers of the Poor Law had not been more generally acted upon. In his own union not more than two or three children within a long period had been sent out: the Guardians had taken the precaution to obtain from the relieving officer a report upon the state of the children, but they found that more supervision was required. He was not satisfied that the sending out of the children was an advantage to them in the way of education, for the system of education in the workhouses of Ireland was as admirable as could be devised, and the Reports of the Inspectors gave great praise to the Guardians and the teachers. He hoped the Government would not pledge themselves to extend the age of 16. At present numbers of children were taken out at the ages of 13, 14, and 15 for various purposes who earned 5s. and 6s. a-week. If they were to be paid for up to 16 the ratepayers would soon become dissatisfied. Therefore, he thought it was wise on the part of his hon. and learned Friend not to go beyond 13 years.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he thought the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, in moving the second reading, had taken very proper ground in pointing out the difference between the principle on which his Bill was based and that contained in the Act 25 & 26 Vict. The 9th section of that Act contemplated the improvement of the provision for infants and very young children that would be effected by their being intrusted to the care of foster parents, instead of being brought up in the workhouse. That statute limited to the age of five years the discretion which the Guardians could exercise as to boarding out, and it was only with the consent of the Poor Law Commissioners that the system could be extended up to the age of eight. But by the Act of 1869 the discretionary power vested in the Guardians was extended—without any opposition, so far as he could learn—to children up to the age of 10. That change was made with the same object and on the same principle as the Bill before the House—namely, not only with a view that the children should be more healthily brought up, and that the mortality among them might be reduced, but also that they might afterwards remain in the homes of their foster-parents and never return to the workhouses. This was the principle which the hon. and learned Member sought to affirm and extend by the present Bill, and, so far as the principle of the measure was concerned, he was prepared to assent to it on behalf of the Government. The question, however, as had been pointed out by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. Peel) and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) was not without its difficulties. The system of boarding out was an excellent one if conducted in accordance with proper regulations and under proper supervision;

but it was also liable to dangerous abuses—dangers to the child, to the ratepayers, and to the Poor Law system. In the first place, it was necessary to guard against the dangers that might arise to the children themselves. The hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel) referred to what had been done in England. At the time the hon. Gentleman was Secretary to the Poor Law Board this question occupied a considerable amount of public attention in England, and in 1870 the Poor Law Board accepted the principle of boarding out pauper children, subject to most careful regulation. The Board issued an Order containing such regulations, providing that in all cases where the Guardians of Unions adopted the system a boarding-out Committee should be appointed to supervise its execution, and that such Committee should consist of persons not deriving any pecuniary or personal benefit from the boarding out of the children. The regulations provided what children should be boarded out, before what age the Guardians should not be allowed to commence boarding out, a limit in the number of children to be boarded at any one house, an undertaking to be signed by the foster parent for the proper care and nurture of the children, and also providing for that important element, the education of the child, referred to by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing); providing also that no more than 4s. a-week should be paid to a foster parent for a child, that no child should be boarded out more than a mile and-a-half from a school, nor more than five miles from the residence of a member of the committee; and that he should be visited not less frequently than once in six weeks by a member of the boarding-out Committee. The regulations for the government of the Committee were minute and excellent, and the principle of the present Bill having been accepted, it would be necessary to guard its application in Ireland by similar regulations—he did not say precisely identical—to be framed by the Irish Local Government Board; because otherwise not only would there be the danger of the children not being properly treated by those with whom they were placed, but there might be also a danger which was aggravated by the suggested limit of age from 13 to 16 years—namely, that the ratepayers by making a weekly payment to certain persons for the maintenance of children old enough to be able to work for themselves, would, in fact, be giving a bonus to the foster parents, and enabling them to procure the labour of children at a cheaper rate than others; and in the case of children of the age of 16 might amount to giving out-door relief to persons able to earn their own living. Therefore in assenting to the principle of the Bill, he must not be supposed as assenting to the idea that the age should be extended to 16. On first considering the matter he had some doubt whether the age of 12 would not be sufficient, for that appeared to be the limit of age contemplated by the regulations in England. He readily assented to the second reading of that Bill, but trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman would postpone the Committee for a few days so as to afford time for him to look carefully into the law on the subject, and suggest amendments in the Bill, enabling the Local Government Board to frame such regulations as were desirable.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had come down to the House, understanding that the Bill might be opposed, and he felt that there was a strong case in its favour. He was glad, therefore, to find that there was only one feeling upon it—which was not surprising after the full and able manner in which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had brought the matter forward. One advantage of the measure which had not been dwelt upon since the opening speech was that it was not only desirable that the children should be absorbed in the general population, and have the advantage of being brought up free from the stigma of pauperism, but also that the Guardians who were their natural protectors should not lose control over them at so early an age as 10. That was itself a strong argument in favour of the age of 13. He hoped the Bill would be read a second time, as it met a real evil. He would suggest, with a view to expedite the matter, that the hon. and learned Member who had charge of the Bill should communicate with the Chief Secretary, in order to insert in the Bill a clause relating to the drawing up of regulations by the Local Government Board of Ireland. He thought there was a good deal to be said in favour of the limit of 16; but if the Bill was to get through this Session it would be well for its authors to accept the age of 13 at once.

MR. O'REILLY said, that the authors of the Bill would be ready to insert a clause providing for the drawing up of regulations. In respect to the remark of the hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel) about allowing only a limited number of children to each parent, the Guardians of the Dublin Union never allowed more than two to be taken by one person. It would also be necessary to have a regulation absolutely requiring the attendance of such children at school, a certificate of such attendance being imperatively required in order to obtain payment for each child. Also it would be most advisable that there should be official visitors other than the relieving officer. The suggestion that the medical officer of the district should periodically visit and report upon the children was a most valuable one, and it would be well if volunteer inspecting committees of local ladies and gentlemen were formed under the Committees of the Boards of Guardians. On the subject of age he was glad that the Government had accepted 13, as he had a fear that 12 would be pressed. In the purely agricultural districts of Ireland he admitted that the children would be kept by the peasantry at the age of 12 without payment; but in that case the school attendance would be instantly stopped, and the child would be made to work every day in the year. On that ground, therefore, he thought it necessary to retain the age at 13. He wished to corroborate what was said by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) as to the advantage which had been experienced in Ireland from the visiting of the children by volunteer committees.

MR. O'SULLIVAN urged the importance of pushing on the Bill this Session. He could confirm all that had been said as to the excellence of the boarding-out system; and if the Bill was not passed speedily a great many children would have to return to the workhouse, whom the remaining out would greatly benefit.

Motion agreed to.

MEDICAL ACT AMENDMENT (FOREIGN UNIVERSITIES) BILL.—[BILL 36.]

(Mr. Cowper-Temple, Mr. Russell Gurney, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Foreyth.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, it was intended as an exceptional remedy for an exceptional grievance which had been inflicted upon a class of persons who were especially deserving of the consideration of the House. A few ladies aspiring to get beyond the narrow routine of employment hitherto appropriated to their sex, had studied medicine and surgery with the hope of alleviating suffering and healing diseases, and of earning their own livelihood by the exercise of an honourable profession, but their persevering endeavours had been baffled by the simple fact that they were women; and though they got an abundance of patients, they were pertinaciously refused admission to the register, which conferred the legal title to practise. The necessity for this Bill arose from the fact that the existing law, as it was administered, did not deal fairly or justly with both sexes, and that the opportunities given by the medical corporations to enter the Medical Profession were restricted to men and denied to women. This was not the intention of the Legislature. The Act of 1858 spoke generally of "persons," and did not make any exclusion of female persons as compared with males. As he had framed and introduced the Medical Act, he could assert with authority that to no one who was concerned in the passing of that Act did it occur that there would be any exclusion of women from its benefits. He need not, however, dwell upon that, because, under the terms and operation of the Act, women had reached the register. The law required that the Medical Council should superintend the registration of all persons of the proper qualification, and it allowed at the first registration that those who had degrees from foreign Universities, and who had been practising previously to the passing of the Act, should have the right of being registered. Upon the passing of that Act, a lady who had obtained a degree of Doctor of Medicine from a University in America was registered, and her name was still upon the register. Subsequently another lady who had passed the examination of the Apothecaries' Company were also placed on the register. But although the Statute permitted the registration of women, the conditions imposed by the Medical Corporations and by the Universities prevented them from being admitted to the register. Very soon after the Act was passed one lady proceeded to go through those studies which the Apothecaries' Society required previous to examination, and having made herself qualified, she applied for leave to be examined. The authorities were unwilling to admit her, but when they consulted their law officers they found that they had no power to refuse. Accordingly she was allowed to go before the examiners. She passed satisfactorily, and was now registered. But the authorities were so dissatisfied at finding that one of the other sex had taken advantage of their instruction and examination that they altered their rules so as to make it impossible for any woman to pass an examination again. They declared that henceforth anyone who had received an education, however good or complete, part of which had been given privately—as had been the case with the lady he had referred to—should not be allowed to be examined, thus taking the precaution that no woman should be admitted to the lectures which after that were necessary to make it competent for them to pass. Then the ladies who wished to enter the profession, finding the door of the Apothecaries' Society closed against them, tried to pass through the University of Edinburgh. There were in that University some gentlemen of liberal feeling, who hailed with satisfaction this desire on the part of the ladies to devote themselves to this useful Profession, and to obtain the advantages of University education. There were also in that University persons of less toleration, who looked with more prejudice upon the association of women with men in an honourable Profession. At the beginning, when the request of the five ladies was made, after some discussion, all the Governing Bodies of the University, including the Chancellor, agreed upon admitting them to be matriculated and to commence their studies. After they had gone through about half the course, their opponents created difficulties which prevented them from completing their course of instruction. These ladies having been matriculated in the full expectation that they would be allowed to go through their course, and being refused, they were forced to apply to the Court of Session to enforce their contract. There they obtained a decision in their favour. The matter was afterwards carried by appeal to a higher Court, and decided against them by a bare majority of Judges, those of the highest position and reputation being in the minority. If the University had been willing to receive female students for instruction and examination, it would have been easy for them to have obtained such a change in their charters as would have enabled them to receive women; the majority of medical men in the University, however, were adverse to them; and the doors of the Scotch University were shut against the admission of ladies. But the ladies were persevering, and the next attempt was to establish a hospital in London in which female patients were cured by female practitioners, and a school of medicine. These were still in operation, and so far as they went they had been successful. Patients and students were plentiful; but the prejudices of the Profession had prevented either the school of medicine or the hospital from fulfilling the requirements for registration, and from leading to admission to the Profession. The institutions were not recognized; therefore any instruction that was obtained in the wards of the hospital and in the school, however useful it might be, would not help them towards obtaining certificates. The ladies then discovered that by charter the College of Surgeons in London were bound to examine candidates in midwifery; and the Medical Act provided that single qualification was sufficient for registration. Three ladies who had been educated in Edinburgh applied for examination, and obtained the assent of the Governing Body of the College of Surgeons. At last the aspirations of these persevering and laborious women seemed to be realized, and the legal right to practise within their grasp, but their opponents were up to the critical occasion, and baffled both law and equity by carrying out the policy of trade unionism to the extreme of a strike. When the time of examination arrived, no examiners were to be found. The three medical examiners had resigned, and no one in the Profession would accept the office. This ingenious stroke of policy, so discreditable to the surgeons of England, had succeeded in withholding from these learned ladies their legal rights, and nothing but a mandamus from a Court of Law could give them redress. They had tried every available opening, and taken every chance. They had knocked at the doors of admission to the Profession, but found all of them closed against them, some of them slammed in their faces. They had suffered persecution, and there seemed to be no hopes of their obtaining what they wanted. This being the case, they had been obliged to look outside their own country. They had to look across the Channel to the Continent, and they found a very different treatment of female students. Although all these Bodies who represented the Medical Profession in England had determined in one way or another to prevent ladies from being educated in medicine or to prevent them from obtaining licences to practise, they found a more generous and tolerant feeling in other countries. In France they found that in the great University of Paris, which stood high among the Universities of the Continent, there was every willingness to enable women to study and take degrees. At this moment, out of about 20 lady students in the University of Paris, there were 12 who were English, Scotch, or Irishwomen. Several of the ladies who had been educated at that University had obtained degrees with honours, and had received permission to practice. In Germany effective provision was made for the higher education of women. The University of Vienna admitted students of both sexes. At the University of Leipsic there were many female students. In Switzerland the ladies found no difficulty in obtaining education and in passing examinations. At the University of Zurich there were 20 female students, and some were practising in England as doctors of medicine. In America the University of Michigan was open to women. Even Russia, the youngest country of Europe in regard to civilization, had got beyond England in one of the great marks of civilization, generous consideration for women. In St. Petersburg there was a large College for Russian women to study medicine. It originated in the demand of Asiatic subjects of the Czar to have female doctors sent to them, because it was not in accordance with the habits of Orientals that male doctors should prescribe for women by means of personal visits. They had now in England four doctors of medicine from foreign Universities who were practising in London and Bristol. It was not necessary in a debate of this sort to enter into physiological questions, as to whether women were or were not by nature fitted to practice medicine—whether or not they had a sufficient proportion of brain or were physically capable of study—there was the fact, they had succeeded in foreign Universities, had gained honours and diplomas, had been admitted to practice. Neither need they discuss whether female doctors could get patients or not, because they had the fact before them that they had patients. In the hospital in Marylebone Road, to which he had already called attention, there were as many patients as the female doctors there could prescribe for. At a dispensary in Bristol there were 14,000 attendances of women and children in a year, although they had to pay a fee for advice. The number of patients was on the increase, and so far as the experience of the dispensary went, it showed that a real want was supplied by the female practitioners, and that their services were much valued. It seemed to him to be a great hardship that whilst there were female doctors of medicine practising in this country—proved to be qualified and experienced—they should by the operation of the law be unable to exercise their functions legally. This state of things ought to be remedied, and the present Bill proposed this simple course—that where women could show by diploma they had received from foreign Universities that they were perfectly qualified to practise medicine, they should be allowed to do so. One great objection made to this was that if they admitted women with foreign degrees to practise, then they must admit men under the same conditions. Well, that argument might come fairly from the mouths of the advocates of female suffrage; but he could not see the justice or consistency of calling for equality when it was to inflict injury on women, and totally disregard it when it was to operate in their favour. When a woman desired to be allowed to study the Profession and to pass an examination it was said—"There is no equality at all between men and women, and women are not to have the advantages which are given to men by the corporations or Universities." He need hardly point out to the House the difficulties to which ladies were exposed who went to foreign countries to study, the residence in strange places, with foreign habits, away from their natural protectors, and seeking instruction delivered in foreign tongues. One argument offered against his Bill was that it would be wrong to allow the qualification given by the foreign Universities to have force in England, because the Medical Council, who were to be the judges of qualification, could not control or influence these Universities. That would be a valid objection, he thought, if the Bill said that degrees of all Universities were to be held valid by the Medical Council; but in the measure he had only selected a small number of Universities of such acknowledged reputation that no one in the Medical Council or anywhere else could object to a degree they might confer as not being equally good with any degree from a University in the United Kingdom. But if it could be supposed possible that a slur or doubt should be thrown on the University of Paris or Vienna, Berne or Zurich, or there was reason to think their teaching or examination was not efficient or properly conducted, it would be easy to leave them out of the Schedules. But it was a mere abstract objection. The argument which really prevailed in the minds of those who opposed the Bill was the fear of the competition which would be introduced if females were admitted into the Profession. But he thought the fear on that point was exaggerated. The number of medical practitioners was diminishing; and if women were admitted, a larger number of persons would seek medical advice than at present. There were a great number of women—especially young women—who did not have medical advice at present from feelings of delicacy, because they would not go to men for advice. Then there was a large field of work open to women in India. That country would furnish employment for more women than were likely to pass any examination under existing laws. There were probably 50,000,000 of Native women in India, Mahomedan and Hindoo, who would never allow a man to enter their apartment to prescribe for any ailment. The Indian Government had so strongly felt the importance of this matter that an attempt had been made in Madras and elsewhere to bring up a body of Native young women to the Medical Profession. They were trying to get female Professors to assist in teaching at schools of medicine. It would be a moral as well as medical advantage to Her Majesty's subjects in India that the Bill should be passed, for it would assist the Government in civilizing, enlightening, and Christianizing the Native women to have a large body of medical women, trained in England, to go forth to India and undertake that great work. If the opportunity they desired was given them, numbers of women would avail themselves of it. He proposed the Bill as a simple mode of meeting an obvious difficulty, and also of justice towards those who were practising without being enrolled. At present they were under a disadvantage. Any certificates they might give were not legal, and they were not acknowledged by medical practitioners—the ladies who practised were classed in the eye of the law as quacks, and those who had shown such intelligence by their study were classed, so far as the law was concerned, with the most ignorant impostors who had no knowledge or skill, except in the way of practising upon the credulity of simple-minded persons. He had not forgotten the Parliamentary Paper which was laid upon the Table of the House last year, in which the Medical Council dealt with this subject. That Council, which was composed of the representatives of the different branches of the Profession, had taken a wider view of the matter than the bulk of the medical men themselves. They said—"We cannot deny the justice and propriety of admitting women on the register if they are qualified." The Council seemed very adverse to interfering in any way with the existing examination or with licensing bodies; and assuming that it was possible to admit ladies without such interference, they turned their attention to the mode in which the difficulty could be got over. They proposed that there should be a place where he, for one, hoped and trusted she would ever remain. It was not consonant with English ideas, and all we value most in domestic life, that women should go to the bedsides of all sorts of people as physicians and surgeons. It was not any question of professional jealousy, nor could his objection arise from any fear of competition. The fear that really did exist was on behalf of the welfare of the general community, and he trusted that the House would not listen to, or sanction, any such innovation as the one now proposed, and he would conclude by moving the rejection of the Bill.

DR. WARD, in seconding the Amendment, said, that those who opposed the admission of women to the Medical Profession were accused of doing so either from professional jealousy, or from sentimental motives. But he thought that the House would not cast a stigma on a great Profession, and on the leading men of that Profession who formed the qualifying Board, by holding them actuated by the mere selfish policy of a trades union. Then those who opposed it were accused of a sentimental objection. He had been engaged for some time in teaching that branch of medicine where this objection would be strongest—anatomy—and he had witnessed young ladies in the pursuit of that study. He must state, from what he saw, his original objection to submit young girls to this ordeal was greatly strengthened. Even young men were subject to a severe moral trial; and he thought if hon. Members really knew the state of things they would be very slow to subject young girls to such an ordeal. There was a difficulty which rendered the allowing of qualifying Boards to confer diplomas—a very serious objection. It was acknowledged by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that the whole system of medical qualification and registration was at present in a very unsatisfactory condition. It was well known that the possession of a diploma and a registration was no real guarantee of capacity. As the House was well aware there were at present 19 qualifying Bodies in this country, competing with one another for the granting of degrees and diplomas. All these Bodies were entitled to have their qualifications registered, and thus got the Government stamp upon them. Unfortunately several of these Bodies depended largely on the moneys they received for the passing of candidates. Hence had arisen between some a very unworthy competition, and we had some of them lowering the proper standard in order to win to their examinations numbers of candidates. This system had proceeded so far that it was not an infrequent occurrence for candidates who were rejected by one Board for utter incompetence to go almost immediately to another Board and get qualified, become registered, and thus be thrown on the public as State-qualified practitioners. He had called the attention of the House on a previous occasion to the subject, and the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council had acknowledged that it was a bad state of things, and much wanted remedying. Now, it was proposed to make the great change of allowing any of these qualifying Bodies to admit women to their qualifications. Surely, that was only greatly increasing the temptation, which had already been too frequently yielded to, for these institutions to lower the standard of efficiency, and send out to the country persons really unfit to undertake medical practice. What guarantee was there that, if any of these institutions were pressed for funds they would not flood the country with a large number of ill-educated and ill-qualified women? Before taking such a great step as the admission of women to the Medical Profession he thought they ought first of all to settle the grave state of things that existed as to proper medical qualification. He concluded by once more urging the very serious objections to the admission of young girls to the study of medicine, an objection which he believed the more it was looked into the more powerful it would prove, and the more fatal to such measures as those which they were now asked to pass.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. HENLEY said, he wished briefly to state why he should vote for the Bill.

Mr. Wheelhouse

He would not attempt to go into the larger question which had been so ably handled on both sides of the House, but would content himself with referring to the present state of our population. Our death-rate had remained stationary for the last 30 or 40 years; while, in the same periods, there had been a falling off in the supply of medical men, on whom we must mainly depend for having that death-rate lessened. Independently of that, what had been the effect of recent legislation? No man was allowed to die and be buried quietly as a gentleman ought to be without a certificate from a duly-qualified medical man, to the effect that that ugly customer Death had done his work efficiently, and that he had had nobody to help him except some duly-qualified practitioner. As it was an imperious necessity that we should die and be buried, it was of some consequence that we should not be short of the number of those who were alone able to help the survivors as well as the departed. He had no accurate means of judging except from the Census; but what did the Census say on this matter? He found that in 1841 the number of physicians was 1,112 and the number of surgeons and apothecaries 14,767, making a total of about 15,800. The population at the period was 16,000,000 odd. But according to the Census of 1871 the total number of practitioners was only 14,600, although the population had increased to nearly 23,000,000. That, in his judgment, could not be regarded as a satisfactory state of things. Moreover, it should be remembered that our enormous colonial Empire absorbed a vast number of qualified practitioners who otherwise would remain at home. That was shortly the reason why, without going into the petticoat argument, he should vote for the Bill, for he believed it might do some good in promoting the health of the people, and was thus a step in the right direction, although it would not, he was afraid, open the door to a very large number of female candidates.

DR. LUSH, in supporting the Bill, said, he thought there had been great exaggeration on both sides. For himself, he could see no danger whatever in admitting women to the study and practice of the Medical Profession. To his belief under no circumstances could females come into general rivalry with male practitioners; but if there was a feeling in society that the Medical Profession should be open to women, and there was from another point of view a large or even a small number of persons who objected to doctors on moral or sentimental grounds, this was a sufficient reason why Parliament should sanction the principle of the Bill. There was, undoubtedly, a great objection by medical students to admit women to study surgery with them; but those objections could be obviated by the arrangement of separate schools. It had been said that ladies might be admitted to take medical degrees with a view to their attending cases of their own sex, and to that he could not see any objection; but it did not seem to him that there would be any great demand for them. He admitted that to allow ladies to be registered who had taken degrees in foreign Universities might be regarded as an invasion of the rights of men who had studied the Profession and taken their degrees in this country; but there was nothing in this Bill that he could see that could be really objected to by medical men, and on those grounds and the important ground that in cases affecting the health of women and children their services would be of great value, he should give his support to the second reading of the Bill.

LORD ESLINGTON said, he intended to support the second reading on the broad, the intelligible, and, he hoped, the just ground that he would be no party to throw artificial impediments in the way of women obtaining a status as medical practitioners in this country. In his opinion, a lingering desire to maintain the monopoly of practice in the Profession lay at the root of the objections taken to this Bill; but the House of Commons was opposed to monopolies of whatever description. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse), with that skill and confidence that distinguished the Legal Profession, opposed the Bill, and asked why the British Parliament should be called upon to pass a Bill proposing to give special advantages and facilities to women to obtain medical education? His (Lord Eslington's) answer was, because we had placed women, by the harshness of our law, in a position of disability, and Parliament having done so, Parliament ought to remove it wherever it was possible; and here all women asked was that those women who had received a medical education, and had qualified themselves for the Medical Profession, should be allowed to avail themselves of their education and skill. Parliament was jealous of what were called the rights of women. There were more women than men in England, and their opportunities of advancing in life were limited by the operation of the law, and Parliament should in its wisdom do all it could to assist them by removing impediments to their obtaining a useful and respectable means of support. Now, surely there was no branch of science in which women could be employed more advantageously to mankind than in the Medical Profession. It was not for the House of Commons to estimate the chances of their being employed. If there were a number of women courageous and self-denying enough to throw aside the natural feeling of timidity, ought Parliament to place impediments in the way of their reaching the goal of their honourable ambition? If there were a number of female qualified medical practitioners in this country, he believed that nine-tenths, if not the whole, of the opposition to the Contagious Diseases Acts would fall to the ground. For this reason alone he should like to see women admitted to the practice of medicine. He believed they were perfectly competent to do so. He knew that at the present moment there was a lady physician in London who was obtaining more fees than any male medical practitioner in the metropolis. In conclusion, the noble Lord remarked that women were perfectly competent to protect their own morality.

DR. CAMERON said, the success of the effort of the hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) to prevent the women from entering the Medical Profession was, he was happy to say, extremely problematical. No question had made more rapid progress than this had done during the last few years. Two years ago the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) introduced a Bill to enable Scotch Universities at their discretion to grant medical degrees to women. Some high legal authorities, including, he believed, the Lord Advocate, had held that the Scotch Universities could grant medical degrees to women; but the Courts of Law decided that the University of Edinburgh did not possess such a power, and the women who had already graduated were thrown adrift. The Bill which he referred to was thrown out, and the right hon. Gentleman now adopted the only other alternative of allowing women who had obtained certain foreign degrees to have their names inscribed on the Medical Register of Great Britain. He regretted that the hon. Member for Galway (Dr. Ward) should have expressed an opinion that to allow women to practise the Profession would be subversive of all the established rules and usages of the Profession; but he would remind the hon. Gentleman that the Medical Council were not now hostile to the admission of women to the study of medicine. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not divide the House on the present measure, because he believed the division would be taken on a false issue. The Medical Council was now in favour of the principle of admitting women to the Profession, and he understood that that body was also prepared to support a Bill on the subject introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder of London. Even the Government had been educated, for he believed the noble Lord the President of the Council stated plainly the other night that the Government was prepared to give the utmost support in its power to the Recorder's Bill. That Bill embodied everything that was proposed three years ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire. That right hon. Gentleman might then with perfect consistency withdraw the Bill at present before the House, and which was confessedly but a makeshift one, in favour of one which embodied all that he himself had originally proposed. He trusted, therefore, that on the present occasion the right hon. Gentleman would not press his Bill to a division if the Government gave the House an assurance that the measure introduced by the Recorder should be proceeded with.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: I regret that my right hon. Friend the Member for South Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) should have spoken so much about the Medical Profession being opposed to allowing women to be placed on the Medical Register. I think my right hon. Friend has mistaken the strength of that feeling. There are no doubt many who think women are unfitted for the practice of medicine and surgery; and there are others who think the public demand for female doctors is much exaggerated. But there are few who have the selfish feelings ascribed to them by my right hon. Friend, or who would try to exclude women from the Profession in the desire to keep a monopoly of practice. There certainly have been considerable difficulties in adapting to the education of women institutions which were established for the education of men. This, however, would have occurred in regard to any Profession, such as the Law or the Church. In fact, as my hon. Friend remarked just now, public opinion and the opinion of the Profession have grown so rapidly within a year or two, that it is surprising so little prejudice and so little opposition have been shown. The steady and obtuse refusal which has been spoken of, was in reality a want of adaptation of the institutions to these purposes. In the case of the Edinburgh University the medical school is altogether insufficient for the purpose of educating men, and we have subscribed £80,000 in order to build a new medical school to receive the men who are desirous of admission. Therefore it was simply impossible to adapt our institution to the sudden influx of the other sex. This subject is, however, receiving the full attention of the Royal Commission on Scotch Universities, of which Commission I have the honour to be a Member. As a proof that my right hon. Friend was mistaken in thinking that the medical men opposed the introduction of women into the Profession, I may state that I have many hundreds of medical men in my constituency, and that I have not received from one of them a letter in opposition to this Bill. I have presented a Petition from the College of Physicians of Edinburgh pointing out the difficulty of carrying out this measure, but to the general principle that women, if they desire to enter the Profession, shall be able to do so in a proper manner, I have not received a single objection. The two Universities which I represent, and both of which are interested in the training of medical graduates, have not petitioned against this Bill. Now, there are two Bills before the House. There is the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder of London, the principle of which is that the Licensing Bodies of the Kingdom should be allowed to admit women to practise medicine and surgery. That is a Permissive Bill, which may have large consequences if it is carried into effect. As the force of public opinion increases on this subject there will be found Licensing Bodies which will admit women to a place in the Register. Of this Bill of the Recorder's the Government have, I believe, expressed a general approval. If the Government were distinctly to state that they are really desirous that that Bill should pass this Session, I hope my right hon. Friend the Member for South Hampshire will not press forward his measure. I will give one or two reasons why he should not press it forward. There are several objections to his Bill. He gives to the Universities mentioned in the Schedule a right for any female graduate in those Universities to come to be placed on the English Register. But what do foreign nations do themselves? Germany, for example, will not take the imprimatur of the Universities of Berlin and Leipsic, but requires all candidates for the Medical Profession to pass a special examination to show that they know the practice as well as the theory of their art. Why, then, should we accept the degrees of those Universities without any such test in England? I can quite sympathize with those who would open a side door to admit ladies to the Profession, but it would be impossible to close that side door against male graduates, and, in that event, the Medical Registration Act would be broken through. The Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder is amply sufficient, and I trust Her Majesty's Government will give facilities for passing it into law.

MR. STANSFELD said, that the principle of admitting women to the Medical Profession had been accepted by the Medical Council, and practically, therefore, the question was simply one of time. Sir William Gull had said there could be only two courses open—to reject Mr. Cowper-Temple's Bill and shelve the whole question as regarded England; or to take up the whole question and accept the pith of Mr. Cowper-Temple's Bill. The Report of the Medical Council was perfectly clear, and not capable of any misunderstanding. Though they expressed an opinion that there were special reasons why medicine might not be a field suitable for women, they were not prepared to say that women ought to be excluded from the Profession. The practical question for the House was, not whether women in large numbers should study and practise medicine, but whether Parliament was justified in maintaining a law which prevented women from following the practice and rendering service to any who might desire to employ them. After the advances of the Government to the Medical Council, he believed that the Government intended to support the enabling Bill of the right hon. and learned Recorder for London, and he concurred with some of those who had gone before him in the opinion that if the Government would give that measure an efficacious support, it would not be advisable to divide upon the measure now before the House. He hoped his noble Friend the Vice President of the Council would be able to make a satisfactory statement to the House on this matter. He could not understand how the Government could address such a question as they addressed to the Medical Council at the close of last Session, and could receive such a reply, without coming under some kind of obligation to deal with this question. He therefore trusted his noble Friend would make some statement satisfactory to the House and to his right hon. Friend on this subject.

VISCOUNT SANDON: The discussion which has taken place to-day has shown that considerable interest is taken in this subject. Hon. Members have shown full knowledge of the gravity of the subject, and the general tone of the discussion has been of a moderate character, and has led one to feel that the proposal brought forward by my right hon. Friend is not one that the House is prepared to scout entirely. I will not enter into the general question of fitness or unfitness of women to enter into the Medical Profession, or to take a concern in the affairs of life generally, in the same way as men do. The field is wide when we enter into that subject; but before we pass away from it, I must protest against some opinions which have been stated in the House, as to any necessary injury to the female character resulting from their being concerned in surgical or medical matters. I, for one, cannot forget the very distinguished services which the ladies of England rendered at the time of the Crimean War under Miss Nightingale, nor as representing Liverpool, the circumstances under which Miss Jones, one of the most delicate-minded and gifted of her sex, exerted herself at the head of one of the largest infirmaries at Liverpool—and I need not say what the duties of a surgical nurse are—and I never heard it stated for one moment that the delicacy, refinement, moral sense, and higher feelings of those women were injured by any service which they rendered. I have thought it right to say this, as some rather strong opinions have been expressed on this subject. As to our reception of this Bill, I must say at once we could not concede the principle of this Bill to women without proceeding in the very next Session to allow men to practice with foreign qualifications; and this, as the House is aware, would lead to a large and disputed question, and one on which great difference of opinion prevails, and in regard to which the Government are not prepared at this moment, or called upon at this moment, to pronounce an opinion. That alone would make it absolutely essential to refuse to accede to this Bill. It is absolutely impossible to legislate with regard to foreign qualifications for women alone. With regard to that point there can be no doubt as to the action of the Government. But I think it is right I should state what has been our course in this matter, so that the House may see we have not neglected the matter. During the last Session of Parliament, the Lord President of the Council, within whose Department these matters specially fall, wrote to the Medical Council. Now, when I allude to the Medical Council, I ought to remind the House that you cannot have a more important body as representing a great Profession. By universal consent they are admitted to possess the best and most acknowledged abilities from the three sister countries; so whatever opinion they give in their corporate capacity is one worthy of the highest and gravest consideration. This question of the Bill of the right hon. Member for Hampshire was accordingly referred by the Lord President to the Medical Council for their opinion. We said—"Before, as a Government, we give an opinion on the medical question, we ask the opinion of the Medical Council"—it being well understood that we did not bind ourselves to take their advice. We thought it greatly due to that important body that before we came to an opinion ourselves we should be at any rate in possession of the opinion of the Medical Council. That is really the position as between the Medical Council and the Government. The Bill was referred to that Council, and it is impossible not to be struck by their words—that they are not prepared to say that women ought to be excluded from the Profession. They stated various recommendations which they would make, supposing Parliament decided to admit women to the Profession, and one important observation of theirs was, that they thought care might be taken—care ought to be taken—for the sake of public order, that their education and examination should be separate from that of male students. That rather meets one of the objections to the Bill, showing, as it does, that the mixing of the sexes in the early days of student life would be avoided if the State thought it ought to be avoided. It would be obviously most undesirable that students, male and female, should be in association in our hospitals together during the period of lecturing. At various periods during the last twelve months the Government have also taken the opportunity of consulting privately with leading members of the Profession in London, and have had communication with deputations of those ladies who now do practise medicine—and I must be allowed to say that they were well qualified as individuals to adorn any Profession to which they may belong. After these consultations the Government became aware that my right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder for London proposed to bring in a Bill to enable the Corporations or Universities to admit women to the Profession. The Lord President referred this new Bill to the Medical Council, who replied, that as to the general principle, they adhered to what they said last year; but with regard to the Bill itself, they made no objection, but proposed two or three amendments. In the face of what we knew of the opinion of leading medical men in London, and of the Medical Council, the Government came to the conclusion that it was their duty to assent to the Bill of my right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder for London, taking care to make it clear that it was permissive, not compulsory. They felt that the Bill, which seemed to be very acceptable to what may be called the two opposing parties, was a very fair compromise, and might be a useful measure. None of the corporations would be obliged to admit women unless they liked, and we engaged to see that this was made clear in the Bill. We also engaged to see that a Proviso was made that if women were admitted to the Register, they would not thereby necessarily be qualified to take their seats on the Governing Bodies of the University Corporations. It will be unnecessary to enter upon that wide subject. That was the decision of the Government in the matter as to their being enabled this Session to give that amount of active support which I suppose entails setting apart a day for the right hon. Gentleman's pleasure. Nobody would suppose that we could do so this Session; but so far as the Government is prepared to support a moderate enabling Bill, unopposed as it is by the Medical Council, or, as I may say, supported indirectly by the Council and members of the Medical Profession in London, and accepted by some of those ladies who have made themselves distinguished in this matter, the Government felt it right to take this step, and that is the position of the matter now. I hope, under these circumstances, my right hon. Friend will not press his Bill to a division. I have no other alternative, if he does so, than to oppose it on the part of the Government, as we would not admit the principle involved in the Bill of enabling foreign diplomas to give a pass to English practice.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I have heard the speech of the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council with pleasure; and there is only one sentence to which I could take exception, and that is where he rather discourages the opinion that the Bill could be passed during the present Session. The Ministry has a wonderful power to do anything it likes when it pleases, and from the discussion to-day it is clear the House is in favour of this legislation. We have heard it stated on the authority of the noble Lord that the Medical Council is in favour of the Bill; it is merely a Bill to enable the different Medical Bodies, if they choose, to make such arrangements as to them seems proper for the purpose of admitting women to study medicine, and if they have studied it, to commence practice. Therefore the object is simple; and the House is so far agreed, that I have no doubt, if the noble Lord will only look upon it with a favourable eye, the Bill may even be passed during the present Session. I am the more anxious to press this upon the House, because every year during which this matter is delayed a really serious injustice is inflicted upon somebody. There are, no doubt, some meritorious women who are engaged in study, and who are approaching the time when they may be able to go up for examination and commence practice. There are a great many women in this country who are suffering from maladies, or may suffer from maladies, who would be able to have the assistance of medical advisers of their own sex. Therefore, for the sake of meritorious women who are studying, and those who are suffering, the Government, having once made up their mind on this subject, could not do a wiser thing than do what they have to do at once. Though we have come nearly to the conclusion of the Session, there will no doubt yet be Bills of which we have not heard brought in and passed, and the Government can do the same for this. We may thus get rid of a matter which is an extensive injustice in the minds of some persons, and add to the character of our Parliamentary work.

SIR HENRY JACKSON also urged the Government to take up the right hon. and learned Recorder's Bill and pass it this Session, and quoted a report written by one of the ladies attached to the Hospital for Women to show that further delay and uncertainty would seriously prejudice the existing arrangements for study and hospital practice, which ladies could not afford to avail themselves of while there was any doubt as to their being allowed to practise when their education was completed.

Mr. John Bright

DR. O'LEARY said, at the proper time he would adduce good reasons why ladies should not be allowed to qualify at all.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE expressed his satisfaction with the debate, as showing that the opinion of the House was in favour of dealing with the subject. He was much pleased with what the noble Lord had said. It made his Bill no longer necessary, and he would therefore propose to withdraw it.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

INCREASE OF THE EPISCOPATE BILL.
(Mr. Beresford Hope, Sir John Kennaway, Mr. Thomas Brassey.)

[BILL 11.] SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [16th February], that the Question then proposed, "That this Bill be now read a second time," be now put:—(Sir Walter Barttelot.)

Previous Question again proposed, "That that Question be now put:"—Debate resumed.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: Sir, I trust the House will allow me very briefly to recall the circumstances under which it is resuming a debate which was adjourned on the 16th of February. On that, the earliest Wednesday in the present Session, I moved the second reading of this Bill, of which I had been in charge during the preceding Session, after it had gone through every stage in "another place" without a single division. I took charge of it under circumstances which have since assumed a very melancholy interest, for I received it from one as to whom however in past times there may have been differences of opinion as to his policy on some specific questions, now that he is gone, no Englishman, no Member of Parliament in either House, no gentleman can look back to without feelings of admiration and regret—the late Lord Lyttelton. He was a very old and intimate Friend of mine. He was one for whose loss my regrets are personal as much as public. For many years Lord Lyttelton had devoted his great intellect and unparalleled power of work, among other questions, to this of the increase of the Episcopate. He had laboured at it through good and through evil report, and last year he had the satisfaction of seeing the principle for which he had laboured receive a special recognition in the triumphant and unchecked progress of his Bill through "another place." That Bill in its details was a compromise, and the result of much deliberation. In fulfilment of a promise made to him I have again brought it in in the same shape this year. Its scope is permissive, as I explained at the time. I have no prejudice for the permissive principle; but the question of the increase of the Episcopate, when an onward move was first ventilated, was not in so advantageous a position as it has become since. The matter was not ripe before the country, and the necessity of meeting the needs of the population by a more efficient machinery had not come home to the public mind. Any attempt, therefore, at that time, to bring in a definite measure, declaring that it was expedient to create a new See in this or that place, would in the hands of a private Member have seemed to be, I will not say impertinent, but exceedingly chimerical. It was necessary, however, to put the demand plainly before Parliament, and that was done in the shape of a permissive Bill; while if there is to be a permissive Bill, I must say I think that this Bill is about as safe a one as could possibly be passed. Indeed, the day after the debate, in one of those publications which claim the liberty of telling the truth to Members about themselves, I found myself handled in a way that I could not help being amused at. I was told that I had, first, argued in favour of the Bill, because it was likely to be so efficient, and next because it was so well guarded against any extensive application; and I must say that, trying to look impartially at the matter, that was at least a plausible picture of what the debate might have seemed to a not very enthusiastic backer. The Bill bristled with safeguards. The endowment comes first of all, and then the scheme, backed by the promise of money, has, to begin with, the Ecclesiastical Commission, and I am sure that no man in this House would dare to say that the Ecclesiastical Commission is a very yielding, facile, or sleepy body of men. Then, after a scheme for the erection of a new Bishopric has been submitted to the Commission, it has to go before Her Majesty in Council, and would come, of course, under the purview of the Attorney and the Solicitor General and the Home Secretary, and then it would have to lie upon the Tables of the two Houses of Parliament. Still, the cry was raised that, because it was permissive, it was a vague Bill. Another objection, which, I must say, stands upon stronger ground, is that upon which my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) moved the Previous Question, which is immediately before the House, and upon which at this moment I am technically speaking. This is, the assertion that a measure of this sort, involving a considerable change in the Episcopate, including some modification of the system on which Bishops sit in the other House of Parliament, ought to be in the hands of the responsible advisers of the Crown, and not of any private Member. Now, that is a principle which I should be the last to contend against; only I must plead in reply that I took it up in this House, and that Lord Lyttelton before me took it up "elsewhere," because the Ministers of the day would not undertake it. Neither he nor I, nor any of our supporters, would have thought of putting ourselves in that position, if we had not felt that, unless private Members of the two Houses of Parliament stepped into the breach, public opinion and Ministerial action would not have been adequately roused upon the matter. Thus I contend that the work which we did then was eminently successful. Our Bill was, in truth, a pilot balloon. It was sent up, and I hope it has led the way to something more substantial. In the previous debate my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, while urging arguments against the details of this Bill, which, however, I am not now concerned to controvert, I will not say made a promise—I do not hold him to that—but certainly held out a very strong expectation that Her Majesty's Government might see their way to propose a moderate and a specific addition to the Episcopate. I understood those words then, as I stated in the few remarks which I offered on the Motion for Adjournment, made by my hon. Friend the Member for the City

—he could have seen his way to the creation of a Bishopric of Southwark for the county of Surrey, with its more than 1,000,000 of inhabitants. He could then have assigned all West Kent, of which so much is suburban ground, to the See of Rochester, and thus relieved the Archbishop of Canterbury from a large portion of his diocesan duty, and in proportion left him free for the “care of all the Churches” which specially appertain to the metropolitical See. I do not ask my right hon. Friend whether he would accept such a scheme. I merely throw it out as a moderate suggestion; but if less were proposed by the Government, it would be thankfully accepted by the Church, though that which I have glanced at would be still more acceptable. But, with the quasi-promise of my right hon. Friend before us, with the strong expression of opinion on the part of the House in favour of the principle of an increase of the Episcopate, as shown by the large majority which it gave my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford on the Adjournment, what is the course which has been taken by the hon. Member for Swansea? My hon. Friend is never tired of telling us that he is a Churchman, and asseverating that he is not a Nonconformist, while he shows his zeal for the Episcopacy, like fanciful invalids who refuse to send for the doctor, by objecting to every proposal for its extension. His Churchmanship seems to be of a homœopathic character, for in looking upon Bishops as the regular practitioners he is anxious to see as little of them as possible. When, on the 16th of February, my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford moved the Adjournment of the Debate, the House generally was prepared to grant the Adjournment, which I should have accepted heartily. That would have been a very satisfactory conclusion of the matter; but the hon. Member for Swansea would not let well alone, nor keep himself quiet without forcing a division. Thereby he showed how enormous was the majority in favour of an increase of the Episcopate. Some advocate it in one shape, and some, like my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex, in another, but the favourable feeling is overwhelming. After what has taken place, however; after that expression of opinion by the House, I shall not feel it to be my duty to press the Bill to a division; but I trust that we may have some further and more definite declaration from the Home Secretary on the subject. At the proper time I will move that the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill be discharged.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Gentleman that “the Previous Question” had been moved as an Amendment to his Motion “That the Bill be now read a second time.” He could not, therefore, withdraw the Bill until the Amendment was withdrawn.

COLONEL MAKINS said, he hoped the Government would be able to see their way to passing some measure in the larger form in which the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge had presented it. He was sure that the provision of facilities for the increase in the number of Bishops would stimulate private benevolence in providing the funds for their endowment. He could assure the Government that there was a great desire in favour of a general measure for the increase of the Episcopate.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had never concealed his opinion that in a matter so nearly affecting the relations of Church and State any measure for the increase of the Episcopate ought to be brought forward by the responsible Ministers of the Crown; nor had he ever concealed his opinion that the time had certainly come when there ought to be a moderate increase of the Episcopate. He was not in favour of appointing too many Bishops; but no one who knew what an immense amount of work the Bishops were now called upon to perform could doubt that some moderate addition to their number was desirable. No scheme, however, ought to be brought forward by the Government without very careful inquiry and investigation—because any measure of this kind ought to be looked upon as a settlement of the question and one that ought not to be re-opened again for some time. The general feeling of the House on the former debate had certainly appeared to be in favour of an increase in the Episcopate:—he did not remember, indeed, to have seen for a long time a greater oneness of feeling than was exhibited when this Bill was under discussion in February last. His opinion was not only that any Bill for the increase of the Episcopate should be brought forward on the responsibility of

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT, in deference to the appeal made to him by the Under Secretary for the Home Department, consented to withdraw the Bill.

Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn.

(The Lord President.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: I wish, my Lords, to say a few words in reference to the measure to which I shall ask your Lordships to give a second reading, because I consider that few measures have been brought under the consideration of this House which affect more closely the interests of so large a proportion of the people of this country. In the first place, a Bill of this kind affects the lords of manors, it affects the rights of the commoners, and it affects the general public, who have, so to speak, no legal right in the commons, but who have for a considerable period had all the advantages and benefits which may be derived from large open spaces in the way of recreation, enjoyment, and health. When Her Majesty's Government came into office their attention was called to the state of matters with regard to inclosures in this country, and I am bound to say that we found them in a most unsatisfactory condition. We found that many schemes had been recommended by the Inclosure Commissioners, and that those schemes had not been ratified by Parliament. We found, in fact, that since the Report of the Committee of 1869 no scheme had been passed by Parliament; that there was a General Inclosure Act which was passed in 1845, and that no inclosures—at all events, no inclosures within a very recent period—had been made under it. Practically, therefore, the Act of 1845 had become a dead-letter; and persons had been put to expense in carrying out all the preliminary and necessary inquiries required by that Act, while, at the same time, they derived no benefit from the money so spent, Parliament having indicated in a manner not to be misunderstood that until the general law relating to inclosures was amended and revised no scheme for inclosure would be sanctioned. This unsatisfactory state of affairs naturally led to injury as well as dissatisfaction. The Committee of 1869 also intimated that it would be necessary that accurate information of all the uninclosed waste lands of the country should be furnished to Parliament before Parliament could be expected to deal with the matter. That Return has now been presented, and it appears from it that there are in high districts 520,356 acres apparently cultivable, 1,425,336 acres unsuited to cultivation, and 34,585 acres of common field; while in low districts there are also 363,633 acres apparently cultivable, 59,140 not suited to cultivation, and 229,722 of common field. Therefore, the information which was deemed necessary before Parliament should deal with inclosures having been obtained, it seems that now is the proper and fitting time to take up the subject. Previous to this Return being furnished in the Report of the Commissioners, the Secretary of State for the Home Department in 1874 brought in a Bill for the purpose of confirming a number of schemes which were waiting for confirmation, and, although some of these schemes were not objected to, my right hon. Friend felt that to pass the measure which he then had in view would occupy the whole of the Session, and accordingly he reluctantly gave up the Bill in that year and devoted his energies to a measure for the purpose of amending and revising the law, and this measure is the one I am about to ask your Lordships to read a second time. Before going into the details of the Bill I may mention that this is a question which has been occupying the attention of Parliament for a very great number of years, and that very interesting inquiries have been instituted from time to time—and even at the close of the last century and the beginning of this century—with respect to the inclosure of commons: the object being, at the earlier period to which I have alluded, to encourage inclosure as much as possible with the view of promoting agriculture and so increasing the food of the people, and also in order to find employment for the soldiers who were then about to be discharged at the close of the war. With your Lordships' permission, I will read two short extracts from the Reports of two Select Committees which sat at the close of the last century, because they are interesting as showing what a remarkable change has come over this country on this very subject of the inclosure of commons. The first Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Waste Lands in 1795 said—

"As there is reason to believe that, by taking early measures to promote such improvements those lands might not only be speedily brought into a state of cultivation, but might be improved in such a manner as to yield a considerable addition to the stock of provisions for the maintenance of the people in the course both of the next and of the succeeding years, and more particularly to furnish a very large additional supply of potatoes, when such aid is particularly desirable—namely, for the purpose of the ensuing harvest, can be ready for consumption, your Committee thought it necessary to lose no time in submitting to the consideration of the House the general information to which they have already referred, together with the opinion they have been led to form thereon."

Two years after that—in 1797—the Select Committee reports in the following way:—

"Your Committee cannot too strongly recommend to the House an immediate attention to this important subject. Every means they are of opinion ought to be taken for adding without delay from at least 150,000 to perhaps 300,000 acres to the land now in cultivation, as the only effectual means of preventing that importation of corn and disadvantages therefrom by which this country has already so deeply suffered."

Matters have certainly very much changed since that Committee sat. They go on to say—

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon

"It is more particularly necessary to carry such a measure speedily into effect, because might be of the most essential public service such as the present war is concluded to have important a resource opened at home for the employment of our gallant soldiers, who must be dismissed when such an event takes place, and to whom the cultivation and improvement of the territory of the country would furnish the most valuable and useful of all occupations."

Therefore, in those days the object of the inclosure of commons was first and all to set this country perfectly free from the necessity of looking to foreign countries for the importation of corn, and next to provide employment for our soldiers when they were no longer wanted. Of course the amount of land then not in cultivation was very great, and although it was at that time a question of food for the people and employment for the Army, the matter, I think, now assumes a very different aspect, and the object which one has in view a great degree in view in dealing with this subject is the health and recreation of the great body of the poorer classes in this country. In fact, what we desire is the regulation of commons more than the inclosure of those spaces; and this we have set out in the Preamble of this Bill, which says that—

"inclosure in severalty as opposed to regulation of commons should not be hereinafter made, unless it can be proved to the satisfaction of the said Commissioners and of Parliament that such inclosure will be of benefit to the neighbourhood as well as to private interests, and to those who are legally interested in any such commons."

These are the views with which we have brought forward this measure; and our object is the regulating of spaces which may be convenient for purposes of health and recreation. In 1801 an Inclosure Act was passed called the Inclosure Clauses Consolidation Act. That Act was to be incorporated with every private Bill that was passed for inclosures, and I think that within the last 40 years no fewer than 20 Acts have been passed relating to this subject. Passing down from 1801 to 1845, we have the General Inclosure Act, in which the proceeding by Provisional Orders was established, those Provisional Orders having subsequently to be confirmed by Parliament. That General Inclosure Act it is our duty now, as we conceive, to endeavour to amend and revise. In 1865 a Select Committee sat to consider the question of the open spaces near the Metropolis, and the result of that Committee was that an Act was passed commonly called the Metropolitan Commons Act, which excluded from the General Act all those places within the Metropolitan Police District; and by the operation of that Act the lords of the manors cannot inclose except by means of a Private Bill or by the Statute of Merton, and also with the consent of all the commoners. It has been suggested that we could accomplish the object we have in view by extending the Metropolitan Commons Act to all the other parts of the country; but that plan does not commend itself to us as a proper mode of dealing with the matter, and we have put it entirely on one side. The Committee I have previously referred to, which sat in 1869, went very carefully and fully into this matter, and made various recommendations of a most important character, and it is upon the Report of that Committee and upon their recommendations that this Bill has been specially framed. We have looked most carefully into the Report of the Committee of 1869, and I believe it will be found that the provisions of this Bill most strictly and accurately carry out all the recommendations which were made by that Committee. My Lords, the principles upon which we have acted in preparing this Bill have been, in the first place, to maintain all existing rights. We preserve the rights of lords of manors, we preserve all the rights of commoners, and we set up no new rights. We do not propose by this Bill in any way to prevent inclosures being made. We think the same opportunity should be afforded to lords of manors and others under this Bill as they have enjoyed hitherto for making inclosures. We say, if lords and commoners are satisfied with the existing state of things, we are content to leave them entirely untouched: but we say, if they are unsatisfied with the existing state of things, and if they want to come to Parliament to obtain a remedy, we do not think it unreasonable that in the interests of the public, the health of the people, and on general sanitary grounds, some arrangements should be made with them for the comfort and enjoyment of the poorer classes. We give, therefore, to the Urban Sanitary Authority a right to appear before the Inclosure Commissioners, and we give them the power to undertake the management of commons. We also allow them to contribute out of local funds, as the subject concerns the health of the people. It is not my intention to weary your Lordships by going through the various clauses of the Bill, but your Lordships will observe that due regard is given in it to the rights of all parties, and especially to all sanitary points. These are the general principles on which we have drawn the Bill—mainly, as I said before, upon the Report and recommendations of the Committee which sat in 1869. We think that the mode in which we deal with the procedure under this Bill is one which ought to commend itself to your Lordships' approval. We wish that every possible facility shall be given to all parties who may be affected in any way by a proposed inclosure or regulation of commons. In the first place, the parties who seek to have alterations made are to apply, in the first instance, to the Inclosure Commissioners, and if the Inclosure Commissioners think that a prima facie case has been made out for complying with the request, they may send down Assistant Commissioners to investigate the case upon the spot. Every care is taken that due notice shall be given in order that all parties interested may have an opportunity of stating their case for or against the proposal; after the Assistant Commissioners have so taken evidence upon the spot they will report to the Inclosure Commissioners, who will weigh the evidence thus brought before them, and if the Inclosure Commissioners think that the proposal ought to be made the subject of a Provisional Order, and subsequently be included in an Act of Parliament, they will certify that to Parliament. It is proposed that this Provisional Order shall undergo the investigation of a Select Committee, which might be appointed at the commencement of every Session for the purpose of dealing with these matters. In fact, we propose that the inclosure and regulation of commons shall be dealt with exactly in the same way as turnpikes are now dealt with in the other House of Parliament. From the experience of the manner in which that system has worked, we think it would work equally well and beneficially in dealing with the inclosure and regulation of commons. I do not think that I should be justified in going further into the details of the Bill—those are matters which are better dealt with in Committee—but I may express a hope that your Lordships will give this Bill a second reading, because if you do so you will confer a great boon upon all the poorer classes of the community, and add very much to the health, the recreation, and the enjoyment of the people.

Moved.—That the Bill be now read 2^d.
—The Lord President.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, it was agreed on all hands that something must be done on this subject, and he was glad that the Government had brought forward this measure. It was to be observed that a very few years ago there was an outcry for inclosure—it used to be said if the waste lands in this country were given to the poor to cultivate, it would prevent the necessity of emigration to Canada, Australia and New Zealand. Well, that delusion had been dispelled by the discovery that the greater part of the land open to inclosure was not worth cultivating. We had, therefore, now got to another stage of opinion, a little too much on the other side. For instance, it was now provided that, in the case of commons within six miles of a town, the inhabitants should have a right of interfering on a question of inclosure. A common at six miles' distance from a large manufacturing town in the North of England might be of great use to the inhabitants of that town, but he could not imagine that an inhabitant of one of the towns in the West of England, after a day's work, would walk 12 miles to have a game of cricket. The distance named was excessive. He regretted to perceive that the Bill preserved what was called the right of turbarry. He thought that was a defect in the Bill—"turbarry" was simply piling away the turf in such a manner that it would take a hundred years to recover—which, in fact, revived the common with no giving as much turf for fuel as was worth cutting. Another defect in the Bill was that, whereas at present a landlord or a tenant who owned one or two farms adjoining a common could make a small inclosure for the purpose of building some cottages thereon, under this Bill he could not do so without publishing a notice that he intended to make such inclosure. With regard to commons near considerable towns or populous places, he thought it was most desirable that they should be kept for the recreation of the people, but he thought the Bill in some respects went beyond that. However, on the whole, he agreed with the principles of the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY hoped their Lordships would receive the Bill as a settlement of a question which had engaged the attention of Parliament for a considerable time. He trusted the Government would not, in consequence of the observations of the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) be disposed to make the Bill less effective than it was. He regarded Clause 8 as containing the most valuable provisions of the Bill. He did not agree with the noble Duke that the proposal to bring within the operation of the measure all commons within six miles of any town was too extensive. Comparatively small towns were daily increasing in size, and if commons within six miles of them were permitted to be inclosed we should find in a short time that all the open spaces that were necessary for the recreation and the health of their inhabitants had been built over. Under these circumstances he thought that the six mile area should be maintained. He had heard with regret the remarks of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) with regard to the clause relating to inclosures by consent, because he had intended to propose an extension rather than a limitation of its provisions. He thought the provisions of the Statute of Merton in the matter required revision. Inclosures by consent had been carried into effect very largely, and had in many instances, such as in that of Plumstead Common, given rise to riots and disturbances. He desired that the rights of all parties should be preserved, but that they should be enforced in a legal and orderly manner, and, therefore, he should propose that in all cases where commons were situated within six miles of a town having 5,000 inhabitants the Urban Sanitary Authority should have power to interfere, and, if necessary, to obtain an injunction against parties who were attempting to inclose such commons illegally. Great advantage would result from there being a public authority who would have power to interfere to prevent the illegal inclosure of these open spaces.

which there was a great temptation in the neighbourhood of large towns to devote to building purposes. The advantage of having such bodies who were in a position to resist encroachments of that character had been exemplified in the case of Epping Forest, which would have been inclosed had it not been for the course taken by the Corporation of London. When the Bill got into Committee, therefore, he should move an Amendment giving the Urban Sanitary Authority a power such as he had indicated. The principle of the Bill was new, and was very good, it being based upon the doctrine that inclosures were not of themselves desirable, but should only be permitted in cases where the Commissioners were of opinion that they would be for the benefit not only of the lord of the manor and of the commoners, but of the neighbourhood generally. He trusted that the measure would speedily become law.

LORD REDESDALE said, the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond), in moving the second reading, stated that the Bill maintained all existing rights and conferred no new rights. He desired to know how the noble Duke reconciled this statement with the 19th clause. The 19th clause authorized the Inclosure Commissioners to require allotments for exercise and recreation and for field gardens to be made upon "any inclosure of a common which is subject to restricted rights of common in like manner as where the common rights are unrestricted." It seemed to him that if the House sanctioned this clause, they not only interfered with existing rights, but set up the dangerous principle of empowering the Inclosure Commissioners to take property from those to whom it undoubtedly belonged in order to give it to those who had not the shadow of a title to it. It was not simply because three or four persons had neglected to exercise their undoubted right to inclose, and had been content to let their cows pasture in common, that a part of their land should be taken from them and given to others who had no rights whatever over it. To adopt such a principle would, in his opinion, be extremely dangerous.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, that this was really a very large question, involving many interests. There were within one mile of their Lordships'

House, in the county of Surrey, 600 different pieces of uninclosed land, and there were thousands of acres which might be turned to profitable occupation. Much of the waste land was not worth cultivating, but there was a great deal that might be turned to profitable account in one way or another. Surely it would be for the benefit of the community at large that this large amount of land should be brought into use, rather than that it should be condemned by Act of Parliament to remain unproductive for ever. The property was, perhaps, of little value for agricultural purposes; but the way to reclaim it was to place on it cottages or small residences, with gardens attached, and by these means the land would certainly in the end be redeemed from sterility. It struck him, in reading the Bill, that there was one point on which injustice would be done by it. The Bill provided that all commons within six miles of a town of 5,000 inhabitants—measured, he supposed, on the Ordnance map (for the Bill omitted to state how the measurement was to be made)—were to be maintained. If they took Guildford, or Dorking, or Reigate, each the centre of districts in which there were thousands of acres of common land, it was surely not intended to give those towns a veto on the inclosure of any common within six miles of them? There were, however, difficulties in the opposite direction. It was provided by Clause 14 that, for the improvement and protection of commons a portion not exceeding one-fortieth part, or 2½ per cent, might be sold to pay the expense; but in Surrey, where these lands were of very small value, 2½ per cent would not be sufficient. If 5 per cent were allowed it would give some chance for the formation of a fund sufficient to pay the expenses of a proper improvement of the common. Again, in the Bill a valuable source of income was neglected. There ought to be a power to let off allotments of these waste lands to the poor, which, under proper regulations, would be an immense boon, and would produce a considerable sum to expend on the regulation of the remaining portion of a common. He believed that many of the poor would willingly pay a fair rent for small allotments, which might be applied to the general purposes of any park. He thought the Commissioners ought to have full power of dealing with each case as it arose, and believed that the main principles of the measure would meet the approval of all those who took an interest in the matter.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he was much gratified at the manner in which the measure had been received by their Lordships. He would promise that the suggestions which had been offered should be carefully considered, and, if necessary, embodied in Amendments that would be introduced when the measure had reached a later stage. He might state that the 8th clause, to which such repeated reference had been made—that giving the six-mile limit—was introduced into the Bill in consequence of the recommendation of the Committee of 1869.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

ST. VINCENT, TOBAGO, AND GRENADA
CONSTITUTION BILL—(No. 156.)

(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, a few words of explanation would suffice. These Islands, which hitherto had had Constitutions after the West Indian type, desired to exchange them for a constitution similar to that in Crown Colonies. Tobago had abrogated its Constitution—which, however, it had no power to do—and Grenada had repealed the Act under which it existed, and they now, in conjunction with St. Vincent, sought to be re-constituted by this Bill, which fully accorded with the wishes of the people.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he did not like the second reading of the Bill to be agreed to without saying that he was glad these Islands were to have a better Constitution, and after the manner proposed by this Bill. It was creditable to the authorities of these Islands that they should have voluntarily come forward and asked the Government to place them under a better constitution.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

METROPOLIS (WHITECHAPEL AND LIMEHOUSE) IMPROVEMENT SCHEME
CONFIRMATION BILL—(No. 120.)

(The Lord President.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in moving that the Bill be now read a third time, said, he desired to refer to the objections made by his noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury) on a former evening, to the effect that no houses should be pulled down in the locality without due notice to the inhabitants, in order that they might have sufficient time to provide themselves with dwellings before being displaced. He concurred in the remarks of his noble Friend, but thought he should be able to remove any objections that existed in his mind. His noble Friend would see that by the 11th section of the Artizans' Dwellings Act, where any buildings were required to be pulled down in carrying out any scheme, the local authorities were bound to give the inhabitants 13 weeks' public notice before the pulling down of their dwellings was commenced; and if such notice were not given the inhabitants were empowered to make application to a justice of the peace, or to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Therefore, no pulling down of houses could take place until the inhabitants of them had the legal notice provided in the Artizans' Dwellings Act. Thus, in the first place, there must be notice given; and, in the second, the houses to be built must be in accordance with the rules of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and—in reference to some further remarks of his noble Friend—they must be arranged so as to have a proper water supply, and in accordance with sanitary regulations as provided by the 9th section of the Artizans' Dwellings Act.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Lord President.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY thanked the noble Duke for the attention he had given to the suggestions he had thrown out the other evening. He should have been better pleased to have seen distinct provision made that no houses should be pulled down until it had been ascertained that there was lodging accommodation in the neighbourhood, and that the number of water cisterns and dust bins should be specified, for it must not be lost sight of that these houses would probably be run up very high, and if the poor people living at the top had to come down to the centre for every drop of water they wanted, it would be a serious strain upon them, and, what was as bad, would involve a considerable loss of time. Furthermore, it was most desirable that every requisite sanitary arrangement should be provided on each story. He would also urge that, instead of a general notice, notice of displacement should be served at each of the houses proposed to be removed, and that, as had been the case in Glasgow, the residents should not be disturbed until it had been ascertained that lodgings were available within reasonable distance.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

METROPOLIS—THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. W. GORDON asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether, having regard to the numerous casualties which have of late occurred in the vicinity of the Thames Embankment, it is not practicable, either by suspending a chain perpendicularly from each of the iron rings now fixed in the walls of the Embankment, or by suspending a line of chains from ring to ring, or by any other process, to afford some means of escape, not only to those who may fall into the river, but also to those who on such occasions are frequently willing to risk their own lives in attempting to save the life of another?

SIR JAMES HOGG: I was not aware of the numerous casualties referred to by my hon. Friend; but, in reply to him, I beg to state that the question of guarding against such accidents has been frequently under the consideration of the Metropolitan Board, and the means suggested by my hon. Friend have been considered amongst others, but they were found open to many objections, and not likely to be practically useful.

INTEMPERANCE—A JOINT COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, considering the great national importance of the Resolution of His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, and agreed to by the House of Lords, namely—

“That a Select Committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the prevalence of habits of intemperance, and into the manner in

and to which Resolution Her Majesty's Government have given their assent, Whether it would not be advisable that any Committee appointed for this purpose should consist of Members of both Houses of the Legislature?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Government were fully alive to the importance of the inquiry which had been undertaken by the House of Lords as to the prevalence of habits of intemperance, but their Lordships had not invited the House of Commons to join in the inquiry, and it rested with the House of Lords, and not with the Government, to consider the expediency of making it a joint inquiry. He had, he might add, sought to obtain information as to the practice on those occasions, and he found the subject in question was not one of a class which was ordinarily referred to joint Committees of the two Houses. Hitherto such Committees had been appointed in cases in which the united action of both Houses was required; as, for example, metropolitan railway schemes and Bills for the amalgamation of railway companies, but on questions of general policy it was the custom for each House to appoint its own Committee.

NAVAL SURGEONS—SIR GILBERT BLANE'S BEQUEST.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether, under Sir Gilbert Blane's bequest, any funds are available for publishing the successful Essays for the “Blane Medal;” if so, whether he will consider the expediency of publishing such Essays, and if not, of sanctioning their publication in the medical journals?

MR. A. EGERTON: Sir Gilbert Blane in 1830 left £300 to be invested in Three per Cents in the name of the College of Surgeons, to bestow two gold medals every other year upon Naval surgeons whose essays should be adjudged to be the best. The cost of the medals exhausts the yearly interest of the £300, and leaves no funds for publishing the essays. These essays, moreover, take the form of journals, and could not be printed in their entirety or sent to the medical journals. The more valuable portions, however, are extracted and published in the Return of the health of the Navy annually presented to Parliament, and extracts of interest to the Profession are sent to the medical journals.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE YORKSHIRE MAGISTRACY.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in the “Yorkshire Telegraph,” of June 7th 1876, in these terms—

“After a vexatious delay of several hours the business for disposal at Guisbro' Police Court on Tuesday had to be adjourned for a week in consequence of the non-attendance of magistrates. About a dozen cases were on the list, and, as they were mostly from Redcar, Saltburn, Skelton, and other places, at some distance from Guisbro' the greatest inconvenience was occasioned. Messengers were despatched by the police in various directions for a magistrate, but even the late train in the afternoon failed to bring one of the great Unpaid, and an adjournment was in consequence necessitated;”

whether the above be true; whether it has happened before; and, whether any steps can be taken to prevent its happening again?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had put himself in communication with the justices, and what they said was this—the report was true. The occurrence happened on the 6th of June, and it did happen once before. The magistrates, before receiving his letter, had already taken steps to prevent a recurrence of such a circumstance, which they much regretted, and they had made arrangements to ensure the regular attendance of the Bench, and to obtain better arrangements from the railway company. He believed the occurrence was occasioned by the alteration of a railway train, which prevented one of the magistrates from attending. There were no resident magistrates on the spot, but there were plenty in the vicinity. He had thought it right to tell the magistrates to take care the Bench was always made.

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK PERKINS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is in accordance with the rules of the Service in cases of temporary suspension of good conduct badges of seamen or petty officers, that such suspension renders them ineligible for the award of a good conduct medal and gratuity, although they may have served meritoriously for ten or more subsequent years?

MR. A. EGERTON: The deprivation of a good conduct badge does not render a man ineligible for a medal, provided his character is recorded as "very good" for that year; but he must serve for 10 years afterwards with exemplary character.

SIR FREDERICK PERKINS asked, whether the Admiralty were likely to alter the rule?

MR. A. EGERTON: I am not aware that there is any idea at present of altering it.

FORESHORES—BALBRIGGAN FORESHORE.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can state by whom the representations were made which induced the Board to re-open the question of granting to Mrs. Hamilton a lease of the foreshore at Balbriggan, county Dublin, which would exclude the public from its enjoyment; and, whether he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Correspondence which has passed on the subject?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The representations which induced the Board of Trade to re-open the question of considering Mrs. Hamilton's application for a lease of the rights of the Crown in a certain foreshore adjoining her property at Balbriggan were made by the Constabulary to the Irish Government, and by them forwarded to me. Reports from the Constabulary are, I understand from the Chief Secretary, confidential, and cannot therefore be produced; and as the application is still under consideration it would be unusual and inconvenient to present the other Papers, and they would not alone give much information.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS (IRELAND)—MR. DILLON'S SYSTEM.—QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If, when he introduces the Bill, of which he has given notice, to amend the Law relating to the Registry of Deeds in Ireland, he is prepared to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Reports of the Committee, acting under a Treasury Letter of the 3rd day of June 1874, in superintending experiments to test an invention of Mr. Dillon for simplifying the existing system in the Registry of Deeds Office (Ireland); and, of the separate Reports of the Registrar of Deeds (Ireland), one of the Committee, on the same subject?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir, I intend to lay the Papers to which the right hon. and learned Member refers upon the Table.

SANTA FÉ—SEIZURE OF BULLION. QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to the seizure of the bullion in the London and River Plate Bank at Rosario, in the State of Santa Fé, by the authorities of that State; and, if Her Majesty's Government has received any explanations of this proceeding?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, Her Majesty's Government had had this matter under their consideration for some time, and they were consulting the Law Officers of the Crown upon it. There were, however, certain facts upon which it was desirable to have fuller information, and until that information was received, it would be impossible to come to any decided opinion upon the matter.

INDIA—THE FAMINE IN BEHAR. QUESTION.

DR. WARD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government is aware that a Requisition has been presented to the Sheriff of Calcutta for a public meeting, at which the following Resolutions were to be moved:—

"That this meeting deprecates the recent action of Her Majesty's Ministers in treating the Motion for a Commission of Inquiry into the alleged Famine in Behar as a party question:

"That, in view of the enormous cost of the late Famine relief operations, and of the widely-entertained opinion as to the wastefulness of such operations, and in view of the strain upon the revenues of India consequent upon such expenditure, it is desirable that a Commission should be appointed to inquire into the existence and extent of the alleged Famine, and into the nature, extent, and necessity of the relief operations undertaken in respect thereof;"

and, whether among the signatories to the Requisition are the President and Vice President of the Chamber of Commerce of Calcutta, the Commercial Member of the Supreme Legislative Council, two past Members of the Legislative Council, also a large number of the leading Merchants, Barristers, and Editors, both European and Native, resident in Calcutta?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The only information which I have upon this subject is derived from an advertisement in an Indian newspaper, in which it is stated that a requisition to hold a public meeting had been presented to the Sheriff of Calcutta, signed by about 100 persons, whose names are not given. In a subsequent edition of the same newspaper it is stated that the Sheriff fixed the 29th of May for the meeting; but the requisitionists, instead of availing themselves of the day so fixed, requested the Sheriff to postpone sine die the day for the meeting. The only reason for this indefinite postponement seems to be a fear on the part of the requisitionists that if the meeting is held it will be attended by persons who will propose and carry amendments hostile to the two resolutions mentioned in the Question.

DR. WARD wished to know whether the requisitionists obtained from the Executive a promise to keep the meeting quiet?

LANDED OWNERS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will move for a Return of the number of the landed proprietors in each county in Ireland, classed according to residences, showing the extent and value of the property held by each class; and, of the number of landed proprietors in each province, and in the form contained in the Return dated the 7th March 1872, No. 167?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: If I understand the hon. Member's Question rightly, the Return which he appears to be anxious to have, is a mere continuation of that obtained by the hon. Member for Westmeath in 1872. It is not my intention to move for such a Return; but if the hon. Member will move for it, I will consider whether the time has arrived when it ought to be given.

ARMY—SENIOR SURGEONS MAJOR.

QUESTION.

MR. O'LEARY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether in the future selections for promotion to the rank of Deputy Surgeon General, he will take means to prevent the Senior Surgeons Major of the Army who for twenty years and upwards have served the Crown faithfully in various climates, and through more than one campaign, with unblemished reputation in many arduous and responsible positions, from being superseded in their well-earned advancement?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, no senior surgeon with the necessary qualifications would be passed over, but proved ability will supersede seniority which is unaccompanied by the necessary qualifications.

ECCLESIASTICAL ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland has unanimously agreed to support the Ecclesiastical Assessments (Scotland) Bill of the Government; that thirty-six Petitions have been presented in its favour and only ten against it; and, whether he can state on what day the Second Reading of the Bill will be taken? I wish further to explain that I brought in a Bill on the same subject which was lost on the second reading, and that this Bill of the Government having served its object by having defeated my Bill, has stood on the Paper from the 14th of March to the present moment without any steps being taken to bring it forward.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: All I can say about the matter is that I was glad to hear that the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland had unanimously agreed to support the Bill, and I am further glad to find that the hon.

Dr. Ward

Member is also in agreement with the General Assembly. The Bill now stands on the Paper for the 17th instant, and its future progress will rest with the Scotch Members. If the Scotch Members are as unanimous as the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland there will be no difficulty in passing the Bill this Session.

MR. M'LAREN said, that no party was ever unanimous on any question, and it could not be expected that the Scotch Members would be unanimous on this.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND)
BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, At what time the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill will be taken to-night?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: At any reasonable hour.

MR. E. JENKINS: I beg to give Notice that if the Bill is brought on at an unreasonable hour I shall object.

TRAINING SHIPS (IRELAND).
QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has any objection to extend to Irish boys in general the provision which enables the sons of pensioners only in Ireland to enter the Royal Navy; and, whether in such case he would place training ships in Irish harbours for the special purpose of the naval education of such boys, there being at present no training ships in Ireland?

MR. A. EGERTON: The Admiralty has at present no training ship available which could be placed in an Irish port; but Irish boys eligible for the service are received on board the existing training ships if they present themselves. It is not, therefore, considered desirable at present to alter the existing regulations.

CEYLON—THE BREAKWATER AT TRINCOMALEE.—OBSERVATION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked for an assurance from Government that money advanced by authority of Parliament should not be spent until the people of Ceylon had made their proportionate contribution.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, a promise had been given on a former occasion that no money voted by Parliament should be spent in Ceylon until Ceylon had spent a certain amount of her own money on the breakwater at Trincomalee. Instructions to that effect had been given to the Public Works Loan Commissioners, and he had every reason to believe that those instructions had been faithfully carried out. He would, however, make inquiries on the subject.

UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE BILL.

[BILL 151.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that, with the exception of some very minute particulars in matters of detail, it was identical with the University of Oxford Bill, which stood next to it on the Paper, and therefore he would briefly state the general objects of both the measures and the means by which it was sought to effect those objects. In the first place, he wished to make one remark on the speech delivered on a former occasion by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). The only point on which he agreed with his right hon. Friend was that if there was no need of legislation the Universities ought to be left to themselves to carry on their work. If no impediments were placed in their way, they would, he firmly believed, do as much as Parliament could to extend the University system within and beyond their own borders with general benefit to all classes of the community. But it appeared from the Reports of Royal Commissions, from the Reports of University Syndicates, and from Memorials presented to Ministers of the Crown, that many things which ought to be done could not be done, and that many demands were made on the Universities which could not be substantially met, and therefore everybody must admit that it was the duty of any Government, whether Liberal or Conservative, to apply some remedies where they were imperatively demanded. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London had said that these Bills were a reversal of the policy adopted by Parliament in 1854 and 1856. Really it was astounding that such a statement should have been made by his right hon. Friend. If his right hon. Friend had recollected correctly what took place in those years, and compared it with what was taking place now, he must have come to the conclusion that these measures were the supplement and complement of those Acts, which opened up the Universities and the benefits connected with them, so that they might become more extensively available, and that this measure would encourage and promote the study of the various branches of learning, so that every student might select that branch of study most consistent with his inclination, or which might best further his interest or welfare. To call such a Bill as this, therefore, a reversal of the former policy of Parliament was a complete misnomer and a complete delusion. Then his right hon. Friend said the House was being asked to proceed without inquiry and without information, and was going to legislate in the dark. But the Report of the Commissioners for the Advancement of Science had been for three years before Parliament, and there was now an important Report of the Syndicate of the University of Cambridge, which pointed out clearly all the deficiencies now existing there. At the close of their Report the Commissioners said that though much had been done, much more remained to be done, and that work so well begun ought to be further continued. The main difficulty was not the want of will, but the want of means, which prevented the Universities from making the necessary improvements for themselves; and that brought him to the main problems the House had to meet. The Science Commissioners stated that the Universities, as distinguished from the Colleges, were not wealthy bodies, and the University funds were entirely appropriated at present, while there was no prospect of their being largely augmented, and that without the contributions from the Colleges the Universities could not do what was required. This statement was fully borne out by the Report of the Royal Commissioners appointed by the late

Prime Minister to inquire into the property and revenue of the two Universities and of the Colleges. The Commissioners divided this revenue into what they called external and internal revenue, the internal income being that derived from taxation, fees, dues, and other pecuniary payments, while the external income was that derived from real property, tithes and other rent-charges, money in the Funds, property, and other investments. The internal income was entirely appropriated; it was balanced by outgoings, and might be put out of account. External income stood on a different footing. He had stated on a previous occasion that the income of the University of Cambridge derived from property was £14,000 a-year, while the income of the Colleges of Cambridge from the same source was £264,000. This statement was not quite accurate as regarded the University, because it left out of account University income derived from trust property not vested in the University, and some other sources of income, which would bring up the income of the University as derived from property to £24,000 a-year, while the income of the Colleges as derived from property would be £264,000 a-year. As the two Bills were to be taken together it would be convenient to give a comparative statement of the present and prospective income of the two Universities derived from property, and the income of their Colleges and Halls from similar sources. The present income of the University of Oxford was £30,000 a-year, and that of the Colleges and Halls £307,000. The present income of the University of Cambridge was £24,000 a-year, and the income of the Cambridge Colleges and Halls was £264,000 a-year. The prospective increase of income of the University of Oxford was £2,000 a-year; that of the Colleges and Halls was estimated by the Commissioners at £96,000 a-year. The prospective increase of the income of Cambridge University might be set down at nil; while that of the Colleges and Halls of Cambridge was estimated at £34,000 a-year, which might be more correctly put at £30,000, as some deductions would have to be made. Thus it would be seen that the same disproportion between the revenues of the University and of the Colleges existed at Oxford as at Cambridge, though the University income at Oxford, both present and prospective, was much larger than that of Cambridge, and the needs of the University of Cambridge, therefore, were proportionately greater than the needs of the University of Oxford. Upon the prospective increase of College revenue at both places much depended, because this was an accruing income which might be reasonably applied in a different manner from that of the present revenue. The main question, of course, was whether, the finances of the two Universities being what they were, it was reasonable that something should be contributed out of the Collegiate funds to that which was for the common benefit of the University and the Colleges collectively. That was a most important matter, and upon it the whole question of the improvement of superior teaching rested. The principle which he had mentioned, as contained in the Bill, and also the qualification of it, was both, he believed, reasonable. The principle was reasonable, because the Colleges were part of the University, and had the same or similar interests. The relation of the Colleges to the Universities and of the Universities to the Colleges must be, if they were both to thrive, a relation of mutual assistance, co-operation, and support. What was contained in the Bill would form the solution of many of the difficulties which had arisen, but what was needed was some external power or authority that might arbitrate between these different corporations, so as to induce Colleges to contribute rateably and equitably with the other institutions to what was necessary for the common good of all. It would be said, no doubt, why not leave the Universities and Colleges to do that of themselves, and not force it upon them? The answer was obvious: Unless you had some external authority to do it, the thing would not be done; because, without external authority, you would not be able to settle the amount in just proportions which the Colleges should contribute. Now under the Bill this difficulty would be overcome. Several of the Colleges—Trinity, St. Peter's, and Sidney, Sussex—had provisions in their statutes by which they undertook to contribute 5 per cent of their income for University purposes; but that undertaking was a conditional one—namely, that all the other Colleges should do the same. The consequence had been that this provision, which would have been one of the best for the University to enable it to meet the wants that were pressing upon it, had remained a dead letter; it never had been acted upon, and without some external authority he believed it could not be acted upon. Here he had great satisfaction in stating that at this moment two of the Colleges at Cambridge had passed resolutions that those Colleges were to contribute 5 per cent out of their distributable income for University purposes; and the second resolution embodied this proposition—that they should also settle on the maximum tenure and the maximum value of the Fellowships. In general harmony with those resolutions was another document, the last with which he would trouble the House. When the Commission was appointed by his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) to inquire into the property of the two Universities, his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), who had dealt so hardly and, he would say, so unadvisedly with the two measures before the House, was a Member of the Government, who must have known what their object was in issuing that Commission. He would undertake to say that everybody in the two Universities knew perfectly well that legislation would follow upon the Commission. A year after the appointment of that Commission, a most important Memorial was laid before his right hon. Friend the First Minister of the Crown in 1873; and that memorial was also laid before his right hon. Friend now at the head of Her Majesty's Government. That Memorial, he had no hesitation in saying, was signed by some of the most eminent and influential resident members of the University. They might number them by dozens. They were men of all political opinions, but they all had the interests of the University at heart, and were as familiar as it was possible to be with its working. They drew up four resolutions, which they pressed with earnestness on the attention of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, with a view to any legislation for advancing the educational efficiency of the University, and also for promoting the advancement of learning. The first resolution stated that no Fellowship should be tenable for life, except only when the original tenure was extended in consideration of services rendered to education, learning, or science, actively and directly in connection with the University or Colleges. That was one of the matters with which the Commissioners would certainly have to deal. The second resolution was to the effect that a further professional career should, as far as possible, be opened to resident educationists or students, whether married or not. The third resolution was to the effect that provision should be made for the association of the Colleges, or some of them, for educational purposes, so as to secure efficient teaching, and to the teachers more leisure for study. And the fourth resolution was that the pecuniary relations existing between the University and Colleges should be revised, and that, if necessary, a representative Board of University Finance should be established. These recommendations, he had no hesitation in saying, the University of Cambridge was anxious to see considered in the most careful manner, he would not say with a view to the adoption of all, but of such as might seem best adapted to promote the advancement of science and learning, and the Resolutions concluded with the hope that the reforms indicated would be distinctly recognized in any Bill which might be proposed. He would now conclude were it not for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), which was—

“That, in view of the large legislative powers entrusted to the University of Cambridge Commissioners by this Bill, this House is of opinion that the Bill does not sufficiently declare or define the principles and scope of the changes which such Commissioners are empowered to make in that University and the Colleges therein.”

If hon. Members would look to the Preamble of the Bill, and to the clauses framed to carry that Preamble into effect, he thought that it could be seen, and that the hon. Baronet himself would see that the principle and scope of the Bill were as clear and distinct as they well could be made. The Preamble said that it was—

“Expedient that provision be made for enabling or requiring the Colleges in the University to contribute more largely out of their revenues to the purposes of the University, especially with a view to further and better instruction in art, science, and other branches of learning, where the same are not taught, or not adequately taught, in the University.”

The scope of the changes to be carried out was entirely contained in the clauses of the Bill. He knew that it had been said by the right hon. Member for the University of London that the directions given in the two former Bills were more specific than those given in this Bill. He (Mr. Spencer Walpole) said, however, that the Bill indicated as clear as language could make it the principle upon which the Commissioners were to proceed, and the scope of the changes which they were authorized and empowered to put in force. That being so, he apprehended that it would hardly be deemed necessary that the hon. Baronet should press his Amendment. All the details of the proposed reform could hardly be settled by Parliament, and they had much better be left to the Commissioners. Such, for example, were the limits to the tenure of Fellowships; the extension of the Professoriate; the Collegiate contribution to University purposes; the complete organization of the admirable system of inter-Collegiate lectures and teaching; and the mode on which scientific investigations and original research could best be prosecuted and encouraged. Many of the questions must, in fact, be determined upon the spot, where sound and accurate opinions and every information could be had. One of the consequences of carrying the Amendment must be to postpone legislation for another year, and nothing could be worse for the Universities than to keep them in a constant state of uncertainty as to what duties they were to discharge and what arrangements they were to make to carry into effect the desires of Parliament. It was for these reasons that he could not concur in the Amendment, and it was for these reasons also that he hoped the House would give a second reading to the measure.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Spencer Walpole.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in rising to move, as an Amendment,—

“That, in view of the large legislative powers entrusted to the University of Cambridge Commissioners by this Bill, this House is of opinion that the Bill does not sufficiently declare or define the principles and scope of the changes which such Commissioners are empowered to make in that University and the Colleges therein,"

said, on the last occasion on which they had debated the University Bills the speaking had been all on the side of those who thought, as he thought, that the powers given to the Commissioners were far too undefined. This view had been expressed by no less than six Members of the House. Two Conservatives, and four Liberals, on this point, at least, condemned the Bills. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had defended the Bills in reference to matters on which they had not been attacked, and the right hon. Gentleman who had moved the second reading of the Oxford Bill (Mr. Hardy) had seemed to agree with its opponents as fully as did the other right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) who had that day moved the second reading of the Cambridge Bill. What had those right hon. Gentlemen said of the "increase of the Professoriate," of the "abolition of idle Fellowships," and of the "endowment of Research," which, according to a noble Marquess in "another place," were the objects of those Bills? They had said that there should not be any increase made to the Professoriate without "caution," and "full consideration." They had said that, in their opinion, the holders of "idle Fellowships" were not "idle;" that, without Fellowships, "men of small means would be unable to go to the Bar." They had further declared, with regard to the "endowment of Research," that they "did not know what was meant by those who made use of that phrase." Well, that was the case of the opponents of the Bill. They asked for "caution" and "consideration," and they did not find them in the Bill. They had doubts as to the wisdom of a noble Marquess in proposing to sweep away what he was pleased to call "idle" Fellowships. They did not quite understand what was meant by the "endowment of Research," and they had a hesitation as to the policy of handing over to Mr. Burgon, or even to Professor Lightfoot, the power to destroy whole Colleges, and the power to make of new theological Professors members of lay foundations. They went so far as to believe that if Lord Salisbury intended to follow the guidance of certain residents of the Universities, they should one day discover that he had destroyed the noblest foundations in the world, and built up second-rate German Lyceums in their stead. The gist of their complaint was that too much power was left to the Commissioners, one of which at least they profoundly distrusted and disliked. The Secretary at War replied that the 15th clauses of the Bills were there to guide them. Would he answer a question? The revenue of the University of Cambridge being £14,000 a-year, and that of the Cambridge Colleges £300,000 a-year, and it being admitted that something was to be taken from the Colleges and given to the Universities, was there one word in Clause 15 to show whether that part, so taken, was to be another £14,000, or whether it was to be £200,000—whether, in short, it was to be a flea-bite, or whether it was to be half the whole? Their complaint was, that as far as any limitations went the Bill enabled the Commissioners to strip the Colleges in order to make a couple of bad copies of a German University. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his reply to the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), had said that the late Government had appointed a Commission on the Revenues of the Colleges and Universities, and that the appointment of that Commission had led to the present Bills. Now, it had led to a Bill, but not to the particular Bills that they had before them. Not to Bills to enable two sets of Commissioners to do exactly what they pleased. What case had been made out so grave as to need that desperate remedy? They were asked to place the whole College system of England at the mercy of two Commissions, one of which was profoundly clerical, while the other contained a clerical minority so strong, that with three reactionary Commissioners in the case of each reactionary College they would have a reactionary majority. The result would be, at Oxford a reactionary policy supported by a section of the Liberal Party who were tempted by the vast advantages given to residents by the Bill, and at Cambridge, an advanced policy as regarded Trinity College and Trinity Hall, and a reactionary policy as regarded most of the other Colleges of the University. Why should they be forced to count heads even upon the better Commission of the two, and seriously to consider whether Professor

Lightfoot was more clerical or less clerical than the Bishop of Worcester? He had used the word "reactionary," and not the word "Conservative," because a large number of the Oxford Conservatives were in full agreement with the old-fashioned University Liberals upon these points, just as, on the other side, the ultra-clerical party was acting with the friends of endowment of Research. "But," said right hon. Gentlemen opposite, "let them look at Clause 15." The clause did not tell the Commissioners what they were to do. It told them only what they could do, which was a very different thing. It was vague in the extreme. For example, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for his University (Mr. Walpole), and the Secretary of State for War were in favour of the clause. Now, the clause pointed to the increase of the Professoriate, and the endowment of Research. But those right hon Gentlemen themselves declared that they were rather afraid of the increase of the Professoriate, and that as for the endowment of Research they shared our fears that this might mean the creation of sinecures. They hoped that the money given for Research would be taken away if the researches were not made. By what machinery they did not say, and he (Sir Charles Dilke) pitied Mr. Burgon and his Colleagues if they had to invent a plan for robbing a so-called scientific investigator of his income, unless his supposed researches produced results. Mr. Burgon and his Colleagues were to increase the Professoriate. The Secretary of State for War had said, "with caution." But the wild residents said, "with no caution at all." On the contrary, with so bold a hand that there were to be Professors of every language in Central Asia, Professors of Kalmuck, and of Kipchok Tartar, and "four new Professors of Theology at least." One, he supposed, of the theology of the Vatican; one of that of Mr. Burgon; one of that of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), and one of that of Mr. Congreve. A brilliant resident, whom he had the honour to count among his friends, wished to see a Chair of critical journalism founded to expose the errors of the daily Press. Another of his friends thought that there should be a Professor of spelling reform. But, seriously, were they so sure that

Professorships were of real advantage, that they must jump at any proposition for increasing them, at any cost? Why, one of the most distinguished Professors who ever lectured at Oxford, Professor Max Müller, never lectured except to empty benches. Professor Monier Williams was drawing a large audience just now to his lectures about India; but it was an audience composed of ladies, not as yet members of the University, whatever might happen in a few years, and these ladies went to applaud vivid descriptions of the Prince's tour, and appeals touching the evangelization of the benighted heathen, rather than lectures on "Sanskrit," which it was the business of Professor Williams to teach. Dr. Legge, one of the best specialists in England, had lately, after much trumpeting, been appointed to a brand new Professorship:—did any Oxford man in that House venture to assert that he would ever have any one present at his lectures, except a private friend. He (Sir Charles Dilke) remembered to have heard how, in Paris, Professor Stanislas Julien, a man of world-wide fame, used to lecture, winter after winter, in an empty room. At last he was one day gratified by the presence of a party of three, two gentlemen and a lady, who came in in the middle of his lecture, sat down, stayed for a quarter of an hour, and then went away. The next day one of the gentlemen came again, but this time with different companions. Greatly delighted, Stanislas Julien rushed off to discover through the keeper of the lecture hall who were these persons, when to his grief he had found that the man who had come twice was a commissionaire who for five francs a-day was showing Paris to foreigners, and who, selecting the most singular of sights, had brought his employers "to see a Professor lecturing to a stove." As for the "endowment of Research," or "research after endowment," as it had cleverly been called, no two persons were agreed. Were Mr. Burgon and his Colleagues to search the pages of the monthly magazines to find ideas upon the subject? When they had found ideas, let them just think of the quarrels and the "jobs." There were many, he was glad to say, who still held to the good old University belief that the best abstract work was done by men who had, as to a portion of their time, other regular daily work to do. There was a passage in Lord Macaulay's letters which illustrated this view; he had taken two pupils to read with him, and he wrote of the effect upon himself—

"I find that I read much more in consequence, and the regularity of habits necessarily produced by a periodical employment which cannot be procrastinated, fully compensates for the loss of time which is consumed in tuition."

The Bill before them was a Bill to place unlimited power of abolishing Colleges which were unlike anything else in the world, and of cutting and carving at their will the great University to which he had the honour to belong, in the hands of Commissioners, who, while not so objectionable to him as were most of those to whom was committed the power of demolishing Oxford, held, nevertheless, many of them, opinions which could only be gathered by guesswork. He had said "unlimited power." Nearly unlimited. Limited only when limitation told against Liberal ideas. They had no power to reform those anomalous bodies—Congregation, Senate, Convocation, and Electoral Roll. They were forbidden by the Bill itself to leave the government of Colleges in the hands of those who now exercised it with such skill. Whether the Commissioners wished it, or whether they did not, the lay non-resident Fellows were to be excluded from the government of Colleges, which, by Clause 47 of the Oxford Bill, and Clause 53 of the Cambridge Bill, passed chiefly into clerical hands. To Mr. Burgon and his Colleagues was given, on the other hand, the power to maintain those clerical restrictions which narrowed the choice of persons to fill nearly all the Headships of Colleges in both Universities, two-thirds of the Fellowships at Oxford, and many Fellowships at Cambridge. Could any one doubt what this power meant? Could any one doubt that Mr. Burgon and his Colleagues would maintain these restrictions? Why, the only Member of the Oxford Commission who could assuredly be trusted to vote for their removal was the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Ridley). He was a Conservative; but, nevertheless, he was their trust, for he was the only young Member of the Oxford Commission, and the only one of its members who really knew the fresh University opinion of the day. No one defended the clerical restrictions; why, then, should not they be removed in the Bill? Why should "unfettered discretion" be left to Mr. Burgon, when the use that he would make of it was as certain as if he were to be fettered. This matter was not properly understood. The newspapers talked about "the abolition of clerical Fellowships," which was a misleading phrase. No one wished to declare that holders of Fellowships should not be in Holy Orders, but only to remove the compulsory limitation of nearly all Headships and of many Fellowships to Clerks in Orders. That limitation had the effect of narrowing the field of selection, lowering the standard, and preventing the best man from being in all cases elected. It was a limitation which might sometimes cause hypocrisy, and which must of necessity draw with it those evils which led to the abolition of tests—an abolition not now regretted even by the Conservative Party in the Universities. He contended that the retention of these restrictions was contrary to the policy, and that the successful policy, of the Universities Tests Act. It was a public scandal that men of distinguished ability could not be selected for the Headships of their Colleges, however much the most fit persons for the post, because they did not happen to be clergymen. To show, however, that those who wished to abolish these restrictions neither desired to secularize the Colleges nor were possessed with what Lord Salisbury called "clerophobia," he could quote the opinion of no less clerical a personage than the Primate of England. It had been argued that the retention of a certain number of clerical Fellowships was a security for an element of Christianity, but this view had been pooh-poohed by the Archbishop of Canterbury himself. As the Primate thought the argument of no weight, why should others attach importance to it? It was more than doubtful whether the Church gained by the maintenance of clerical restrictions. Conscientious scruples in regard to the pecuniary temptations held out had not unfrequently deterred men of high character and great ability from taking Orders. On the other hand, it was also a scandal from which the Church suffered harm that young men should be tempted to take Orders without feeling any fitness for the calling, in consequence of clerical restrictions thus imposed. The suppression of clerical Fellows was not involved in the "abolition of clerical Fellowships." The reduction of the total number of Fellows in Orders would probably be small. At New College, Oxford, for example, where there was not, nor ever had been, a clerical restriction, there was not, and never had been, a lack of Fellows in Orders. No measure of reform could be final; but there would be no question left open to immediate agitation if that point were conceded. If, on the other hand, they were to maintain the restriction, the first opportunity would be seized to reverse their decision. With regard to the power and influence of the clerical Fellows in any College, that influence would not be left alone by the present Bills. It would be increased, and increased, he feared, not without hurt to the Universities. A clause of each Bill enacted that non-resident Fellows should not vote in College meeting except when they were outnumbered in the proportion of two to one by Fellows holding University or College office. A far larger proportion of the College and University officers were clergymen than of the non-residents, so that by these clauses the influence of the Church in the Colleges would be vastly increased. A Cambridge resident had written to him—

"Clause 53 will affect every College, for there is not one where the University and College officers absorb two-thirds of the Fellowships. Its effect will be to secure, not only a clerical majority among the residents, but even a clerical representation of the non-residents, for lay non-residents will hold their Fellowships only for a limited time, and hence, under the new statutes, choice by seniority will in all probability mean choice of clerics."

If he might state a case in point—the society to which he had had the honour to belong, that of the Master, Fellows and Scholars, of Trinity Hall, was a lay foundation. The effect of Clause 53 would be to clericalize it. Why were the meetings of Colleges dealt with by the Bills, and not the meetings of the Universities? There had been no outcry for the reform of College meeting—there had been a great outcry for the reform of Convocation, Congregation, Senate, and Electoral Roll. The government of Colleges was at present chiefly under lay influence. The government of the Universities was chiefly under clerical influence. The Bills clericalized the government of Colleges which was at present lay, and left the clerical government of the Universities untouched. Non-resident Fellows were to be prevented from voting at the meeting of their own College, the affairs of which they thoroughly understood. No attention was paid by the promoters of the Bill to the long-existing and reasonable dissatisfaction felt by all but a few reactionary residents at the swamping of the votes of the residents of both parties in Convocation and Senate by the votes of the hastily whipped-up "country clergy" of Oxfordshire, or "Fen Parsons" of the Isle of Ely. Let them take for an example of the evils which cried for remedy that which had occurred at Oxford just before their last debate, when the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching, itself composed of leading members of the Universities, asked Oxford, Cambridge, and London each to elect three persons to a joint board of management. Oxford was asked to allow three Members of Convocation to be nominated by the Vice Chancellor and Proctors. Professor Burrows was offended. The "country clergy" had been summoned by the crack of his "whip," and the grace rejected on the characteristic ground that the University of London, with which Oxford was thus to be associated, was a secular institution. He admitted that the Bills before them had the support of a majority of the residents. It was natural that this should be so. The residents would receive from the Bills vast advantages in money and in dignity. The sweeping away of Fellowships, the "Increase of the Professoriate," and the "Endowment of Research," meant the spending among the residents of fresh funds. The married residents were, of course, in favour of a scheme which gave not only increased income to themselves, but also a future to their sons. Doubtless some experiment in this direction must be made; but he prayed them to make it but an experiment at first. These Bills did not make it an experiment. They gave to Mr. Burgon and his Colleagues power to spend, if they would, the whole of the revenues of the Universities upon the residents. They might, if they would, put down every non-teaching Fellowship at one blow, and many residents would urge them thus to act. He had tried to show how much good these Fellowships had done. Let them pause before consenting that they should be swept away. Let them shorten their tenure if they would. To destroy them would be to put an end to the most democratic institution in modern England, but democratic in the best sense; democratic in that sense in which democracy and aristocracy were one—one in the triumph of the principle of merit. They were obtainable by merit only, and not by favour, and they gave a chance in life to poor men. These Fellowships it was that had enabled barbers' sons and tailors' sons to become Judges and Lord Chancellors. Their abolition would involve this consequence—that middle-class schools would cease at once to send to the Universities the picked poor boys of England. Every schoolmaster in England was opposed to their abolition. It might be said that that opposition was interested. Not so interested as was the support given by residents to the endowment of Research. Both might be, and were, as he hoped and believed, honest. Let them tell the Commissioners what it was that they wanted them to do. If they wished them to make dozens of new Professors to lecture to empty benches, let them say so; but let them not hand over the whole future of the Universities to the Commission without a guide. He had made these remarks, which he believed to be not only true, but also necessary, without the least heat against the proposers of the Bills in that House. Had they before them only the speeches of the two right hon. Gentlemen opposite, his remarks would not have been made. But they had the Bills themselves, vague and mysterious, and they had the random reckless speeches of a certain noble Marquess in "another place." He would ask those two right hon. Gentlemen to whom he referred to believe that those who were members of the two great Universities, on whichever side of the House they sat, had but one desire—namely, to so legislate that the glories of those Universities might be maintained in the future at their present height, even if it were not possible that they should receive increase.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in view of the large legislative powers entrusted to the University of Cambridge Commissioners by this Bill, this House is of opinion that the Bill does not sufficiently declare or define the principles and scope of the changes which such Commissioners are empowered to make in that University and the Colleges therein,"—(Sir Charles W. Dilke),

—instead thereof.

MR. FORSYTH, in supporting the second reading of the Bill, said, he hardly knew whether he ought to consider the speech of the hon. Baronet who had just sat down as one in opposition to the Bill or not, because as to a greater part of that speech he entirely agreed with the hon. Member; and, in fact, all that the hon. Member desired could be carried out by the introduction of clauses, which might be proposed in Committee. He would remind the House that, under the measure of 1856, undefined powers were, as in the present instance, given to the Commissioners, and it was absolutely necessary they should be entrusted with those powers if the scheme committed to their hands was to be advantageously worked out. He might further observe that as each College would, under the operation of the Bill, be represented by three Commissioners, there was very little danger that any rash project would be sanctioned in opposition to their wishes. There was, he was happy to say, the additional safeguard that the names of the Commissioners themselves were universally approved, and he was quite sure they never would be subjected to that sort of criticism in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) had indulged with respect to those who were to be Commissioners under the Oxford University Bill. The two main objects of the Bill were, first, to divert a certain portion of the College funds for the purpose of increasing the stipends of the present Professors, of creating new Professorships, and for the endowment of Research; secondly, to make provision as to the eligibility and tenure of Fellowships. It was well, he thought, that the Commissioners should be made aware what were the views of hon. Members on both sides of the House as to the nature of the functions they would have to perform, and the true theory of what an English University really ought to be, for upon that point some strange and startling doctrines had lately been propounded by some writers of great ability, who seemed to think nothing of the Tutor, but much of the Professor. What they desired to see was a body of men maintained who should pass their lives in learned research, and by writing books and other means contribute to the advance of human knowledge. Now that he, for one, believed to be an erroneous idea of an University, which he contended should not only be a place of education, but a place of discipline, in which young men might be trained up in habits of religion and order. The proposal which had been made to increase the Professoriate by the addition of no less than 35 new Professorships to the existing Staff was a startling proposal. He should like, he might add, to know how many pupils some of those new Professors who were spoken of were likely to obtain, and whether there was not the danger to be guarded against that there might be men receiving £500 a-year who would have no classes, and who would sink into a life of idleness and ease, unless they felt compelled by some strong moral principle to write a book for the purpose of enlightening the world. For his own part, he thought nothing could be more mischievous than that the minds of young men should be dissipated in a great variety of subjects; and he, therefore, hoped the Commissioners would be very cautious in increasing unduly the number of Professorships, and taxing the Colleges in any such degree as to imperil their usefulness. With regard to the tenure of Fellowships he thought that it was a most improper thing to make it a condition of any Fellowship that the holder should take Holy Orders. Many young men accepted that condition rashly, but repented it when they came of mature age. There was no case more pitiable than that of a clergyman who, after holding a Fellowship for 25 or 30 years, was presented to a College living without possessing any knowledge whatever of his parochial duties. He knew of a case, when he was at the University, where a Fellow advanced in years obtained a College living, and when a poor woman came to him in a state of spiritual distress to consult him, he told her to get some string and make cabbage-nets, which he said was his own resource when he fell into low spirits. There was at Cambridge a strong opinion, which he himself shared, that no one with the exception of persons who had been long engaged in the teaching work of the University, should be permitted to retain a Fellowship for a longer period than seven years after taking his M.A. degree. Then young men would get a fair start in life, and there would not be temptations to sloth, idleness, and indolence hereafter. The discussion of the Oxford Bill had shown that the House was not going to offer any serious opposition to this Bill; and therefore he advised his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea to endeavour to carry out the objects he had in view by proposing new clauses and Amendments when they got into Committee, rather than endeavour now to impede the progress of a measure, which he believed his hon. Friend in his heart thought was a good Bill.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: In addressing the House I must admit that I am an outer barbarian, for I have never enjoyed the advantages of an English University education. But perhaps this fact enables me to look upon these Bills with a less partial eye than some of my Liberal Friends who have addressed the House. In fact, I have heard no Liberal speeches from this side. The Secretary for War (Mr. Hardy) did make a Liberal speech; but when my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbigh County (Mr. Osborne Morgan) and my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) spoke, I did not recognize my Radical friends under their University toga. They seemed to me to forget that these Bills reach further than Oxford or Cambridge, for they involve far wider interests in their bearing on national education and on the advancement of science and learning. With revenues amounting to about £750,000, Oxford and Cambridge have serious responsibilities to the nation. If hitherto their benefits have been enjoyed more by the rich than by the poor, that is a misfortune due rather to their system of education than to their intentions, for they have sought by their Scholarships and Fellowships to bring their advantages within the reach of both classes. Have they succeeded in this laudable desire? Allow me to give the answer to this question by the only quotation which I propose to make. It is from a work by a high Oxford authority, the Rev. Mark Pattinson, Rector of Lincoln College, who says—

“Class education would seem to me to be as rooted an idea in the English mind as denominational religion. But if the Universities are only schools for the wealthy classes, why should they enjoy a large national endowment? Why should the nation, out of its national endowment fund, provide gratuitous education for the sons of precisely that class which is best able to pay for whatever education it may think proper to have?”

These questions lie at the root of the whole matter. Either these Bills are good because they complete the national character of our Universities, or they are bad because they continue to limit their advantages to a class of wealthy men and to the poor who win Scholarships. Now, in the speech which I make, I know that I am not in unison with the feeling of the House. Among its Members are no fewer than 225 men who have been trained in and who love their Universities. Upon them my remarks will fall like grating discords on the ears of a musical audience. To them Oxford and Cambridge appear as the highest types of Universities. But whether they are better or worse than others, there is no doubt that they are exceptional. This arises from the fact that they aim to give mental culture for its own sake and without reference to the utilities of life. And doubtless this is a high conception of University training. Other Universities also have a high purpose, but not such an unselfish ideal of education. European Universities generally, perhaps even in their origin, but certainly in their operations, aim at infusing liberal education into the various learned professions and scientific industrial occupations. In this respect they differ from ordinary technical schools, which look only to professional training; while the Universities, such as those of Scotland and Germany, unite technical training with mental culture. They thus try to mellow the professional and industrial life of a country. Now, I readily admit that the Oxford and Cambridge system of imparting culture for its own sake is the most noble and unselfish, though it is obviously more adapted to the wealthy than to the middle and poorer classes of society. As the latter require to enter professions or industries, they cannot afford to stay at Universities in which honours are only to be won at 21 or 22 years of age, for by that time their technical training ought to be ended. It was this want of consonance between the English University system and the needs of the middle classes which produced their decadence previous to 1854. The Commission of that year largely extended their benefits. They opened up new Scholarships and Fellowships to induce the middle classes to take the educational commodities which the Universities had to offer. These Scholarships are bounties of £80 a-year for boys who pass a good school examination, and who are wealthy enough to stay long at school. They are wages given to young men mainly to learn Greek, Latin, and Mathematics; for the few Scholarships given to other subjects are too insignificant in number to demand attention. After 1854, when this stimulus was applied, Undergraduates increased in number, just in proportion as the Scholarships were augmented in number and money value. A few years ago, one out of every three of the Undergraduates was paid for his attendance; and even now, one out of four is in this position of a paid scholar. Why should this be necessary for Oxford and Cambridge? In Germany, in France, in Ireland, and in Scotland, students go to Universities without being paid. They go to acquire knowledge, which ought to be a commodity beyond all price. The reason is that in these Universities the preliminary culture is made to bear on the future occupations of the students, while in Oxford and Cambridge it has no such bearing. It is quite true that the education given at our English Universities is excellent in itself; but as it has no immediate bearing on the exigencies of professional life, the middle classes have to be tempted by strewing with gold the pathway which connects the school with the University. And this is only the beginning of the bounty system for study. In advance, these paid scholars see some 20 annual Fellowships offered for competition to those who spend three years and a-half at study in their Colleges. Out of 200 Fellowships given in the last 20 years, only 12 were for science, so that still the great preponderance of prize money is given for Greek, Latin, and Mathematics, and the general result is this, that Oxford and Cambridge give an annual endowment of £70,000 to lads for prospective Scholarships in these subjects, and £200,000 to graduates for their retrospective Scholarships. The latter are what the Marquess of Salisbury styles "idle Fellowships." Can they be made more nationally productive than they are at present? The Chancellor of Oxford University (the Marquess of Salisbury) and the right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Waipole) obviously think they can, or they would not have introduced their Bills. They look upon the Fellowship fund as one which can be drawn upon to strengthen the University without unduly weakening the Colleges. Are they right or wrong? Now, nothing is more certain in the academic experience of the world than that parents will send their children to Universities without money bribes if they can there acquire the learning suitable to their wants in life. Oxford and Cambridge have learned this by their outside experience. They have an admirable system of local examinations of school pupils in various provincial centres. They are eminently successful, and yet I do not think they have given a single reward of any kind either in money or in prizes. But they have adapted their examinations to the subjects which they find school boys and girls willing to learn. Why, then, should it be necessary to offer £270,000 a-year to entice young men to be educated when all other Universities are overflowing without money inducements, except of a very meagre kind? All this lavish expenditure of wealth has been insufficient for its purpose, for if it had been sufficient these Bills would not be before us. It so happens that we can make a comparison, because Oxford and Edinburgh have each nearly the same number of resident students, about 2,000. Now, Oxford has a net income of £400,000, and Edinburgh one of £23,000, and yet the number of their students is almost equal. It is clear, therefore, that wealth does not suffice to ensure Undergraduates. And as the standard for pass degrees in arts is admittedly as good in one as in the other, the result is startling. You cannot get rid of the fact by scoffing at Scotch Universities, as these Bills do in the 2nd clause, when they define them as "schools." The fact remains that the Scotch University in its poverty has not far from the same number of students and graduates as Oxford in its wealth. The explanation is that Oxford and Cambridge, having cut themselves adrift from the occupations of the people, must offer prize money for the educational commodities which they seek to give. And if I were to admit that this system is wise, I should agree with Lord Cardwell when he called Fellowship the primum mobile of the English University system. If Greek, Latin, and Mathematics are to continue to be the main higher food of the nation, to the practical exclusion of other kinds of food, Fellowships are the very life blood of the Universities, and you are making a most hazardous experiment when you pass these Bills. In my point of view, though I do not dream of getting the House to agree with me, any system of education is wrong when it results in making parents and their children look to Universities as places to gain money and not simply as places for acquiring knowledge. Nor do I pause to point out at any length the evils which the present Fellowship system has produced by converting the Universities into huge examining machines. I will only say that modern writers on higher education are nearly unanimous in thinking that incessant examinations enfeeble the spirit of research and arrest the progress of science in a nation. I would rather point to the fact, which ought to be significant to hon. Gentlemen opposite who profess to adhere to the wishes of pious founders, that Fellowships, as they are now given, are wholly different from their original purpose. By the old statutes, the degrees of doctor could only be got after from 13 to 19 years' study, and the object of Fellowships was to support men in the three faculties of theology, law, and medicine, till they got their doctor's degree. But with the exception of theology, the other professional faculties have become dwarfed in the Universities, and the Fellowships are now mere sinecures, without conditions either of personal study or the advancement of learning. It may be that the Commission of 1876 will attach these conditions to Fellowships in future. Certainly the Commission of 1854 failed to do so. All that it did was to make the Universities more efficient examining machines, and to render the Colleges more comfortable boarding schools for young men; though doubtless it laid the broader basis for other studies, which have been growing in the Universities, although they receive only the crumbs which fall from the rich tables loaded with classics and mathematics. These Bills will fulfil their purpose if they succeed in adapting the Universities to the needs of the nation, so that they may infuse a liberal education into those professions and industries which depend upon learning and science, which ought at the same time to have their boundaries advanced by the tutors and Professors who devote themselves to an academic life. I give full credit to the Government that these are the motives with which they seek new reforms. But they have so framed the Bills that we cannot tell either what they will do or what they will leave undone. For the Bills do nothing but put Parliament in commission. No doubt the Bills recite a catalogue of useful objects which the Commissioners may take up if they please; but legislatively we do nothing but shuffle off our powers of reform on seven distinguished gentlemen representing each University. Not one of them represents the outside interests of the nation. All of them have been bred in the system which they are called upon to reform. Not a single man of academic knowledge outside that system has been appointed to represent national or Imperial interests. The very same Government which introduces these Bills has within a few weeks issued a Royal Commission for the reform of the Scotch Universities. They have not shuffled off our powers on that Commission, but have desired it to report to Parliament. Nor have they made it an Edinburgh or Glasgow, or even a Scotch Commission. They have made it an Imperial one, and have put on such names as Huxley and Froude, men of academic knowledge, but having no permanent relations to Scotland or its Universities. But the Commissions under these Bills are not Imperial—they simply represent local interests. Cambridge men for Cambridge, and Oxford men for Oxford, constitute the whole Commission. No doubt they are eminent men, but all have been trained under a restricted system. And although they are constituted in this local and partial spirit, the Bills do not lay down any common lines of reform upon which the Colleges are to proceed. They are invited for a year to prepare schemes for their own reform in any separate and disjointed way they like, and with powerful representation of College interests within the Commission. Of course, I know the reply of the Government to such strictures as these is, that a like course was followed in 1854, and the Executive Commission then produced salutary reforms. But the position then and now is quite different. In 1852 a Royal Commission had made an exhaustive Report on the state of the Universities. The duty of the Executive Commission of 1854 was to remedy the abuses ascertained to exist and to alter statutes which were antiquated and obsolete. That is not our position now. There has been no previous inquiry, and there are no glaring abuses to rectify, nor obsolete statutes to repeal. If you believe that the present system is on the whole good, modifications in it could be better made by the University and Collegiate authorities than by a statutory Commission. It is one thing to reform obstructive corporations; it is another thing to direct the reforms of progressive corporations. The Universities are strongly progressive. They have opened new schools and new triposes, and are trying to adapt themselves to changing conditions of liberal culture. Radical changes in the system may be desired by some of us; but I have more confidence in getting these from the action of University reformers than from Commissions composed of men of a previous generation brought up in ancient lines of study. Such a Commission does not feel the want of contact with the people, which University teachers do feel. None of us wish to see Oxford and Cambridge converted into mere technical schools for professions. But we do desire to see them brought into harmony with the exigencies of professional and industrial life, so that the middle classes may again flock to them, as they once did, to receive that liberal culture which ought to be the basis of all the occupations of life. Though I do not think that the Commissions named in the Bills are likely to contribute much to this result, I quite admit that the Bills will do so in a way not contemplated by their framers. For if the Fellowship fund or Collegiate revenues be largely used to strengthen the University, the fictitious props which now uphold a restricted education will, to some extent at least, be knocked away. No doubt the first result will be to diminish students of these subjects; but this evil will soon be remedied if the curriculum of studies is varied so as to suit the many and not the few. Cambridge recognizes this weakness of her intra-academical curriculum by the wide extent of her teaching through a system of provincial lectures. She suits these to the varied wants of the people, and assures a splendid success without money bribes. My right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), as Chairman of the London Committee, promotes this extended curriculum in the provinces, and I hope he will soon be convinced that it would be wise to adapt it to the teaching and graduating system within the University. The pressure of this Bill will quicken the growth of this conviction within the University, and I hope the Commissions will not stunt this growth. If they would revert to the original statutes of the founders and connect the Fellowships with specific faculties of arts, theology, law, medicine, and science, much would be done to bring back the middle classes to the Universities. Of all the professional faculties one only now has a sensible proportion of Fellowships. The faculty of theology has certainly the lion's share. In both Universities the other professional faculties have now about a dozen Fellowships, while Oxford alone has more than 100 clerical Fellowships. I do not wish to see these entirely swept away, as some of my Friends propose on this side of the House, though I should like to see them reduced to some seemly proportion. It is obviously important that the ministers, I will not say of the Church of England alone, but of all Churches, should be induced to study at our great English Universities. It is better for them and for us that they should be brought up at a common University with laymen, than that they should be gathered apart in a mere technical school of priestcraft. Germany found the evil of this, and has been forced to compel her clergy to take a common University training before they learn the mere technics of their profession. Our Universities have saved us from this evil, at least so far as our national Church is concerned, and have first educated our clergy as citizens before they have become contracted into priests. I would ask my hon. Friends on this side to pause before they sweep away all clerical Fellowships. The Universities have already nearly driven away the other professions from their walls. We may make a further mistake if we drive out the clerical profession also, and divorce priestcraft from citizenship. I think the essence of our reforms should be to induce the professions to take their preliminary liberal culture at our Universities — not to cut them adrift as we have been doing in England. Of course, 110 clerical Fellowships at Oxford are altogether disproportionate, and form much too large an attraction to connect one profession with a University. Besides, they are not given to the clerical profession as a whole, but only to the clergy of the Church of England. I fail to see any justification for this limitation now that tests are abolished, and when the Universities are made national. If clerical Fellowships are to remain, is it unreasonable that they should be opened to all ministers of religion, of whatever creed? This is our practice in regard to theological degrees at the Scotch Universities. We give them simply for theological knowledge, not for theological belief. In like manner, clerical Fellowships might be given for distinction in the subjects included in theological learning. But that is not the motive for clerical Fellowships, even under their present restrictions to the English Church. A right rev. Prelate, the Bishop of Ely, advocated them on far narrower grounds. He argued that there was much difficulty even now in supplying parishes with clergymen, and urged if the clerical Fellowships were to be abolished, that difficulty would be greatly increased. I cannot conceive a more damaging argument for such Fellowships. If the Church of England cannot attract to its service learned and religious men except by University bribes, the Church is in a far more dangerous state than I believe it to be. Clerical Fellowships can only be defended, like other professional Fellowships, or those for philology and science, on the ground that it is desirable to encourage a profound study of the learning embraced in them, and in the hope that they may even conduce to the advancement of the boundaries of learning and science. Although my opinions are not in unison with those of the many University-trained men in this House, I have ventured to express them because this is the only occasion on which Members of Parliament can influence English University reform. We, under the guidance of a Ministry strong in the numbers of their followers, are about to put Parliament into commission in the reform of our English Universities. The Commissioners who absorb our legislative and reforming powers are men attached to the existing system. They may prune and trim the straggling branches, but they are not likely to plough up new ground or to sow new crops for the feeding of the nation. Parliament confers upon them a trust which is solemn and important, for it certainly determines the position of our higher education for a whole generation. They can best fulfil their trust if they extend the advantages of the Universities to all classes which are capable of benefiting by them. They can do this if they develop their teaching power not only in the direction of the learning of the past, but also in that of the present. It is in this development of teaching both literature and science that we must look for a corrective of the evils of excessive examination, which palsies University life in every part of the country. The examination system forced by a stimulus of reward, which we inherit from the Jesuit fathers, has, in its excessive application, destroyed originality in France, and it is fast destroying it in this country. Our Universities are intended for education, and are not places such as my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) would make them, something like the Scotch Fishery Board, which brands herrings of various qualities, just as my right hon. Friend would brand students, B.A. for low quality, M.A. for the same more mature, and D. for superior quality. A University, in its true and not Chinese sense, is a place of Education. And always keeping this in view, I do not care to join in the movement for diverting its funds to the endowment of research unconnected with educational duties. It is quite true that the means for teaching practical science in the English Universities is, in various sciences, quite insufficient, and that laboratories and museums require development, but these are educational agencies. If the Universities will only give fair play to modern as well as to ancient knowledge, not only by efficient teaching but also by a fair proportion of prize Fellowships and Scholarships, research will follow as surely as fruit follows the sowing of the seed. When the Commissions have helped Oxford and Cambridge to adjust their curriculum to modern needs, the Universities will, as they once did, spread their influence over the whole nation, which will again send its poorer sons to them for the knowledge which they give and not for the gold which they offer. But that is rather an aspiration than a belief, for I have little confidence that the Commissions named in the Bills will produce such a result. And so I shall see without a sigh these Bills sacrificed in the impending Slaughter of the Innocents, which must soon be announced to us at this period of the Session.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: I must express great pleasure at the line which the debate has taken this evening. In the position of honourable responsibility of watching the interests of the great University which is the subject of the present debate, I should be unworthy of the trust reposed in me if I regarded the question with any reference to the side of the House on which I happen to sit. This is emphatically a question in relation to which Party politics must be put out of sight, with a view to promote the real and permanent good of those great institutions, the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford. Under these circumstances, I may fairly say that, after much reflection, after considering the matter from many points of view, after having tried as far as I could to master what other people, for whose opinions I entertain respect, have to say about it, my desire and my hope is that the Bill now before the House should become law. I do not consider it to be incumbent upon me to argue whether or not it is cast in the best shape. The question is—taking the Bill as it is, the public discussion which has taken place throughout the country, and the debate of to-night—ought the Bill to go forward or not? In my opinion it ought to go forward; and I think it will go forward with as much general acquiescence, I will not say enthusiastic acquiescence, on the part of this House, as any measure could be reasonably expected to receive; and from that general acquiescence I will not except even my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), to whose temperate, well-argued, and thoughtful speech I have listened with much pleasure. My hon. Friend criticized the Bill freely, not unfriendly; but the upshot of his criticisms was rather, in the first place, to throw out suggestions of Amendments which might well be considered in Committee, and thus to give hints to the Commissioners as to the use of their powers in re-constituting the Universities in the most satisfactory manner. It appears to me that the drift of the discussions which have taken place tends far more to a wise and cautious, than a reckless way of dealing with those institutions. Much weight has been attached to words—sharp, trenchant, and epigrammatic—which have been uttered in “another place.” Well, what was behind those words, what it was that led to them, I suppose we do not know, and have no right to ask. But I should argue the other way, and instead of fearing that those words were intended to govern the Bill, I should rather suppose them to be an ebullition of original genius than a key which was to unlock a cabalistic mystery. I come now to a speech to which I listened with much interest and not a little astonishment; I mean the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the two Universities North of the Tweed, Edinburgh and St. Andrews (Mr. Lyon Playfair). I shall not hurt his susceptibilities by calling them anything else than Universities. I shall call them persistently the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews; but I must ask the right hon. Gentleman in return, as a favour, not to call Eton, Harrow, or Rugby, Universities. They are schools, while, like Edinburgh and St. Andrews, they carry out the useful task of educating a large portion of the community, at an age when they have ceased to be boys, and have hardly become men. We need not, however, quarrel over names. But the right hon. Gentleman exhibited so many flashes of chaotic acuteness, and at times seemed so much to appreciate, to understand and to relish the system of our old Universities, that I believe if he had known more about them he would have spoken in a much less critical spirit. All

I can say is, that having a knowledge much less of the Scotch Universities than he has of the English, I do not think that, if I have ventured to speak on a Scotch University Bill, I should have approximated to facts as often as he has done. The right hon. Gentleman started with the assertion that the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford are the holders to an enormous amount of national funds. Now, whatever else their funds may be, national funds are the one thing which they cannot be termed. University Professorships, College Fellowships, Scholarships, Bedelships, prizes, everything, in fact, in the Universities that carries emolument with it, are either paid for out of private endowment, or by current fees. True, the objects of the Universities are national; but to lay down the principle that they are national institutions, sustained by national funds, is to incapacitate yourself from carrying out consistently any well-matured scheme of reform, simply because you misapprehend the body with which you are dealing. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that Cambridge and Oxford are unlike the Scotch Universities, inasmuch as they are institutions for the upper classes, and do not educate the middle and poorer classes. Upon that I take issue with him; but I am sorry to say that I cannot support my argument by full reference to specific facts which, but for conventional scruples, I might bring forward in connection with particular names. Were it not for such considerations, I might designate many distinguished persons, now alive, or who have but lately passed away, who by their honourable struggles raised themselves from humble positions to places of trust and honour, first in the Universities, and then in the Church or in the State, or in the universal republic of literature and science. If I could with propriety reveal these facts, well known as they are to those who are intimate with University life, I think there would be an answer more than complete to the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman, which I am sure he will be the first to regret having made when he looks to-morrow into the columns of some daily paper at what he has said to-night. I do not deny that the Scotch Universities do educate the middle and poorer classes; I believe that they do. But, perhaps, the difference between the Universities of the two countries is this—that the Scotch Universities, with their Professorships and spacious lecture-rooms, take up the members of the middle and lower classes, educate them, and leave them members of the middle and poorer classes still; whereas Cambridge and Oxford take the same classes, and by their system of prizes, Scholarships, Fellowships, examinations and discipline by their tutorships of which the results are known to the world, raise them to the ranks of that best of aristocracies, the aristocracy of respect, of influence, and of power. But the right hon. Gentleman then went on to inquire what can you do with institutions that will not give a man honours until he is of the age of 23 or 24. No doubt, I will grant it, that we have a complaint at Cambridge now and then, though it may be a fictitious complaint in the sense of that assertion. It is that gentlemen are apt to come to Cambridge from those counties of the United Kingdom which lie north of the Tweed and do not take honours till they are 23 or 24 years of age, so that the indigenous Englishman who goes up for honours at 21 or 22 is apt to find himself over-weighted when pitted against gentlemen who have already graduated and taken honours in institutions which we are forbidden to call schools. So far, and only so far, as that, is there some foundation for this charge of the right hon. Gentleman. Let me now look at this Commission. The first name in the list is that of a Senior Wrangler, the Bishop of Worcester, and he was Senior Wrangler at, I believe, 21, while I know that the man who was Second Wrangler on that examination, and who on the subsequent and co-equal examination for the “Smith’s Prizes” beat him, was only 21; that man is now Duke of Devonshire, Chancellor of the University of Cambridge. The second name on the Commission is that of Lord Rayleigh, and he, too, was Senior Wrangler at 21. So much, then, for the assertion that the highest honours cannot be got before the age of 23 or 24.

Again, the right hon. Gentleman talked of the “Fellowship fund.” He talked of Fellowships as if they were doles, and as if some mysterious authority wrapped up sovereigns in paper, which were then handed out to those gentlemen of 23 or 24 after passing their examinations. The idea of a Fellowship, as incorporating a man into a great and honourable society, as a profession, as a distinction, a sort of cordon bleu, involving work and responsibility, had not occurred to the right hon. Gentleman; and without this conception of the institution of Fellowships; without the idea of its being—I will not flinch from using the word—a “caste,” but a caste of the highest and most useful sort, and like the mediæval order of knighthood carrying duties and obligations with it; without this idea of a Fellowship—which is the idea of our Universities in fact and in deed, but which the right hon. Gentleman showed by his speech of to-night that he cannot realize—he cannot adequately deal with the constitution of our Universities. His one idea of a Fellowship seemed to be that it was given only for proficiency in Greek, Latin, and Mathematics. Has the right hon. Gentleman never heard that Trinity College has given Fellowships for Natural Science? Does he not know that one of the most distinguished Oriental scholars in Europe is a gentleman who rose from a quiet and obscure position to his present eminence, and that he had a special Fellowship given him in the College of one of our Universities on the sole ground of his attainments in Oriental Scholarship? The fact is, that the qualifications for which the Colleges may give their Fellowships are in the hearts of the Colleges themselves. When the curriculum of studies was more contracted, naturally they were given in those branches of study which were then in vogue; but the area of study is ever widening, and as it widens there is no difficulty whatever in widening the conditions upon which a Fellowship is given also. They may be different in different Colleges. Some Colleges give their Fellowships on a specific examination. Others give them as a testimonial for exceptional proficiency. Others accept the test of the degree examination. No doubt the system of examinations may be, and I dare say is, carried too far sometimes; but I own I was startled to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh trace it to such an origin, and describe it as if it were the child of the Jesuits and the grandchild of the Chinese. I education of the laity. The result was, that Colleges and Universities carried out the work that was then wanted to be done—for no other institutions existed to carry it out—while no attempt was made to supply a want that was not yet known or felt—that of the literary education of the lay upper classes. Now-a-days, therefore, with our libraries and academies on the one hand, and on the other hand the absolute moral and physical necessity of education for the laity, this attempt to rout out those musty references to the 13th or 14th century in favour of these new experiments of modern progress is to shut your eyes to facts in a way that surprises me greatly. Reduce the laity of the present day to the position of the laity of the 13th or 14th century; abolish all the literary institutions and aids to learning in our great cities; and the advocates of the endowment of Research may have something to say for themselves. Until then I leave them to the criticisms of my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea. Research is a thing that you cannot endow systematically. Research makes itself. You may endow it indirectly by means of your Fellowships; but I am convinced that if you endow it directly, the endowment of Research would soon become the research of endowment on the part of speculative philosophers. Those words, no doubt, occur in the Bill, and have come into current talk. Indeed, there is an inevitable law affecting Parliamentary language, by which a word, however vague, obtains an illicit and provisional meaning when once it is used in an enacting clause; but I have too much faith in the gentlemen whose names are mentioned in the Bill as Commissioners to suppose that they will ever build up a wall by the endowment of Research to run their own heads against. On these general grounds, then, and trying to divest myself of any feeling of enthusiasm one way or the other, while endeavouring to look at the matter impartially, I trust that the Bill will not only be read a second time to-night—that is saying very little, for the state of these benches shows it to be impossible that it should not be read to-night—but that it will go through its other stages in the present Session. No doubt our Order Book is most painfully full of important matter. It is in reality an appalling document at this date in July; but the question of the Universities has been raised, and has excited a certain amount of alarm. That alarm has, however, now died away, and a moderate, a reasonable, and a practical interpretation has been put upon those proposals, which gives the assurance that they will be worked so as to carry out not what some people have said of them, but what they say of themselves; and I appeal to Her Majesty's Government, I appeal to all the Members of this House, to sacrifice a little time in completing this important work. If, when the Herodian decree goes forth, these Bills fall in the Massacre of the Innocents, an opportunity will be given for agitation throughout the Recess. They will be canvassed and questioned by the schools of thought, which are represented by the unlearned enthusiasm of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Andrew's and Edinburgh Universities. The fallacies which he has scattered broadcast to-night will be taken up by interested coteries, and the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford will be denounced as not national, but sectional and aristocratic institutions. A feeling will be raised which does not now exist, and the subject will be much more difficult to deal with next year. Therefore, I must make an earnest, a serious, and respectful appeal to my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government to endeavour to pass these Bills in the present Session. I am sure that he will pass them if he can. I know there are difficulties in the way; but they may be overcome by putting off, if necessary, other measures on the Order Book which do not ramify into those considerations of a moral order, out of which distemperature most certainly arises, and which can therefore better bear to be postponed.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the hon. and learned Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had said on a previous occasion that if some Rip Van Winkle could return to the English Universities he would no longer think they were the same places which they were 20 years ago. If some political Rip Van Winkle returned to this House and listened to the debates on the question now before it he would have a contrary impression, and believe that there had been no change at all in the relation of political parties. From the Liberal side of the

House had been heard little but allusions to ancient institutions, the objectionable character of change, the sacredness of existing interests, and alarm at the revolutionary character of the measure. The powers conferred on the Commissioners were said to be too large, unlimited, and ill-defined. But it must be recollected that definition almost implied limitation, and it was one of the faults of the Commission of 1854 that, partly owing to the limitation of its powers, it left many important questions entirely untouched. If there was any fault to be found with the powers conferred upon the Commissioners, it was that they were not large enough. For example, he could not see that under the Bill the Commissioners would be able to deal with the government of the University. As regarded the settlement of 1854, the burden of proof lay upon those who said that the Bill proposed to reverse it, and he had not as yet been able to hear such a proof even attempted. In his opinion, the Bill proposed to act in the spirit of the measure of 1854, while extending reforms in new directions. They were told that the noble Chancellor of the University of Oxford had uttered certain sentiments, and that it might be anticipated that the University Commissioners would act in the spirit of those sentiments. For himself, he would not say whether the sentiments attributed to the noble Marquess—for whom he entertained the highest respect—were or were not justifiable; but could it be supposed that the Commissioners would feel themselves bound to act in accordance with the language of a particular speech instead of remembering that their business was to hear evidence, and to act according to the facts brought under their notice? It would be equally logical to say that the Cambridge Commissioners would take their tone from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who proposed the second reading of the Bill, which had been said to be the exact opposite of the speech of the noble Marquess. He would now observe on some observations which had fallen from particular Members. The noble Lord the Member for Bury (Lord Francis Hervey) seemed to suggest that if the University wanted money they might make it by increasing the revenue of the University Press, the funds of which he said were wasted in publishing inferior educational work of an elementary kind. It was not his business to defend the University Press at Oxford, more especially as the facts and figures of the noble Lord had since been declared to be imperfect and misleading. He believed, however, he might say that the publications of the University Press bore a high character, and that in associating itself with the general education of the country, it had taken a step which would meet with general approval. In regard to the composition of the Commission, without thinking it necessary to adopt every statement that had been made about individuals, he could not help feeling that his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) expressed a general feeling when he attacked the composition of the Oxford Commission, and he rejoiced to think that the Cambridge Commissioners were so different a body. He would suggest to the Government that they should insert the Cambridge Commissioners into the Oxford Bill, and he assured them that Cambridge would not ask for reciprocity. He hoped that in any case the Government would allow two more names to be added to the Commission—names such as those of Lord Cardwell and Professor Henry Smith. The observations of the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge reminded him of Lord Chatham's saying that England had withstood the Roman invasion, the Danish invasion, and the Norman invasion, but he doubted whether she would be able to withstand the Scotch invasion. In the case of those who competed for the highest University honours, he thought it was not just that men should be kept back for the special purpose of competition. He considered that a certain limit of age should be fixed, for there were cases now when men competed who were nearer 30 than 20 years of age. By endowment of Research he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) should understand something of this kind—that funds might be expended on the promotion of special studies by the University, the building of laboratories, and the purchase of apparatus. Surplus money could in that way be profitably applied. Certain Colleges might, with advantage, devote themselves to special branches of learning or science. The main features of the Bill he cordially approved. What were the circumstances which had caused a demand to arise for University reform? They were these:—Under the old system a successful candidate for a Fellowship frequently took Orders, which enabled him to hold his Fellowship for a considerable period, during which he did College work, and at the end of which he took a living. The livings acted as a retirement fund. A considerable degree of permanence was thereby secured to the teaching career at the University. Now, however, owing to a variety of reasons upon which it was unnecessary to enter, great reluctance existed among the Fellows of Colleges to take Holy Orders. They consequently had to resign their Fellowships at the end of a limited number of years, and they could not take College livings. There was consequently no permanence in the teaching career, and considerable difficulty was found, owing to the competition of other professions, to induce men to devote themselves to an educational career, and the double evil existed of teachers holding office for very brief periods and never gaining experience, and of the teachers themselves being selected from a more limited area. Another great change had also of late years come over the University. He alluded to the introduction of modern studies, and especially of natural science, which had brought with it great needs in the way of apparatus, laboratories, and buildings. Teachers were wanted for these subjects, for modern philosophy, and modern history, not to mention other subjects, as well as for the ancient languages and mathematics. At the same time, there had been an actual increase in the number of Undergraduates at the University—that was to say, of persons wishing to be taught, and the University even proposed to carry its work beyond its own walls into the large towns. Thus it might be said that a great increase in the educational demand had coincided with a great diminution of the educational supply. There was yet another evil which the changes to which he had alluded made more conspicuous. Each College formally professed to be able to give a complete education with its own staff. There was always a great waste of educational power, because men might be found teaching the same subjects at the same time at two different Colleges; but the weakness of this system became doubly apparent when the number of subjects to be taught increased. He hoped he had now shown that to give permanence to the teaching career and to organize the teaching body in all the various branches of study and research were the two main objects of University reform. In order to accomplish these ends it would be necessary to abolish the artificial restraints, of whatever character, which hampered the educational career. He might add, in addition to what he had said on the subject of clerical restrictions, that the Commissioners would probably have to consider how far they might be able to relax the rule which made celibacy a condition of retaining a Fellowship. In order that the teaching body should be more efficiently organized, it would be necessary to take further steps in the direction of bringing the teachers of various branches of study into communication with each other, and filling up any gaps which might exist in the present system. It was only natural that the University which largely represented the Colleges, and at the same time was independent of them, should take the lead in this reform. The University of Cambridge had recently appointed a Syndicate to consider the question, and the report of that Syndicate was before the House.

“It is evident,” that Report said, that “considerable additional teaching power is required in most departments of University study. Without entering, however, upon a detailed examination of the requirements specified by the Boards of Study, the Syndicate think that these requirements may be partially met (1) by an improved organization of the present Inter-Collegiate system; and (2) by the establishment of a new class of University teachers. There shall be held once a-year, or oftener, if the Boards think it desirable, a conference of the Professors, University Readers, and recognized Inter-Collegiate Lecturers in each branch of study, for the purpose of arranging a plan of combined action in teaching, and of considering and determining a scheme of lectures, such scheme to be submitted to the Board, and if approved by it published at the beginning of the academical year by its authority.”

Of a similar character were two of the recommendations of a Memorial addressed to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli). That Memorial recommended that a permanent professional career should be, as far as possible, secured to resident educators and students, whether married or not; that provision should be made for the association of the Colleges, or of some of them, for educational purposes, so as to secure more efficient teaching, and to allow the teachers more leisure for private study. In order, however, that the University should be able to play its proper part, it was necessary that the University should be independent. As matters now stood, the Colleges were rich and the Universities poor—the Colleges powerful and the Universities weak. In an early period of history the University had been independent; but probably owing to their superior wealth the Colleges had gradually got the upper hand, till at last nobody who did not belong to the Colleges was allowed to become an Undergraduate. The Act of 1854 had taken the first step in emancipating the University. The introduction of non-collegiate students was another step in the same direction. It was now necessary to go further. Hence the third recommendation of the Memorial—that the pecuniary and other relations existing between the University and the Colleges should be revised. Such, then, were the main objects of University Reform and the means of attaining those objects in the opinion of those persons most competent to judge. The question remained—from what sources could funds be obtained for the University? He himself would propose that they should at once abolish that comparatively useless position of Heads of Houses. He believed it could be shown that after making provision for the discharge of the necessary duties now performed by them, at least £15,000 a-year would remain. At Oxford, All Souls' College might, with advantage, be wound up, and its funds transferred to the University. At Cambridge a similar course might be pursued with Sydney College. He now approached the question of Fellowships, as to which so much had been said, and such contradictory opinions expressed. He also felt that a great deal of unjust prejudice had been created against the non-resident Fellows by a small body of their number who, imitating the language of Oriental romance, in which people were described as the "Light of the Harem," and the "Glory of the Flower Garden," had described themselves as the "Light of the Bar Mess," the "Glory of the Country Vicarage," and the "Chief Support of Periodical Literature." That language had been expressly disowned by other non-resident Fellows, and he trusted the House would not allow itself to be prejudiced by it. There could be no doubt that there was a question connected with these Fellowships, and it was precisely one of those best left to a Commission which could examine it in detail; and, considering that these schemes could be canvassed if necessary in Parliament, the non-resident Fellows might probably rest assured that no injustice would be done them. A certain number of non-resident Fellowships might either be abolished or all the Fellowships, resident and non-resident alike, might be taxed for University purposes. He approached the question himself with diffidence. Many of his own most intimate friends were non-resident Fellows, and it was difficult not to be influenced, even if unconsciously, by the circumstance. Again, it was impossible not to feel that there was a great deal to be said for as well as against the non-resident system. It served to a certain extent as a link between rich and poor, and it helped to keep up a high standard of education by increasing competition. On the other hand, it might fairly be argued that the educational needs of the University and the Colleges ought to be the first charge on University and Collegiate funds; that for one career outside the University which a non-resident Fellowship might be the means of opening to a poor man, the foundation of an educational post inside the University, with the funds appropriated from a Fellowship, would open another, and that more could be done for poor men by cheapening the cost of education generally within the University than by throwing down a certain number of salaries to be scrambled for by the ablest men, who often were very well off pecuniarily. He now asked himself, did the Bill make it possible to organize study, to give permanence to the teaching staff, to alter the pecuniary relations of the University and the Colleges? The 15th and 16th clauses, which were the enacting clauses of the Bill, evidently did. These were the clauses of the most importance, and he believed they did most of what was required. He might regret that the abolition of clerical Fellowships was left to the Commissioners' discretion instead of being expressly directed; he might regret that the powers of clerical visitors were left untouched; he might wonder what object there was in giving the Archbishop of Canterbury an ex-officio connection with or rather control over the Universities which he did not now possess; he might wish the Bill recognized the great work being done by the Universities in the large towns. But those were subordinate points; and having now gone through the preliminary objections to the measure and shown that they were either based upon a misconception of facts or sprang from Conservative ideas with which he had no sympathy, having also shown that the condition of the University required reform and that the Bill promised the reform needed, he would leave it to the House to judge whether it would not do wisely to urge on the Government to proceed with that measure which they could easily pass, and not allow it to be lost in the sands of July.

MR. MARTEN, as representing a constituency largely interested in this subject and as having formerly been a Fellow of one of the Colleges of Cambridge University, wished to make a few observations on the question. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) had objected to such large powers being conferred upon the Commissioners. He quite admitted that the House should regard with great jealousy large and indefinite powers being given to any body of Commissioners; but, on the other hand, the powers so given must vary with the circumstances of each case. It should not be forgotten that one Commission had already exercised very large powers with regard to the Universities to the thorough satisfaction of Parliament, and that the powers given by the present measure were restricted by very efficient safeguards. The House might therefore entrust the Commissioners with these great powers in the full assurance that if they came to any decision which was open to question it would, in the first instance, be considered by the Universities Committee and afterwards by Parliament. The composition of the Commission itself formed an important element in determining the question, especially when it was remembered that the members of the Commission were unexceptionable, and that each College had the right to send one Commissioner to protect its interests. An entirely new Governing Body of the Colleges, including the Fellows and graduates, was constituted by the Bill. This new Governing Body would have power to make regulations which would have the same effect as though they had been made by the Commissioners; but in this connection it was important to remember that in the University of Cambridge the ordinary government of each College was left in the hands of the Master, and the Senior Fellows, which last must have arrived at the standing of Masters of Arts. In this Bill, as it stood, there was no restriction, nor was there any rule laid down either as to the date at which the annual or other meetings of the Governing Bodies should be held, or the notices which should be given of the business to be brought forward. These were points on which he thought distinct rules ought to be laid down, and when the Bill reached the Committee stage he should be prepared to move Amendments tending in this direction. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) had made several important suggestions in reference to the Bill; but he had gone a little astray in complaining, as a grievance, that the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's were described in the Bill as "schools" merely. The same observation applied to the University of Oxford, as described in the Cambridge Bill; and, though he had no absolute knowledge on the point, he had little doubt that a similar remark would apply to the Oxford Bill. Furthermore, the right hon. Gentleman had stated that in the English Universities the facilities for education were confined to the rich classes; but, as a matter of fact, sizarships were in existence at Cambridge, by means of which many poor men had been educated, and some of them had afterwards risen to positions of high distinction. As to the question of age the right hon. Gentleman had been misled, for the Minor scholarships were confined to students under 20. The right hon. Gentleman also spoke of the enormous bribe which was needed to maintain the study of Greek and Latin, and suggested that young men flocked to the University for the purpose of obtaining the gold which he said was lavishly scattered about. It was true that a great many students could not afford to go to the University if it were not for the Scholarships and Fellowships; but he could say with the greatest confidence of successful students that they prized more than anything else the honour obtained in open competition. The right hon. Gentleman could not have seen all the laboratories, as in some Colleges they were excellent. The subject of research had been magnified far beyond what it deserved. Those who were advocates for the endowment of research were only reproducing the idea of "idle" Fellowships. Why had such Fellowships been founded? Not for the purpose of teaching, but in order that learned persons might, with a modest endowment, have sufficient leisure for pursuing general research. Then, as regarded non-resident Fellows, the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) said that those who were late Fellows would be in favour of those Fellowships. Not only would late Fellows, but all, he thought, who had experienced the benefit of that particular system would be slow to advocate its total abolition. A University was a comprehensive and many-sided institution, and one limb could not be removed without serious risk of injury to the efficiency of the whole body; and non-resident Fellows presented this advantage, that when they come up to College they maintained their relations with it and brought the leaven of active life to those remaining at College and labouring in the ordinary work of tuition, to the great advantage of the College. Then, again, the noble Lord had suggested the total abolition of the Heads of Houses. That was a proposition which certainly ought not to be adopted without mature consideration. Although the Heads of Houses had comparatively little duties to perform, they had great responsibilities in respect of the government and management of the Colleges, and they were by no means idle men; on the contrary, they were among the hardest-worked men of the University. If they abolished the Heads of Houses they should provide some other means of government, and should probably resort to elected and annual governors, a system which answered very well in municipal corporations, but would not, he thought, be suited to a University. It was desirable that University Scholarships should be increased. The proposal that power should be given to the Colleges to lend money to the Universities was one which would be gladly accepted. There was one thing the Colleges would be very willing to lend money to the University for—namely, for necessary buildings, and also for any other purposes which might be approved. For his part, he hoped the Bill would become law this Session, because he was certain that, at least so far as Cambridge was concerned, it would give entire satisfaction. Whatever difference of opinion there might be as to the mode in which the various changes proposed might ultimately be carried out, it was felt that the Bills were calculated to produce great advantage to the Universities, and through them to the progress of learning throughout the kingdom.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, before expressing any opinion even upon the larger features of the scheme of reform proposed by Her Majesty's Government for the University of Oxford, I wish to say that I approach the subject with a sincere desire to agree with as much and to disagree with as little of it as possible. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hardy) and I have voted in different Lobbies about Oxford affairs many a time, but not a few of the questions on which we voted have been settled; and as they were settled not in the way he wished, but in the way I wished, it is the more natural that on matters which do not involve differences of political principle I should be inclined to support him. Now, I understand that the essence of the Bill is that the revenues of the University and Colleges should be better distributed, with a view to the interest:—First, of religion; second, of education; third, of learning; fourth, of research: and that these objects should be effected by the agency of a Commission, selected not for the purpose of carrying out foregone conclusions, but simply for the purpose of making the best scheme which can be made, after a fair consideration of all relevant facts and opinions. If, Sir, that is the essence of the Bill, then I must claim to be thus far an ardent supporter. The problem before us seems to me this—Given the vast revenues of Oxford, how can they be distributed so as while you keep all that is best and most distinctive in Oxford, to engraft on it all that is best in the other leading Universities of the world? Now, the things most distinctive of Oxford are its charming situation, its buildings, its gardens, its great traditions, and its social life. As to them, all the supporters and all the opponents of the Bill will, I doubt not, be quite agreed. Then, again, there will practically be no difference as to the first object to which the revenues of the Universities and Colleges are, under this Bill, to be appropriated. Persons at Oxford and persons here may have all kinds of different views about religion; but I presume it is quite understood that no one intends by this measure, or any measure that may be substituted for it in its passage through Parliament, to make any change in the religious observances hitherto practised in Oxford. These, I understand, are by common consent to be left as they are, although we may have differences of opinion as to the relations of various offices to the Established Church, after the usual religious observances have been provided for.

MR. SPEAKER (interposing) said, that the Bill before the House referred to the government of the University of Cambridge, and it was not competent for the hon. Member to discuss the details of the Oxford Bill on the present occasion.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, that the House had agreed to the second reading of the Oxford Bill on the distinct understanding that the fullest opportunity would be given upon the Cambridge Bill for discussing all the matters that could have been debated on the Oxford measure.

Divergence of opinion and action will begin with the second head—that of education. It has long been said outside of Oxford, and has been very generally admitted in Oxford, that the education she gives deals too much with words and too little with things. There is no doubt that the Commission of a quarter of a century ago resulted in very considerable improvement in this as in other respects; but whereas the system in vogue before the changes of the last generation—changes of which that Commission was a part—erred in concentrating attention too much upon the text and contents of a limited number of books, the present system errs in encouraging too much a sophistical turn of mind and an over-ready power of making more or less clever observations upon many subjects connected with these books. The new schools would if they had had fair play have neutralized this tendency. But they never have had fair play, and it is the philosophical teaching of the University which gives, and has long given, the tone to the mind of the place—philosophy, or “science,” as it used invariably to be called in Oxford, meaning there merely the opinions of speculatists, chiefly about things with regard to which opinions vary continually, not a knowledge of the ascertained facts of the Universe, or any part of them. I am far from denying that this study as now pursued in Oxford is much more fruitful than it used to be 30 years ago; but, improved as it is, it still holds too large a place in her curriculum. This defect, which ramifies in a thousand directions, being hardly disputed, except by people who have grown up so completely under the influence of the present system as to have their mental vision distorted, I think the Government acted quite wisely in placing the duty of attending to the interests of education very high amongst the objects of the present Bill. But there are other defects in the present system of things at Oxford which are not less grave in themselves than the defects in her plan of education, and which re-act upon it with most mischievous results. She is doing far too little either for learning or research; in fact, she is doing so little for either of these that some people have really, it would seem, forgotten that their promotion is one of the main objects of a University worthy of the name. To think of a University merely as an educating body is altogether to lower the old conception, and nothing is more certain than that a University into which fresh streams of truth are being continually brought by the exertions of those who live in it, will be infinitely more successful than a University which gives its whole attention to teaching, for it is always the newest knowledge that is most stimulating. This defect, again, is admitted by most people who have the interests of the University at heart; and, again, I think the Government has done quite rightly in placing the interests of learning and research amongst those which it desired to advance by this Bill. Well then, how are these defects to be cured? To this I should reply—in order to cure these defects a great many changes must be made; and first, there must be a considerable increase to the Professoriate. It is to the last degree disgraceful that at such a University as Oxford any branch of human knowledge which is recognized by the other great Universities of the world should not be taught, excepting always branches of learning which have merely a local importance, or which there is some good reason for not teaching—as, for instance, from there being a place in the immediate neighbourhood where they are specially well taught. Why should Oxford strike her flag to Berlin or Heidelberg, or any other University on the face of the earth? Are they richer than she? Are they more dignified than she? Have they to minister to a nation which has more world-wide interests than ours? A noble Lord recently used as an illustration of useless Professorships—Professorships of Chinese and Slavonic. Sir, it seems to me difficult to speak with sufficient shame of a nation which has our position in Asia not having had till the other day a Professorship of Chinese in the wealthiest of its Universities. Did the noble Lord forget that China is inhabited by some 360,000,000 of men? that she has the oldest and most extraordinary civilization in the world; that we have commercial relations with her of great importance; and that a change that might at any time come about in the policy of that country might increase these relations quite enormously. Is there anyone who has given attention to the subject who will deny that it is possible that within the next 50 years the Chinese race may be playing a part of first-rate importance in the world? So much for the direct importance of Chinese; but is that all? Just listen to what one of the leading philologists in Oxford says on this very subject—

“The importance of Chinese,” says Mr. Sayce, “to the science of language need not be pointed out, nor the mass of literature described which its study has called forth; and yet those only who have devoted their attention to the science of language can have any idea of the loss occasioned to it at Oxford by the absence there of a Chair of Chinese. How much would not the Oxford students of language have given for an opportunity of questioning and listening to a Professor of Chinese, whom it has been left to the far-sightedness of some Liverpool merchants to call to the University.”

And Slavonic.—I only wish that we had had for many years back Professorships of more than one of the Slavonic languages. Perhaps, if we had had them, the present difficulties in the East would not be so perplexing as they are. I entreat anyone to whom such a remark may appear strange to turn to the collected works of one of the most brilliant and gifted of English scholars, the late Lord Strangford, a most devoted son of Oxford, and read the masterly, the admirable paper entitled Chaos, which deals with this very subject. People who talk as the noble Lord talked have surely not the faintest idea, either of the vastness of the field over which human knowledge extends, or of what other nations are doing in cultivating that field. Some time ago, Professor Max Müller was asked what Chairs should be founded in Oxford in connection with his own subject. To this question he replied, inter alia, as follows:—

“If it were wished to establish at Oxford a real School of Comparative Philology, the following Professorships would be necessary:—

1. A Professorship of the Teutonic languages;
2. A Professorship of the Celtic languages;
3. A Professorship of the Neo-Latin languages;
4. A Professorship of the Semitic languages, independent of the Professorship of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis;
5. A Professorship of Persian, including Zend;
6. A Professorship of the language and antiquities of Egypt;
7. A Professorship of Chinese, coupled, if possible, with Tartaric and Mongolic.”

[Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh, and very naturally; but we are dealing with University affairs, and we must introduce words and subjects very unfamiliar to our usual debates. Mr. Max Müller goes on to observe—

“Such a Staff, though it may seem large, exists in almost every University in France, Germany, and even Russia, the Professor being expected not only to teach and prepare pupils for examination, but to inspire them with a love of special subjects, to carry on the work handed down by former generations, and to increase as much as possible the inherited capital of knowledge by means of original research.”

Now, I beg the House to consider this statement. It sounds strange to us, but if other great nations act thus, can it be so very unreasonable? Mr. Max Müller proceeds to say—

gali, Hindustani, Mahratti, &c.), and of the Dravidian languages (Tamil, Telugu, Canarese, &c.), would likewise seem to be required in the first University of the English Empire."

The non-existence at Oxford of any adequate representation of the various branches of knowledge which are specially Indian, is surely one of the very strangest phenomena observable in Europe. There died the other day a great Persian scholar who had made his fame in a land not his own. If an English student wanted to attend the lectures of M. Jules Mohl, whither had he to go—to an English University? No—to the Collège de France. Yet, what interests has France in Persia, or Persian, at all comparable to ours? The noble Lord the Under Secretary for India will correct me if I am wrong when I say that the decay of Persian learning amongst Indian officers is a serious practical inconvenience—an inconvenience which has attracted the attention of Government and to which it is not easy to apply a remedy. Quite recently several of the Indian languages have become recognized at Oxford; but I remember when there was not even a teacher of Hindustani; and to this hour if any one wants to have a notion of what is doing in current Indian literature, he must turn again to the Collège de France and read the annual statement of one of its Professors, M. Garcin de Tassy. Let any one who cares for the good name of Oxford look at what the Orientalists have done since the days of Sir William Jones, and then count up what share Oxford has had in that splendid page of human history. It is getting late, but it is not yet too late for her still to take her part. Can the present generation of her children really wish that her historians in the end of next century shall not have a very different tale to tell from what could be told of her now? What should we think of any other nation which had such an appanage as India and did not recognize it in its greatest national University? Do the Dutch at Leyden ignore their Eastern possessions? Very far from it. The mere fact that Haileybury was created far away from either Oxford or Cambridge, speaks volumes as to the melancholy state in which they were in those days. Of course it is an open question how far certain minor branches of knowledge, especially professional knowledge, which are well taught in London, should be taught at Oxford or Cambridge. If the Inns of Court, which are doing their duty better than they used to do, were doing all their duty, I suppose some departments of law might be left quite unrepresented at Oxford, at least, till more pressing wants had been supplied. And what may be said of law may be said, I presume, even more confidently, of medicine. In such a study again as engineering, Oxford might most reasonably decline competition with Cambridge, and so with all departments of mathematical inquiry not hitherto represented within her walls. The accidents of history have made Cambridge the great mathematical University, and it would be a waste of revenue to compete with her. But how stands the case with regard to one of Oxford's own subjects—with theology. Any one who inquires will find out that the higher branches of theology are hardly represented at all. Now, unless we are prepared to say that these studies are not worth encouraging—and I trust it has not quite come to that—there is a hiatus in our organization which should immediately be supplied. Any one who cares to see how great our wants are, should read the paper on this subject by a working theologian in the volume lately published by the Rector of Lincoln, entitled the Endowment of Research. Some people say—What is the good of increasing the number of Professors, seeing that those you have already get so very few to come to their lectures? Of course, those you have already get very few to come to their lectures—and why? Because the University has adopted one of the strangest plans for neutralizing its own efforts that it ever entered into the heart of man to conceive. First, it takes a large sum of money and devotes this to paying Professors—many of them men of great ability and capable of carrying their hearers very far in their respective subjects. This done the University takes a very much larger sum of money and singling out a few subjects from amongst those which the Professors teach says to all persons in statu pupillari—the last thing I want you to do is to follow any of my Professors very far into his particular subject. I want you to regulate your reading by my examinations, which have nothing in the world to do, except on the rarest occasions, with Professorial lectures. Side by side, however, with the Professorial lectures you will find another system in active operation worked by College tutors and private tutors. Throw yourself into that—succeed in it, and I will shower down on you honours and emoluments. No wonder that the academic youth leave the Professor's lectures and go in crowds to the College tutors and the private tutors. Besides in my time, and I suppose to this day attending your College tutor's lectures was a matter of obligation, and these lectures were so arranged as to have made it very difficult for any one to have regularly attended Professorial lectures, even if he had wished to do so; but hardly any one did wish to do so, or could wish to do so, when doing so was quite foreign to the spirit of the place, and would unquestionably have in the case of any man who was likely to do well in the schools been made a subject of grave remonstrance by College authorities and friends. If, however, all this is changed; if a very large part of the money which the University now uses to bribe young men not to go to its own Professor's lectures is taken away, there is no reason why the Professor's lectures should not be attended at Oxford just as they are at any other University. But, after all, you do not want Professors merely for the purpose of teaching students, you want them for two other purposes—First, to represent their particular subject, and to influence by so doing the general body of learned opinion in the University; and, secondly, to push on their own subject by experiment or editing of new texts or otherwise as the case may be. One of the very best ways to advance the interests of learning and research is to create Professorships with certain moderate but well-defined duties in the way of publishing the results arrived at, whether by lectures or in transactions as would often be better. An hon. Friend of mine told us in the early part of the evening that Stanislas Julien had only three pupils. But surely that very case showed that teaching was not the only duty of a Professor. My hon. Friend would be the last man to deny that Stanislas Julien had done a great deal for our knowledge of China. The leisure which his Professorship gave him enabled him to push on the study in which he excelled very greatly indeed. I daresay the Professor of the Semitic languages at the Collège de France had only three or four pupils. Why should he have a large number? No one wants any large portion of the youths of France or England either to study the Semitic languages. What is wanted is some one fit to teach the few that do, and, further, a man able to add to what is known as about Semitic antiquity not by pupils, but by Professors. But although the founding of Professorships, or sub-Professorships, or Lectureships, either permanent or occasional, is one very good way of endowing research, it is not the only way, and there should be ample funds at the command of the University for stimulating research, not often, or even generally carried on within her walls. Those who find any difficulty in this, have surely never reflected how all branches of knowledge hang together, and in how many ways success in one direction enables enquirers to advance in some apparently at first sight quite different direction. Thus far, then, I think I have shown that I quite agree with the purpose of the Government, and now I want to say a little on the way in which it proposes to carry its object into effect. It proposes to create a Commission. I listened with very great interest to the trenchant observations of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London upon the composition of that Commission and upon the characters of its individual members—observations which exhibited, as all will admit, the most engaging frankness; and when my right hon. Friend was examining, for example, the character of Lord Selborne, whom he had known intimately for fifty years, I had nothing to do but to listen. When, however, he came to the character of Sir Henry Maine, my position was different—for if I had not known Sir Henry Maine for fifty years I had known him extremely intimately for three and twenty years in all sorts of situations and capacities, and I must take leave to dissent from the view of him which was given us by my right hon. Friend. My right hon. Friend was quite misinformed when he said that Sir Henry Maine was the alter ego of Lord Salisbury. He is nothing of the kind. He is a man far too original and far too independent to be the alter ego of Lord Salisbury or of any one else, and it is no disparagement to one whose ability those of us who have sat many years in this House have had many opportunities of estimating and admiring, to say that on University subjects and on Indian subjects Lord Salisbury would be much more likely to be the alter ego of Sir Henry Maine than Sir Henry Maine of Lord Salisbury. But the truth of the matter is that they are simply two extremely able men, who chance upon several matters which happen to be before the public at this moment to have come, from very different sides, to the same conclusions. To-morrow they may come to different conclusions; and, if so, they will frankly act upon their conclusions, for neither of them is in any sort of way bound to agree with the other. I have seen much more of the working of the Council of the Secretary of State for India than any man now in this House, and I may say that the position of a Member of the Secretary of State's Council is one of perfect independence. If he is a sensible man he will of course wish to support the Secretary of State when he can, just as the Secretary of State will in his turn always wish to carry his Council with him. Unless this disposition prevails on both sides Indian business will be badly done; but no Member of Council of whom it could be truly said that he was the alter ego, or anything like the alter ego, of the Secretary of State would be expected either by his fellow Councillors or by the Secretary of State himself—

MR. MAITLAND rose to Order. He wished to point out that the observations which the hon. Gentleman had just made, and his reference to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London on the Oxford University Bill, were not relevant to the question before the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, he had already called the hon. Member to Order, but he understood that it was the wish of the House that both the University Bills should be discussed as one.

MR. GRANT DUFF proceeded: It was quite necessary for me to enter into these details in justice both to Sir Henry Maine and to the Indian Council, but I now return to the main line of my argument. I am not going to add anything to the adverse comments which others have made on the names of the Commission, nor am I going to suggest any new names, but surely there are two most palpable omissions. Is it possible that in the present state of science any Government should be satisfied without having some person to represent the sciences into which life enters, the same which used to be, roughly speaking, lumped together under the name of natural history? Mr. Justice Grove, of course, represents one side of science, but how has the other side fared? Is there any one who knows or cares anything about it on the Commission as at present constituted? Again, have we not a great deal to learn from Foreign Universities? Is there any one on the Commission who knows anything whatever about these. My right hon. Friend who has charge of this Bill will, in his capacity of Minister of Public Destruction, admit that the War Office has learned much from Germany. I can hardly think that he will maintain that in the capacity he temporarily fills, of Minister of Public Instruction, he has nothing to learn from the countrymen of Moltke, and Goeben, and Roon. There should be manifestly on the Commission some one who either knows already, or will, for the purposes of the Commission, make a special study of at least the German Universities. The addition of two such members as I have suggested seems to me of most urgent necessity. This is no Party question. I, for one, am nearly indifferent to the political opinions of the persons to be selected, but not to have two such persons on the Commission will expose us to the ridicule of all Europe. There are various provisions in the Bill to which exception must be taken at the proper time, as, for instance, the proposal that three members of a College should be elected by that College to sit with the Commissioners—a most unfortunate arrangement, and one likely to cost the Commissioners a great deal of trouble. I will not, however, dwell upon any of these points at present, because I wish to concentrate attention upon the Commission. If that Commission is strengthened by the addition of two such members as I have mentioned, I think we can with some confidence hand over the University and its Colleges to their manipulation; but if the present Commission is to remain as it is, then I think it will be the duty of those who sit on this side strongly to oppose the further progress of the Bill. The wish, however, which we have expressed is so reasonable, is so absolutely without bearing upon any question that is open between the two Parties, that I should hope the Government would entertain it favourably. It cannot be their object to create a Commission which is wanting in such essential elements as the representation of one whole side of science, and the presence of some person who has an acquaintance with what other nations have done for the higher education of their people. The little volume which I have in my hand gives a bird's-eye view of the vast Professorial activity of Germany, and that that Professorial activity results in an astounding literary and scientific activity. Mr. Appleton, a member of a most Conservative College—of Archbishop Laud's own College, writes as follows:—

“In Oxford, the actual additions to knowledge that are made in the course of a generation in the old traditional studies of Latin and Greek philology are, as compared with what is done in Germany, almost inappreciable. Perhaps I may be allowed to speak with some authority on this point, as it so happens that the whole learned and scientific literature of England and the Continent comes in some form or other regularly before me year by year. And I do not think that I am doing England an injustice when I say that, whilst the annual product in Germany of original investigations in the sphere of the classical languages and literatures amounts to something like 200 distinct works, those produced by England in the same time and in the same province do not exceed a dozen. I may quote also a similar opinion expressed recently by Dr. Frankland in his evidence before the Royal Commission on Scientific Instruction, with respect to the comparative amount of original work contributed by England and by Germany respectively to chemical science. He says—‘A year or two ago I took the trouble to look out in regard to chemistry the number of original investigations made in each country during one year. . . . In the year 1866, which was the year I enquired, 1,273 papers were published by 805 chemists. Of these, Germany contributed 445 authors and 777 papers; France, 170 authors and 245 papers; the United Kingdom, 97 authors and 127 papers. I may mention, however, speaking exclusively of chemistry—for I have not gone into the other sciences—that as far as research in Great Britain depends upon our scientific training, our case is much worse than appears from this comparison, because a large proportion of those papers contributed by the United Kingdom were the work of Germans residing in this country, but who had not been trained in this country.’”

He then goes on to quote some most interesting statistics of the comparative literary activity of the two countries in 1873, statistics which are again not to our advantage; and I beg the House to remember that from the beginning of 1866 to the end of 1873, not literature and science, but politics and war, were the chief occupations of Germany. Within that period she revolutionized all her political arrangements, struck down two great Empires, and fought some of the most tremendous battles that are recorded in history. At the beginning of last century the German Universities were far inferior to our own. A little more than a hundred years later they were far in advance of them; but there is nothing to prevent their respective positions being entirely reversed before the year 1900, if we are only wise now—if, that is, we take the trouble, in reforming our Universities, to pay regard to what other nations have been doing; and if we further remember that a University which does not, at least, try to advance within its walls, as well as to teach, every branch of human knowledge, which there is not some special reason for its not teaching, is not such a University as a great country like this ought to be satisfied with.

MR. RAIKES was anxious that the question, having been once opened, should be concluded during the present Session, and he therefore asked the House to consider one serious evil which existed in both our great Universities, and which might seem to warrant the interference of the Legislature. A system had been growing up which had deprived many of the poor scholars of those means which would have enabled them to emulate the glory of those who had risen from that class. The system which existed had placed advantages more within the reach of rich men than within the reach of those who were somewhat unfairly handicapped. By bestowing endowments in the shape of prizes, we heaped emoluments on those who could make their way elsewhere, and withdrew funds which might be employed in educating their fellow-University men. All who had had the advantage of a University education must have been struck by the fact that everything in education that was worth having had to be paid for by the student himself. The expenses of living at the Universities were such as almost to frighten a parent in the first instance; and when a student got there, he found that he had to pay £40 or £50 a-year for a private tutor, for the College lectures were not at all calculated to qualify a man to take honours. In view of these circumstances, he trusted the Commissioners to be appointed under the Bill would make it their endeavour to improve the educational facilities of the Colleges—to make the education bestowed by the Colleges, in fact, such a reality as might suffice for a University career. It was, he thought, a great and a crying scandal that a man should be called upon to provide for himself that which the University might reasonably be called upon to give. Another circumstance to be regretted was that men of the greatest attainments were frequently attracted from the Universities by higher emoluments elsewhere. Without particularly wishing to see the army of Professors increased, he hoped some pecuniary provision would be made in order to retain for the University the services of distinguished men. He trusted the House would take such steps as it could to impress upon the Government the necessity of taking the advantage that was now afforded of legislating once for all on this important subject.

MR. GREGORY confessed that on first reading the Bill it appeared to him calculated to sacrifice the interests of the Colleges to the University; but he had been re-assured on that point by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill, and by the tone of the debate generally. As he understood the right hon. Gentleman, the College revenues were to be appropriated only to such purposes as were common to the Colleges and to the University; and the interests of the Colleges, so far from being sacrificed, would be carefully protected. In these circumstances, a great number of the objections which occurred to him on first reading the Bill, fell to the ground. His right hon. Friend felt that there were University requirements for which further development was necessary, and that the Colleges had some means which might be appropriated to that service; but he thought there should be some kind of assessment fixed by the Bill or understood by the Commissioners, beyond which the contributions of the Colleges should not be required, and hoped that some clauses would be introduced into the Bill for the protection of those Colleges in that respect. He also hoped that some power would be given to the Commissioners for regulating the residence of Undergraduates and the terms which they were required to keep as a qualification for a degree. It appeared to him that three years was quite unnecessary for an ordinary degree, and that it frequently led to a waste of time on the part of the student and to useless expenditure by his parent.

MR. BRISTOWE, referring to the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lyon Playfair) said, he looked upon Oxford and Cambridge from a different point of view from that of hon. Members who agreed with the right hon. Gentleman; they looked at them as examining Universities, while he regarded them as residential Universities. This all-important fact constituted an immense distinction between Oxford and Cambridge and the Scotch and German Universities. The right hon. Gentleman said that every four undergraduates at Oxford and Cambridge held scholarships or exhibitions; but here he must have been strangely misinformed, for certainly not more than one in 10 or 12 did so. With regard to the Commission, he thought, on the whole, that it might with advantage have included some Members who would represent “new blood,” and who had not been educated at the Universities; and he also endorsed the opinion that the duty of University reform belonged to the State, and should not be shunted on Commissioners. He could not understand why a change should be proposed in the composition of the Governing Body, and feared that the inevitable tendency of these Bills would be to increase largely the Professorial Staffs of the Universities at the expense of the College Fellowships. He saw no objection to the Colleges contributing a certain amount for the purposes of the University; but the most serious matter was the power taken in the Bill to impose Fellows on the Colleges because they held University offices. No doubt it was only a power, but that power might be exercised, and against the will of the Colleges. Moreover, he could not approve the creation of an inter-Collegiate Staff, as the effect of it would be to destroy that wholesome competition which had hitherto existed between the different Colleges. It seemed to him that it would be far better if the powers of the Commissioners were somewhat more limited, and if the objects of the Bill were more clearly defined. But he believed no difficulties would be placed in the way of passing these Bills into law.

MR. GÖSCHEN said, he thought that the House and the 225 Members of it who, they had been informed by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lyon Playfair) had been educated at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, had every reason to be satisfied at the tone in which those Bills had been discussed, and at the feeling which had been expressed with regard to their general objects, so far as they were at present able to make out what the result of the Bills would be. He must take exception to a phrase used by the hon. Member for Cambridge when he spoke of the Universities as not being national. On that (the Opposition) side of the House the contention had always been that the Universities were national institutions. He was glad that the fact had been more and more established; and, thanks to those conflicts which had been fought a few years ago, in which they were victorious, the public attitude towards the Universities on all sides had greatly changed. But for the spread of the feeling that the Universities were more and more developing the character of national institutions, the application of the large funds at their disposal would have been treated differently in the House. He was glad to think that from no quarter of this House at least—though he did not know what the friends of Research might have done out of it—had there been any suggestion that any portion of the funds should be devoted to any purpose distinct from Collegiate and University purposes. Allusion had been made to the work done by the Universities beyond the precincts of Oxford and Cambridge, and to the local examinations by which they were more and more establishing their hold over the general education of the country. He believed that the Universities were now reaping the reward of the system which they had lately been pursuing, and that the House was able to treat those questions with greater unanimity than would have been the case at any time during the last 40 years. In these circumstances, the House was asked not to legislate, but to give enormous powers to the Commissioners to legislate in its place and to perform certain functions which they were beginning to hope might be defined in the House, but also which they were beginning to believe would be totally different from the objects originally contemplated. The original objects laid down by a Cabinet Minister were mainly two—first, to deal in a comprehensive and somewhat revolutionary manner with what were called “idle Fellowships;” and, secondly, to transfer the funds from them to the endowment of Research. He was happy to see that so far as the debate of two nights had progressed, there were two points on which the House was agreed—one, that no revolutionary measure was to be applied to those Fellowships, and the other, that Research was not to be endowed in the way that seemed to be originally contemplated. But he wished to know what security they had that these views, which were also the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Spencer Walpole) and of the Secretary of State for War, would also be the views of the Commissioners who were to legislate for the University. At the same time, he might express a hope that the debates in that House would have a useful result in showing the opinion which the House of Commons entertained on the subject. As originally drawn, the Bill had a bias in favour of the University as against the Colleges, and it was the existence of that apparent bias which had considerably alarmed many who took an interest in University education. He admitted, however, that he did not discover that bias in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War; but the words Professorial system, as contrasted with the tutorial system, were so little understood out of that House that it might not be out of place to say a few words on the subject. They were asked by the Bill to increase the staff of Professors; but everyone acquainted with the matter knew that the duties of Professors, as distinguished from tutors, were outside the curriculum of the University teaching. What security was there that if Professors were appointed measures would be taken that those Professors should have pupils?

At present every undergraduate could pass through the University and get his degree without attending a single lecture. The College tutors were not prepared to say that they would hand over to the University Professors any work they now performed, and accordingly the lectures of the Professors would continue to be a kind of collateral luxury, very good in itself and useful to those who had time to attend the lectures, but which did not fit in with the general teaching. It was therefore desirable that the greatest precautions should be taken in increasing the staff of Professors, lest in doing so they should be only creating a certain number of sinecure offices. He had heard that the lectures of a new Oxford Professor lately appointed at a salary of £400 a-year were attended in the first term by four pupils, in the second by only one pupil, who was a personal friend, and in the third term by not a single pupil. It was urged that unless a number of new Professorial Chairs were established, it would be impossible to keep the best men at Oxford; but he strongly objected to increasing the Professoriate merely in order that there might be a greater flow of promotion among the tutors. Nobody, he thought, would contend that the Oxford and Cambridge Professors had not sufficient leisure at present to devote to study and Research. Their lectures might do a great amount of good in raising the tone and broadening the general line of study on various subjects, but they must be regarded as collateral adjuncts to the University system and scarcely as a part of it. Then if there was to be this increase in the number of Professors the mode of appointing them must be looked into. He trusted that the Government would exercise its influence to induce the Commissioners to look into this matter, as there was no part of University reform so important. If the mode of election were not satisfactory the appointments would not be satisfactory. It was notorious that at Oxford not only religious but political considerations were taken into account.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE pointed out that by Clause 15, section 5, power was given to the Commissioners to inquire into the mode of the election of the Professors.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was aware of that, but the point was not dwelt upon by the right hon. Gentleman himself, nor by the Cabinet Minister who was responsible for this measure in "another place," nor by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He might state that on making inquiry at Oxford he found that the unattached students who did not belong to any particular College did not attend the University lectures in any great numbers or as a part of the educational system of the University. Now, as to the "endowment of Research," he was rather curious to know whether, after the opinions which had been expressed by so many Members on both sides of the House, those words would be allowed to remain part of the Bill. He had expected to hear from his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) that research ought to be endowed; but his right hon. Friend distinctly dissuaded the House from endowing research, so far as giving more money to enable them to study was concerned; but his right hon. Friend was favourable to the endowment of research by supplying actual physical means for prosecuting studies of this kind, such as laboratories and libraries. For his own part, he had no objection to sums being granted from the funds of some of the Colleges for University purposes, provided that they could be satisfied that those purposes would be really fulfilled, and that these were purposes which would command general sympathy. When the word "research" was used, they did not know whether it was used in a restrictive sense. His right hon. Friend had pointed out that the real work of research had generally been conducted by men engaged in the work of education. Take the great classical names of the Professors in Germany—they were engaged in teaching work in the Universities, and it was in their leisure hours that they conducted their researches. His belief was this, that though in "another place" a feeling was produced that great progress would be made by the endowment of research, public opinion had so far been brought to bear on the point that a considerable change had occurred, and the fear now appeared to be felt that the result would be the creation of sinecure offices. He agreed that this question must not be looked at in a mere Oxford and Cambridge point of view, but nationally. Our Universities did not educate a single class of the community, but they were doing national work. It was a very false view to imagine that the Universities taught only Greek, Latin, and Mathematics. A distinguishing peculiarity of the English University system was that it did not give a narrow education in any particular profession, but proceeded upon a broad basis. A result of this characteristic had been that the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge had laid the foundation of all the liberal professions in the country, and had also established a most valuable bond of union between the members of those professions. It was no discredit to these great institutions that they had been able to send as many as 225 Members to that House. In other countries theologians went to their Universities to learn theology, and lawyers went to study law, but they suffered from the want of the career which was provided in England. It formed part of the history and traditions of the Universities that they should be broad and professional in their character. Then as to the mode in which the Bill was to be carried out. He was sorry to find a theological element in the Bill and a strong theological element in the Commission that was to carry out the Bill; and he hoped that in Committee the Government would assent to clauses with regard to the theological Fellowships. Agitation as to University reform would not come to an end so long as a large proportion of Fellowships were to be tenable only by clergymen of the Church of England. So anxious were the framers of the Bill to protect everything connected with theology, that there was a clause to legalize the continuation of voluntary payments by the Colleges. This meant that they were to have the power to appropriate a portion of their funds to the augmentation of College livings. In a Bill dealing with Academical reform, no such proposal ought to be found, and he hoped it would be expunged before the Bill was allowed to pass through Parliament. Again, what was to be the policy of the Commissioners? There had been two different declarations upon this subject in the two Houses of Parliament—and the Commissioners would be able to act in one sense or in the other. It was said that the Commissioners were to have perfect freedom, and therefore they must look to the constitution of the Commission. They would have power to change the tutorial into the professorial mode of teaching. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge had read a memorial of leading and resident members of the University of Cambridge in which they expressed a wish that the principles which Members on the Opposition side of the House approved of should be recognized in the Bill. But those principles were not recognized in the Bill. They wanted to know what was the scope of the action of the Commissioners. Supposing they had perfect confidence in the Oxford Commission, which they had not—he had not heard any one outside the Government circle say that it was a really satisfactory Commission; Lord Selborne was President of it; they had confidence in him, but if he resigned his office of President, the remaining Commissioners might choose their Chairman, and it might happen that by way of compromise a weak man would be chosen. The Commission had been appointed under Parliamentary criticism, and as its powers were to extend from 1876 until 1883, its whole constitution might be rapidly changed. This was not a satisfactory position in which to place the question, and he suggested a compromise by which, if the Government would provide a more satisfactory Commission, the House of Commons should be less particular in its inquiries as to what the Commission was to do. As at present constituted he entertained serious misgivings as to the arrangements in regard to the Commission. Even at this late stage he thought Her Majesty's Government might be urged to satisfy the House that certain principles would be laid down and what would be the scope of the reforms.

MR. MOWBRAY cordially joined the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) in congratulating the House on the tone and temper in which this debate had been conducted. He also congratulated his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) upon the admirable choice of Commissioners which he had made. He thought he had some reason to complain of the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London with regard to the Oxford Commission. That Commission was selected, not merely by Lord Salisbury, but by the whole of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman said he should like the Commissioners to come down to that House and make a statement as to their proceedings. There had been a number of Commissioners appointed of late years; but although some of the Commissioners were Members of that House, no one had ever heard of their coming down and making a public statement. A more extraordinary—he would almost say a more preposterous—statement he had never heard.

MR. GOSCHEN explained that he had only put the case hypothetically. He had said that if it were possible for the Commissioners to make a statement the House might feel more confidence.

MR. MOWBRAY said, that the right hon. Gentleman had asked what the Commissioners were to do. They would have the same freedom of action as the Committee of 1854, and it was known what they did. He (Mr. Mowbray) contended that there was a substantial agreement on both sides of the House as to the merits of the Bill. Hon. Members opposite had, it seemed, no great fault to find with the Bill itself, but they had expressed some distrust of language which was said to have been used in "another place," of which the House knew nothing, and with which it could not deal. What that House had to do was to look to the Bills themselves, and the exposition of their provisions that had been given by his right hon. Friends who had charge of them. There had been no proposal from any authorized quarter of an unlimited extension of the Professoriate. There had, no doubt, been vague and wild schemes floating about the Universities. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grant Duff), who had "surveyed mankind from China to Peru," had proposed that there should be Professors of a great many languages. A moderate extension of the Professoriate, and a moderate endowment of research were to be desired, but nothing more. Allusion had been made to the theological element on the Commission. There had been Bishops, Deans, and clergymen on former University Commissions, and it was almost impossible to conceive a good Commission to carry out these Bills unless they contained a certain amount of the clerical element. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lyon Playfair) said that the Universities ought to be conscious of their responsibility to the nation, and that University teaching ought to meet every profession and every occupation. He contended that the Universities had shown themselves conscious of their responsibility to the nation. It was the fault of society and not of the University system that men did not go to College when they were very young. It had been generally admitted to-night that a necessity for legislation existed, and that that necessity arose out of the Report of the Commissioners appointed by the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) in 1871. If legislation on the subject were necessary, there could be no doubt that the present was an exceptionally favourable time for introducing it, and there could be no doubt that the feeling both in the Universities and within the walls of that House was in favour of a settlement of the matter. The only opponent of the measure was the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), who was, anxious for delay not for academic, but for political purposes. The right hon. Gentleman objected to a Conservative Government reforming the Universities. All he wanted was that the matter should be delayed, upon any pretext, in order that the glory of dealing with it should be obtained by the Liberal Party. As regarded non-resident Fellowships, while he (Mr. Mowbray) was prepared to limit their tenure, he was not prepared to abolish them. They were a great incentive to industry in students during their undergraduate career; they formed a fitting reward at the close of that career; they were a great assistance in the early struggles of professional life; they were useful in maintaining a connection between the Universities and the world; and he hoped a certain number would still be maintained, even after the expiration of the term to which they were limited, if only on a small nominal income, at £50 a-year or less. Moreover, such Fellows would always form a valuable element in the election of Heads, for if the number of Fellows were considerably reduced, there would be too small a constituency for the election of Heads. He doubted if any one would be prepared to follow the revolutionary suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) to sweep away the Heads of Houses. It might have been popular three or four years ago, but so far as he could learn the idea was losing ground. There must be Heads in great establishments like the Colleges within the Universities, and it was a mistake to suppose that they had not active duties to perform as well in connection within their own societies as in relation to the University. He heartily welcomed assistance being given to meritorious students, who were poor; but he hoped such provision would not be limited to the "unattached" members of the University, but extended to young men equally poor who might be found within the Colleges and especially the Halls. The competition and rivalry between the University Press of Oxford and Cambridge and the Queen's printer, the latter having the monopoly of printing Bibles and Prayer Books, was very great. The University Press of Oxford had a proposal made to it which it was obliged to decline to supply Bibles at prime cost, and give in the binding, which showed that the work was not so very remunerative as many supposed. Some of the minor books published were remunerative, and they found as ready a sale in America as in England, and also some of the better books.

Mr. Mowbray

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY said, he did not refer to their being unprofitable, but that they were unworthy of the University to publish.

MR. MOWBRAY said, the Bills before the House were favourably regarded in the Universities, and he earnestly hoped the House would pass them this Session.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that if he were asked why they had spent two nights in discussing the principle of those University Bills he would say it was this—that they had been engaged in repudiating the motive, the aim, and the object which was professed by their promoter in "another place," and which no one had more distinctly repudiated than had the four Representatives of the Universities in question in that House. They might therefore treat with the disregard which it deserved all that had been said as to "idle" Fellowships and Research. There was, as had been acknowledged in the course of the debate, nothing whatever in the Bills of either of them to justify the speech in which they had been introduced to the public. In fact, the object of the two nights' debate had been to repudiate the motive for the introduction of the Bill which had been propounded by the Chancellor of the University of Oxford. It was because he believed that the Commission to be appointed would not adopt the scheme of the Chancellor of the University, and would not carry out his views as expressed in his speech, that he supported the Bill. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Lyon Playfair) praised the Scotch system, and said that if our Universities would adapt themselves to modern wants and occupations they need not offer gold. But what had the Scotch Universities done? They came to the English Universities for their best men. They had taken away Mr. Jebb, Professor Thomson, and others. The reason was because the Scotch Universities could not offer sufficient inducements to men to become ripe scholars and distinguished mathematicians. You could not breed your Bentleys, Porsons, and Adamses unless you could offer the advantage of these endowments. The talk about repudiating "idle Fellowships" could only have proceeded from men ignorant of University life and of the principles on which Universities worked. That mischievous phrase was one of the obstacles which had stood in the way of the Bill. With regard to the appointments of new Professors recommended by the Commissioners, the new men were men who, in his opinion, would not obey the Commissioners who appointed them. They were of a class of men who constituted themselves into Mutual Admiration Societies, and congratulated each other as "deep thinkers." They might be deep thinkers, but they produced nothing. Those were the class of men whom the Commissioners were contemplating to appoint. They prided themselves on being masters of Research. Now, Research was very important when pursued by such men as Sir Isaac Newton; but there were various kinds of Research, and the idea of giving a man £1,000 a-year to go into a corner to think was absurd. It reminded him of a man in church, who, when he was woke up, closed his eyes and said he was "absorbed in deep thought." He would be sorry to see the younger Professors marry in too great numbers, because they would not be able to maintain their families without resorting to other employments, such as writing articles. It reminded him of the famous lines of Dr. Johnson—

Toil, envy, want, a patron, and a gaol!”

In this couplet he would only substitute one word, and make it read—

Toil, envy, want, a matron, and a gaol!”

The proposal to increase the number of Professors was highly objectionable. There were at present five theological Professors at Cambridge, and yet there was now talk of increasing the number, as if five were not sufficient to teach all that could be known of that science, grand as it was. As to shortening the terms of Fellowships, that was a point upon which they were all agreed. There were some things in Cambridge which wanted doing very much. Better buildings were wanted for the conduct of the business of the University. The want of museums was a scandal; and it was only recently that, thanks to the liberality of a Chancellor who did not make speeches, but gave £10,000, they had obtained a Natural History Museum. The reason the University of Cambridge was satisfied with this Bill was that they had confidence in the Commissioners, and knew that they would not countenance the nonsensical views which had been put forward by some persons on the subject. He was sorry that Oxford was dissatisfied, and he thought had cause to be dissatisfied, with the gentlemen in whose hands their destinies were to be placed. It would ill become him to criticize those gentlemen, and he would only say of them what Mr. Burke said of Lord Chatham’s Cabinet—that it was a curious piece of tessellated work. The names of some of these gentlemen had created the greatest amazement at Oxford, and the name of one of them was received at the University as a joke. One of those gentlemen to whom he was indebted for his earliest University instruction was Sir Henry Maine, a man of the greatest eminence; but he had got the duties to discharge of transacting the affairs of 200,000,000 of people, and of instructing the young men at Oxford in law, and it was impossible for him to find time to act on this Commission. Then there was Mr. Justice Grove, a distinguished man of science and a most able Judge; but he had always understood that the time of a puisne Judge was so fully occupied in his judicial duties that it was impossible for him to find a leisure moment. Yet this gentleman was selected to be a member of a Commission that must occupy much of his time for years. The Oxford Commission did not inspire the University with confidence; and, this being so, its work was not likely to be accepted as a final settlement. Fortunately, these remarks did not apply to the Cambridge Commission, which had been happily selected, and would, he hoped, perform a useful work for the benefit of this University.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was somewhat amused at the conclusion to which his hon. and learned Friend had come. He was horrified that a Judge should be put on the Commission for Oxford, but he praised the Cambridge Commission, forgetting that one of its members was the Lord Chief Justice. He might remind him also that Mr. Justice Coleridge had served on the Oxford Commission of 1854. If it was a dreadful thing to employ a Judge on business outside that of his office, what a terrible thing it was to send Sir Alexander Cockburn to Geneva to spend so much time there on an arbitration on the question of the Alabama claims. In fact, the hon. and learned Gentleman came down with jokes rather than arguments, and some of them were very good jokes indeed. Instead, however, of firing them off, he should have attempted to answer the arguments of the hon. Member for the Elgin Boroughs (Mr. Grant Duff) and those of the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice). The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) had said—“If you are going to make this multitude of Professors you must give us an engagement that you will find them pupils.” He repudiated the intention to make a number of Professors, and he equally repudiated the duty of finding them pupils. As long as the present system of examination prevailed, which required the existence of the tutorial system, the Professors would not have many pupils;

Sir William Harcourt

but, at the same time, the Professors performed very useful services though their lectures might not be largely attended. With respect to the appointment of Professors, the Bill gave the Commissioners power to alter the terms of eligibility and the method in which they were to be appointed. The decision of the Commissioners would not be final, and every care was taken that the interests of the Colleges should not be disregarded. It was an assumption outside the Bill that there should be any robbery of the Colleges to the extent of bringing them below the purposes for which they were instituted; but it was intended that there should be established an inter-dependence between the Colleges and the University for the benefit of both. Research had been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, but he might mention that there was no reference in the Bill to its endowment.

MR. GOSCHEN, interposing, drew the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the 18th clause.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY admitted that that clause had reference to the pursuit of Research, although it did not in terms give funds for the purpose. The mode in which the object was to be attained was to be left to the Commissioners. He readily admitted that some of the proposals which had been made respecting the endowment of Research were most extravagant. For example, the writer of an article in Nature said that if £200,000 a-year were granted for scientific research, it would be only the beginning of what was required. He seemed desirous to absorb the whole of the revenues of the Universities, for he said that 100 posts should be created at an annual expense of £800,000, which happened to be the exact amount of the revenues of the Universities. Exception had been taken to the phrase "idle Fellowships" which was used in the House of Lords, and he admitted that "non-resident Fellowships" was a better term, because many of the persons who held them did good work in the country and well deserved the positions they occupied. At the same time, an almost universal opinion prevailed that a limitation ought to be put on the tenure of Fellowships, and this was one of the objects contemplated by the present Bill. In conclusion, he thanked the House for the discussion that had taken place, because it had convinced him that these Bills had been met in a manner quite free from Party spirit or a desire to embarrass or defeat the Government. If the House continued to meet the Government in that spirit, he was sure the Bills might be carried during the present Session, and this was essential to the peace and prosperity of the Universities, which ought not to be kept any longer in suspense.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE remarked that the discussion had been so entirely in favour of further limitation of the powers of the Commissioners that he would consent to withdraw his Amendment, and leave the object he had in view to be effected in Committee.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY commented on the non-production of the Returns asked for by the House relative to the management of the Press and the emoluments of the Professors in each University.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[Lords.]—[BILL 159.]
(The Lord Advocate.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [8th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. RAMSAY remarked that nearly all the tenants in Scotland held their farms under leases, and the Bill had no reference to leaseholds. The measure contained some good things, but they were very infinitesimal. There was no great call for legislation on this subject at all, and in any case he protested against such a Bill being taken up at 1 o'clock.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Ramsay.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had not thought it necessary to make any statement in regard to this Bill, because it exactly followed the precedent of the English Bill of last Session, which was now the law of the land. Besides, the Bill had received the assent of the House of Lords. He quite admitted that there were some questions of difficulty connected with the details, arising from the limited extent of holdings in Scotland, but these could only be dealt with in Committee, and as the Bill admittedly contained some good things, and was an unopposed measure, he hoped the second reading would now be agreed to. He could assure the hon. Member that if he had any Amendments in Committee they would receive the attention of the Government.

Mr. BIGGAR supported the Adjournment of the Debate, as there were few Scotch Members present, and it was 1 o'clock in the morning.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought it rather hard, considering the period of the Session and the appeals which had been made to the Government to make progress with Scotch Business, that they should not be allowed to proceed with this measure.

Mr. ANDERSON said, Scotland was happy to have the advocacy of the hon. Member (Mr. Biggar) in the absence of Scotch Members, but he had no doubt the Scotch Members would have been in their places had they entertained any very strong objection to the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

METROPOLITAN GAS BILLS.

South Metropolitan Gas Light and Coke Company Bill reported with Amendments; Gaslight and Coke Company Bill reported from the Select Committee, with Amendments.

LORD REDESDALE intimated that as there appeared, from the discussion that had recently taken place, to be considerable differences as to the merits of the Bills before the House promoted by the Gas Light and Coke Company and the South Metropolitan Gas Company, he thought it would be advisable that they should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, instead of to a Select Committee in the usual course. At the proper time he would move a Resolution to that effect.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN approved of the course suggested. He would in Committee move Amendments to the Bills, Notice of which he would give as soon as possible. It would probably be convenient that he should now state the general objections he had to the Bills. With regard to the Bill of the Gas Light and Coke Company, his chief objection to it was that the Company sought nominally to raise an additional capital of £2,000,000, but in reality that increased capital would amount to £3,000,000, because there was already power to raise £1,000,000 by loan, and this additional £2,000,000 was to be raised by a sale of the shares by public auction. The Bill also proposed to fix the initial price of their gas at 3s. 9d. per 1,000 feet, which would enable the Company to pay a dividend of 10 per cent. This being so, the price of the £100 shares in the open market would be about £200; so that when Parliament was asked to sanction the issue of an additional £1,000,000 worth of shares, they were really adding £2,000,000 to the capital of the Company. According to the last accounts he had of those Companies, he found that in the Spring of last year there was an amalgamation between the Gas Light and the Independent and the Imperial Companies. Before their amalgamation took place the Imperial Company promoted a Bill which asked for a large increase of capital. That Bill, however, was opposed and withdrawn. Those who opposed it now complained that the Gas Light and Coke Company having taken over the Imperial were seeking by means of this Bill to obtain the same powers they previously resisted. This, he considered, was a great hardship upon those who had previously contested the matter. He understood that the Imperial and Independent Companies had power as yet unexercised of raising by shares and loans £1,200,000. If they were to have a Committee, the first question he should ask was why this enormous additional capital was required? As he was advised, it was required for renewing many of the works of the Companies; but if it was intended to expend it on a scheme of total renovation he was by no means sure that the Gas Companies were the best bodies to carry this work out. If the House considered the increase to be necessary, he urged that it should be raised by loan, and not by the sale of shares as proposed. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) the other night said it might depreciate the credit of a Company if they were obliged to raise very large sums by loan only; but in the case of those now under review, they were Companies with almost unlimited powers, whose shares were quoted upon the Stock Exchange, and he therefore could not conceive that they would suffer any injury.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was sorry to interrupt the noble Earl, but it was a serious violation of Order to discuss the merits of a Bill which was not before the House, or to raise questions of which no Notice had been given.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN was in the hands of the House, but he had thought it might be convenient to indicate the points he desired to raise.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he had not himself liked to interfere in a way which might appear discourteous towards the noble Earl, as they had had one or two previous discussions on that matter; but he concurred with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, that there could scarcely be any course more inconvenient or irregular than that of entering into the merits of a Bill not before their Lordships, merely upon a Notice of Motion being given by his noble Friend at the Table (Lord Redesdale) that on a future day, not yet even fixed, he would ask them to refer those Bills to a Committee of the Whole House. He wished to suggest, before his noble Friend at the Table made his Motion, whether it would not be more convenient that those Bills should be referred to a Select Committee, because there were points in them which could not be discussed in Committee of the Whole House. It might be necessary to call the parties and to hear evidence, and that could only be done by referring the Bills to a Select Committee. As to the initial price of 3s. 6d. per 6000 feet, that was the price settled by the Committee presided over by Lord Cardwell.

EARL FORTESCUE was proceeding to offer some observations to the House, when——

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY objected to the continuance of an irregular discussion.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

(The Lord President.)

COMMITTEE.

[BILL 99. Bill showing the Amendments proposed by Government, 99*.]

House in Committee (according to Order.)

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4, (Sending unseaworthy ships to sea a misdemeanour).

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that this clause for the first time created a criminal offence in our colonies to be tried and punished here—namely, that of sending a ship to sea in an unseaworthy state. He would not discuss whether it was or was not politic to make that attempt without the consent of the colonies, particularly the great self-governing colonies of Canada and Australia. He himself, as it happened, was responsible for the Act of 1871, which made sending an unseaworthy ship to sea to the danger of life a criminal offence, but he never contemplated creating an offence beyond the boundaries of the United Kingdom. The Government had evidently found it a difficult matter to legislate upon, because they had added to the Bill, during its passage through the other House, the Proviso—and it was now proposed to add, “or of the Governor of the British Possession in which such prosecution takes place.” He should be glad to know whether the Government had fully considered this point.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR replied that the Government had given the question careful consideration.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 12, inclusive, agreed to, with Amendments.

New Clause inserted after Clause 12 (Application to foreign ships of provisions as to detention).

Clauses 13 to 18, inclusive, agreed to.

New Clause inserted after Clause 18 (Provision as to survey of foreign passenger steamer or emigrant ship).

Clause 19 agreed to.

Clause 20 (Space occupied by certain deck cargo to be liable to dues).

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET drew the attention of the Committee to the total absence from the Bill of any provision for limiting the quantity of gunpowder, glycerine, and other explosive substances, or for regulating the storage of such articles. In many cases these explosives were shipped on board as ordinary merchandize, without any notice to the owners or commanders; and beyond question many disasters had originated from this cause. He trusted the Government would bring up a clause to regulate the shipment of explosive materials.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY warmly supported the proposal of the noble Duke, and hoped that it would be acted upon by the Government.

Lord Carlingford

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he was under the impression that some rule regulating the shipment of such goods was in force, but he would look into the subject, and would be prepared, in the event of its being necessary to take action in the matter, to bring up a clause relating to it on the Report.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 21 (Penalty for carrying deck loads of timber in winter) struck out, and the following new clause inserted in lieu thereof:—

“After the 1st day of January, 1877, if a ship, British or foreign, arrives between the last day of October and the 16th day of April in any year at any port in the United Kingdom from any port out of the United Kingdom, carrying as deck cargo, that is to say, in any uncovered space upon deck or in any covered space not included in the cubical contents forming the ship's registered tonnage, any wood goods coming within the following description; that is to say—

“(a) Any square, round, waney, or other timber, or any pitch pine, mahogany, oak, teak, or other heavy wood goods whatever; or

“(b) Any more than five spare spars or store spars, whether or not made, dressed, and finally prepared for use; or

“(c) Any deals, battens, or other light wood goods of any description to a height exceeding three feet above the deck.

“The master of the ship, and also the owner, if he is privy to the offence, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds for every hundred cubic feet of wood goods carried in contravention of this section, and such penalty may be recovered by action or on indictment or to an amount not exceeding one hundred pounds) (whatever may be the maximum penalty recoverable) on summary conviction.

“(1) In respect of any wood goods which the master has considered it necessary to place or keep on deck during the voyage on account of the springing of any leak, or of any other damage to the ship received or apprehended; or

“(2) If he proves that the ship sailed from the port at which the wood goods were loaded as deck cargo at such time before the last day of October as allowed a sufficient interval according to the ordinary duration of the voyage for the ship to arrive before that day at the said port in the United Kingdom, but was prevented from so arriving by stress of weather, or circumstances beyond his control. Provided further, that nothing in this section shall affect any foreign ship coming into any port of the United Kingdom under stress of weather, or for repairs, or for any other purpose than the delivery of her cargo.”

LORD CARLINGFORD expressed his approval of the new clause, as under it Norway and Sweden would not be placed at a disadvantage when compared with other countries.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that the Government had felt the force of the observations made by the noble Lord on the second reading on this subject, and in consequence of what was then suggested they had re-considered the whole matter and had brought up the clause which was now proposed to be inserted in the Bill. Should anything more be thought necessary it could be considered on the Report. He would take that opportunity of pointing out to the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Somerset) that by the 23rd section of the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85 the carrying on board any ship of any of the dangerous goods—gunpowder and other things—specified, would make the parties liable to a fine of £100 for each offence.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 22 to 24, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 25 (Application to foreign ships of provisions as to detention).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, this clause had become unnecessary, its enactments having been embodied in Clause 13.

Clause struck out.

Remaining clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Friday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 160.)

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

PRIVATE LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. RAMSAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the evidence (as reported in the "Scotsman" newspaper of 9th June) given by the proprietor of a private lunatic asylum in Musselburgh, when he was examined as a witness in an action in the Court of Session, and stated that business men had been put into his asylum to avoid the Bankruptcy Court, and ministers to avoid trial by their Presbyteries; and, if so, whether he can give any information regarding such statement, or the grounds on which it was made?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has requested me to answer this Question, because the inquiries were made under my direction. The statements made by the witness referred to in the Question have been the subject of a very thorough investigation by the Commissioners of Lunacy in Scotland. On being referred to for the cases to which he had alluded, Chalmers, the proprietor of the private lunatic asylum, gave to the Commissioners two cases, one that of a tailor in Edinburgh, and the other that of a former minister of the Established Church of Scotland. The names are at the service of my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk if he wishes for them. The first case occurred in December 1863, and the person concerned was admitted to the asylum on certificates of insanity granted by Dr. John Smith and the late Mr. Charles Sidey, both of Edinburgh. Dr. Smith has long enjoyed the reputation of being one of the highest authorities in matters of lunacy in Scotland. Mr. Sidey was a well-known Majesty's Government will in a friendly manner call the attention of the Austrian Government to the allegation that slaves are conveyed from Hodeidah to Jeddah in steamers belonging to the Austrian Lloyd's, a company receiving subsidies and other special privileges from that Government?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that as to the first part of the Question of his hon. Friend, he had seen the statements in The Anti-Slavery Reporter, which some one had been good enough to send him, and he observed in that publication a long statement with reference to the Slave Trade in the Red Sea, respecting which what was termed "a thrilling narrative" was given, some of the statements being well-founded, while others were perfectly untrue. With reference to the charges made against the British Consul at Jeddah, Her Majesty's Government had no reason to believe that there was any slackness of duty on the part of the British Consul or vice Consul at that place. On the contrary, the Government were of opinion that it was owing to the representations that had been made by the Consul at Jeddah that the slave mart there had been entirely shut up. There was no doubt that a considerable amount of slave trade was being still carried on in private establishments at Jeddah, and their Consul, in concert with the Governor, was doing his best to provide means for putting it down. There was also no doubt that a considerable deal of slave traffic was carried on in other parts of the Red Sea. Steps had been taken by Her Majesty's Government upon many occasions during the last year and a-half to bring before the Egyptian Government the alleged connivance in the traffic of Egyptian officials, and our Government would continue to pursue the same course. Communications had also been made to the Austrian Government on the subject, and if Her Majesty's Government thought that they could do good by making further representations, they would certainly be willing to do so.

CRIMINAL LAW — CASE OF THOMAS HARE—CUMULATIVE PENALTIES.

QUESTION.

MR. RODWELL said, that had he known all the facts of the case when he was asked to put on the Paper the Question which stood in his name, he should have hesitated to do so; but, as the Notice had been given, he thought it due to the justices who passed this startling sentence to ask the Question of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department—namely, Whether his attention has been drawn to the case of Thomas Hare, who was fined £2 for furious driving; £2 for being drunk and disorderly; £2 for using abusive language; £5 for assaulting Inspector Ward; £5 for assaulting Police-constable Clerk; making a total sum of £16 and costs; by the justices at Spalding on the 20th of June last, for the above offences committed on the 7th of June; and, whether, in the absence of any special facts to justify such an accumulation of penalties for one transaction, he will order a remission of the fines, or some portion of them?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he did not in the least wonder at his hon. and learned Friend being rather startled by the sentence prima facie. It was a singular instance of what was called cumulative penalties. At the same time, as the Question had been asked, the facts ought to be known. It appeared that about 8 o'clock on the evening of the 7th of June the inspector of police at Spalding, being in one of the principal streets, observed a man riding very furiously and seriously endangering the safety of the bystanders. The inspector followed him to an inn, and found him there extremely drunk. He told him that he should summon him for furious driving, whereupon he became very insulting, and used most disgusting language. Then he went into the market-place, where he used the same sort of language. A second policeman came up and tried to pacify him. He continued to be abusive, and eventually two policemen, after giving him repeated opportunities to go away, took him into custody for being disorderly. His conduct then became so violent that it required the aid of two other men to get him to the police station. Hare, who had been twice before convicted of a similar offence, paid the fines imposed by the magistrates and was released. He was sorry to say, however, that a very short time afterwards the man committed the same offence again. Probably, the magistrates considered whether they ought not to send him to gaol, but they adopted a more lenient course, and imposed the cumulative fines, which, he believed, Hare was perfectly able to pay.

VACCINATION ACTS—THE KEIGHLEY BOARD OF GUARDIANS.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the proceedings for attachment against the Keighley Board of Guardians, in consequence of a resolution passed by them that, in applying the compulsory powers under the Vaccination Acts, they would take into consideration the circumstances of each particular case, were taken by his authority or sanction; whether such proceedings are in accordance with the spirit and intention of his circular letter of instructions in March last to the Evesham Board of Guardians, in which he left large discretionary powers to them as to the manner and circumstances of applying the Act, on the ground that repeated prosecutions would produce mischievous results and excite sympathy with the prosecuted and a more extended opposition to the Law; and, whether six or seven of the Keighley Board of Guardians have been sent to gaol under the attachment?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: The proceedings, Sir, for the attachment were taken by my authority and sanction; but it is not accurate to say that they were taken in consequence of the resolution as quoted in the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The Guardians had refused to enforce the provisions of the Vaccination Acts in their Union, and there were great numbers of children who had not been vaccinated. The Local Government Board applied to the Court for a mandamus against the Guardians to compel obedience to the law, and, after a full argument, a mandamus was granted, requiring the Guardians to give directions to the vaccination officer to proceed against persons in default. The Guardians thereupon passed a resolution in obedience to the writ, instructing the vaccination officer accordingly, and this resolution was embodied in their return to the writ. The Guardians, however, have recently passed another resolution, rescinding all portions of resolutions which could be construed into general orders to prosecute, which is what they are required in the first instance to do, and instructing the vaccination officer that the Guardians reserve to themselves the dispensation of the Vaccination Act. It was impossible to regard this resolution otherwise than as an act of disobedience to the mandamus, with which the Guardians had previously undertaken to comply. In consequence of this the Guardians were called upon to answer for the contempt of Court involved in their proceedings, and, after hearing all the parties, the Court, without hesitation, made the rule absolute for the attachment, the Chief Justice observing that it was about as gross a case of contempt as he had known for a long time. These proceedings are in no sense at variance with the spirit and intention of the letter to the Evesham Guardians, which does not apply to original prosecutions, but to cases where persons have been already fined for not complying with the law. The Guardians who were in contempt have not, so far as I am aware, been sent to gaol; and, in point of fact, the writs, though authorized, have not yet been executed, and it is to be hoped that, having been fully reminded of their duties by the High Court of Justice, they will yet see the propriety of giving the necessary directions for the enforcement of the law.

LAW AND JUSTICE—MR. SERJEANT ARMSTRONG.—QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the statement is correct which has appeared in the Dublin newspapers to the effect that Serjeant Armstrong has been appointed to go as Judge of Assize?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Sir, I am informed that it is the invariable practice in Ireland for the three Queen's Serjeants to be named in the Commission of Assize together with the Common Law Judges. Two of the three Serjeants are the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Clare County (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for King's County (Serjeant Sherlock). The Serjeants would, I imagine, in case of necessity, go the circuit in place of the Judges if their other engagements permitted. It is obvious, however, that the two hon. and learned Gentlemen I have named have other engagements. Serjeant Armstrong has been, and still is, engaged in the ordinary business of a barrister on one of the circuits during the present Assizes. Therefore I cannot say whether he will act as a Judge or not. I am at present in communication with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the subject.

MR. CALLAN: I beg to give Notice that on Monday I will ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the insertion of the names of the Serjeants-at-law in the Commission of Assize is not such a matter of ordinary routine as not to confer any right, in case of the existence of a vacancy amongst the Judges, to be selected to go as Judge of Assize; whether the statement which has appeared in the Dublin newspapers, to the effect that Serjeant Armstrong has been appointed to go as Judge of Assize, is correct; if so, whether at the time of the appointment of Serjeant Armstrong to go as Judge of Assize the Irish Executive were aware that the Serjeant Armstrong referred to is the same individual as the "Richard Armstrong" whose name was returned by the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at elections for the borough of Sligo, under Schedule D, as "Guilty of bribery;" whether the said Commissioners further reported that Serjeant Armstrong had expended £1,480 in bribery; that the number of voters so bribed amounted to 97, and of these the names of 65 have been ascertained, among whom the sum of £1,200 was distributed; whether, in consequence of the said Report, the borough of Sligo was disfranchised; and whether, in view of the foregoing circumstances and the precedent in the Stonor case, Her Majesty's Government are still prepared to appoint, or, if appointed, to cancel the appointment of an individual reported and scheduled as guilty of bribery to the important judicial office of going as Judge of Assize?

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL—THE AMENDMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the noble Lord the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he can lay on the Table, before the House goes into Committee on the Elementary Education Bill, the Amendments which it is understood he himself intends to move?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I had intended to lay upon the Table of the House some proposed Amendments on the part of the Government to the main part of the Bill—that is to say, to the leading part of it, which is concerned with the employment and education of children. As the Amendments do not affect the principles of the measure in any way, and are mostly the carrying out of possible alterations which I sketched in my speech on the Second Reading, and are very much in accordance with Amendments which have now been for some days on the Paper, placed there by hon. Members on both sides of the House of great experience in these matters, I should not have thought it necessary to make any statement on the part of the Government with regard to those Amendments. But as my right hon. Friend expressed a wish to know what points they bear upon, I shall be happy to give a rapid sketch of the changes which the Government propose to make in this leading part of the Bill. The House will remember—and I must apologize for occupying its attention for a few minutes, so as to make clear the gist of the Amendments—that though in a most decided manner the opinion of hon. Members was shown on the Second Reading to be against the universal enforcement of bye-laws for direct compulsion all over the country, still a very general feeling appeared to prevail that it was desirable to have some statement in the Bill of the parent's duty to provide instruction for his children, and various Amendments have been placed upon the Paper bearing upon this point. The Government see no objection to meet that general wish, and therefore propose to place, as the opening clause to the Bill, a new clause declaratory of the parent's duty in the following words:—

"It shall be the duty of the parent of every child above the age of five years to cause such child to receive efficient elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and if such parent fail to perform such duty, he shall be liable to such orders and penalties as are provided by this Act."

The next alteration we propose is in the commencement of Clause 7, which will read as follows:—

"If the parent of any child above the age of five years, who is under this Act prohibited from being taken into employment, habitually and without reasonable excuse, neglects to provide efficient elementary instruction for his child"—

The rest of the clause to remain as it is. Further, with regard to the certificate of attendance which enables the child to get out to work, we find that, unintentionally, by only allowing attendance to count at a public elementary school, we were inflicting a great hardship upon the children who attend other public schools—that is to say, schools not kept for private profit, which are efficient, but which are not public elementary. We, therefore, propose to take power to the Education Department to inspect, as often as they think fit, any such schools; to insist, if the schools wish to count as efficient, upon proper registers of regular attendance being kept, and upon other matters; and that if these schools are certified by the Department to be efficient, attendance at these schools shall be allowed to count for the certificate. It is needless to observe that we cannot allow attendance to count at any school which we do not certify ourselves to be efficient. The next change proposed is one to which we have been very much led by observing the important Amendments placed upon the Paper by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex and by my hon. Friends and Colleagues the two Members for Liverpool, as well as by other hon. Members. They propose that Town Councils and Boards of Guardians should be obliged to appoint a committee to administer this Act. The Government consider the suggestion a very good one, although they could not accept exactly the Amendments proposed. But I shall lay on the Table a clause which will oblige Town Councils and Boards of Guardians to appoint a committee, to be called the "School Attendance Committee," to be composed only of members of their own bodies, and in the case of Boards of Guardians to follow exactly the analogy of the Union Assessment Committees, which have been found to work very well. Then, with regard to the local committees which these bodies have the power of appointing if they think fit, we propose to confine their duties to giving such information and aid to the School Attendance Committees of the Boards of Guardians as they may require, and to forbid them to prosecute, to pass bye-laws, or to spend money on their own account. There is one other Amendment of some importance, which I sketched in my speech on the Second Reading, to which I must now allude; but as the subject is somewhat a complicated one, I fear the Amendment itself cannot be in the hands of hon. Members before Monday at the earliest. I allude to the subject of industrial schools. The Government will make a proposal to enable the erection of day industrial schools under strict provisions which shall prevent their being used for any except the class for whom they are absolutely necessary. I would wish to be clearly understood, of course, not to tie my hands, on the part of the Government, in any way as to not bringing in any further Amendments that we may think fit, or as to accepting the Amendments which are brought before the House by hon. Members on either side. But I felt, as my right hon. Friend opposite desired it, that it would be for his convenience and that of the House that I should give this short explanation of the Amendments to the main part of the Bill which the Government will propose.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL.

(Mr. Disraeli.)

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [4th July], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Question again proposed.

MR. FORSYTH said, that he wished to address himself especially to the question of the Intermediate Court of Appeal. It was condemned alike by the Profession and by the public. All admitted that the Court of Appeal ought to be of superior authority as compared with the body from whose decision the appeal was made; and though it might not be composed of better or stronger lawyers, the public ought to think so. For this reason, the Members of the tribunal ought to be permanent, and they ought to have higher salaries. There were now three Lords Justices of Appeal, not one of whom had sat on the Common Law Bench, though Lord Justice Mellish was a distinguished member of the Common Law Bar. The Times in a leading article had spoken strongly upon this point, and the only statement as to which he differed from that article was that "the evil is not as yet pressing." In his opinion it was most pressing, and the greatest possible inconvenience was felt both by the suitors, who had no confidence in the constitution of the Court, and by the Judges themselves. The present mode of proceeding was haphazard and undignified. They had before them the plans of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) and of the hon. and learned Attorney General; but he thought the best and most proper course would be to appoint two new Judges who should sit in the Court of Appeal, instead of borrowing Judges, it might be for a few hours, from a Court of First Instance, where the number at present was almost too small, so much so that, owing to the press of work, one of the Judges had to apologize for giving an oral instead of a written judgment. Further, he did not think that 20 Judges in the Common Law Division would be too many. The objection to this plan was the money objection, and he feared, if it were proposed, the Government would resist it. Next to the appointment of more Judges, he approved of the suggestion of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James). This suggestion was that two Judges should be taken from the Common Law Division for the purposes of the Court of Appeal; and he was glad to see, from an Amendment placed upon the Notice Paper by the hon. and learned Attorney General, that the Government practically adopted the plan, proposing to place three Common Law Judges in the Court of Appeal, and enable a single Judge to deal with matters now decided by three sitting in Banco. It might seem inexpedient to trust so much to a single Judge, but in the Court of Chancery questions of equal importance were dealt with by the Vice Chancellors and Master of the Rolls sitting singly. He thought, therefore, that the proposal of the hon. and learned Attorney General was a judicious one, and should be prepared to support it.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he was of opinion that the Bill contained the best scheme for a Court of Appeal that could, under all the circumstances, be brought forward, and his only object in putting an Amendment on the Paper had been, not to obstruct the progress of the Bill, but to call attention to the necessity of something being done with regard to the Intermediate Court of Appeal. He was, therefore, glad to find that the hon. and learned Attorney General had placed upon the Paper an Amendment which carried out in effect the suggestion of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James). No doubt, it was desirable that the number of the Judges should be absolutely increased; but there were difficulties in the way at present, and it might be desirable to try to get rid of the present block of business without putting the country to any additional expense. He feared, however, that another year's experience would show that, without an absolute increase in the number of Judges in the Common Law Division, we should not get rid of the present block of business. In that Division, 303 cases were entered for trial at the beginning of the Easter sittings in Middlesex. During those sittings only 97 causes were disposed of, and more causes being entered meanwhile, at the end of the sittings there were 446 causes for trial. At the present moment there were 457 causes in the Common Law Division remaining undisposed of in Middlesex alone. There would be no sittings until November, and causes would continue to be entered until suitors became disgusted. At Guildhall there were 246 causes, including remanets, entered for trial. Two Judges were sitting there now, and probably there would be three sittings there for the next 10 days or a fortnight; but he should be surprised if, at the end of the sitting, still more causes did not remain to go over until Michaelmas term. Such a state of things had never existed before, and was absolutely intolerable. To remedy it, there must either be a considerable increase in the number of Judges, or else some provision must be made as regarded the place of trial. The provision for one Judge sitting alone would give some increase of judicial strength, but would not suffice to remove the block. Another remedy might, perhaps, be supplied by preventing so many local causes from being brought to London. Local venues, instead of being abolished, should be extended, and he suggested a rule that causes of action arising in a particular district should be tried at the Assizes in that district, subject to the Judges' power to change the venue, not as of course, but upon good cause shown. Such a provision would relieve the London Courts to some extent; but even then a block of business would remain, which nothing but the addition to the number of Judges he had referred to or a better arrangement of the cause list could obviate. From inquiries he had made he was inclined to believe that the state of things was worse in the Chancery than in the Common Law Division. The change made by the Judicature Act, which did away with evidence by affidavit and required it to be given orally, was a change for the better; but it had had the effect of lengthening the trial of causes. He had been informed of one case in which witnesses had been kept in town for a month, and the fund in Court having been exhausted by these expenses, the solicitors met and put an end to the cause altogether. In the Chancery Division a radical change was absolutely necessary. Either the number of Courts must be increased, or many cases which now came into them must be tried at the Assizes. The present state of business in the Chancery Courts was a crying evil, and he feared nothing could be done to remedy that growing evil during the present Session, but he hoped some legislation in regard to it would be proposed by the Government next Session.

MR. LOPES said, he entirely approved of the Bill so far as it went, but he disapproved entirely of the Amendments of the hon. and learned Attorney General for giving effect to the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton. It must be admitted that there was at present a great block of business, and in order to lessen it the proposal was that three Judges were to be withdrawn from the Courts of primary jurisdiction, and transferred to the Court of Appeal, and questions of law were to be decided by a Judge at Nisi Prius, and were not to come to the Court in Banco. But the dead-lock was in the Courts of primary jurisdiction; it was in the Courts of Nisi Prius that the stoppage existed. There were 18 Common Law Judges; it was proposed to withdraw three and leave 15; and the hon. and learned Member for Taunton assumed that questions now heard in Banco would be tried at Nisi Prius, and that in this way additional strength would be gained for the Court of Appeal. But how could it be expected that 15 Judges would be able to deal with business which 18 Judges were now unable to dispose of? What would happen would be that questions of fact would be decided by juries, and questions of law would be reserved for the Judge sitting in London, who would be obliged to have a kind of Court of his own to hear questions of law arising out of the facts of the cases he had already tried on circuit. Now, when questions of law arose at Nisi Prius it often happened that litigants had the advantage of hearing the solemn opinion of the Judge pronounced at the time, and the matter did not go any further; but under the proposed arrangement the Judges would pretty well have their time taken up in hearing points which now never came into Banco. Hence, instead of there being a limited number of appeals involving important points, the number of appeals would be quadrupled. Therefore, no advantage would be gained by the transference of these three Judges. But another consideration showed how absurd this proposition was. These three Judges were to go circuit, and when they returned, instead of being at the Court of Appeal, they would have to hear the questions of law which had arisen on circuit. The Court of Appeal was not so strong as it ought to be, and he thought the best remedy would be to appoint two permanent Judges, leaving the constitution of the Courts of primary jurisdiction alone. The time was not far distant when the Government would be obliged to increase the judicial strength of the country. But apart from considerations as to whether the scheme was good or bad—and bad it was beyond all question—was it not a mistake to introduce it at the fag-end of a Session, as a mere supplement to a Bill intended for an entirely different purpose? It created such an important change as ought to form the subject-matter of an independent Bill. The Profession, the Judges, and the public ought to have a full opportunity of forming an opinion upon it. He ventured to say that not half the Judges at present knew what changes would be effected by the proposals of the hon. and learned Attorney General. He had consulted some of the Judges and could say that they did not approve of the scheme. He did not blame the hon. and learned Gentleman, who had inherited the scheme from the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, but he must say that these changes, if made, would have a most disastrous effect.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that in the Chancery Division, unless some remedy was speedily applied to this boasted Judicature Act, from which such wonders were to be expected, it would end in a complete breakdown of the judicial system. It was strange that in the Common Law Division three Judges were required to decide the question of rating a beer-house, while a single Judge sitting at Lincoln's Inn could satisfactorily determine questions involving hundreds of thousands of pounds, arising under wills or in connection with public companies, besides disentangling the facts out of which the legal questions arose, and at the same time performing the double functions of both Judge and jury. And yet Judges on circuit were giving a week to places where four or five cases were entered for trial. As a temporary expedient there was a good deal to be said for the plan proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton; it was better than that of enabling a Lord Chancellor to take any Judge out of his Court and put him in the Appellate Court, with the result of closing the Rolls' Court for 20 days out of 23. The Judges in the Chancery Division were very hardly worked, the intervals between the sittings barely allowing them time to prepare the judgments they reserved. They were worked as hard as it was possible to work men, and if they had not iron constitutions they could not get through the work they did. Our judicial strength was fixed 35 years ago; there had been an enormous increase of wealth and population since; and the change made by the Judicature Act enormously increased the business in the Chancery Division, to which the taking of voir dire evidence had transferred many causes which used formerly to be heard in the Common Law Courts. The other day a witness, who had described the condition of a water-course a month ago, was asked what its present condition was, and he replied that he could not say, because he had been attending the Court for a month, waiting for the case to come on. It would be infinitely cheaper for litigants to obtain a Judge by subscription than to waste such a length of time for their cases to be heard. The four Chancery Courts began the sittings with 504 cases, and had disposed of less than 100, but meanwhile 237 new causes had been entered on the Paper, and, of course, such a rate of increase could end only in complete dead-lock. The only remedy for this state of things was an increase of the judicial Staff, which it was not popular to advocate. The public were apathetic upon the subject, and when the lawyers proposed an addition to the judicial Staff, they were supposed to have some sinister object in view. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), 12 months ago, with tears in his eyes, implored the Government not to appoint any more Judges. When the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had experienced the inconveniences of the present condition of things, his opposition to the increase in the number of Judges would have more weight. It was said that there were not men at the Bar of sufficient standing to supply a larger judicial Staff; but he believed there were as good fish in the sea as had come out of it; and the experiment of appointing Official Referees had not been so satisfactory as to tempt the House to resort to expedients of that character. They had to strengthen the Intermediate Court of Appeal at the expense of the Courts of First Instance, and they would become still weaker unless the Government were strong enough and possessed the courage to grapple with the question, and until they appointed four additional Judges there would be a dead-lock, and the disorganization of our judicial system would be as great as in the worst days and the worst times of Lord Eldon.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, they were now dealing with the Courts of Common Law, in reference to which the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) did not profess to speak with authority. It was admitted there was a waste of judicial strength which might be economized through three Judges doing work that one might do, and it was not unreasonable to try the economy which was possible before increasing the number of Judges. He hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General would adhere to these Amendments despite what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. Lopes), for there must be a great saving of time if three Judges heard separately cases which they formerly heard together; and, besides, sitting singly, they could not waste time by disputes among themselves. He could not understand why a Common Law Judge should be supposed to be so inferior to an Equity Judge that he could not dispose singly of cases not of a tenth of the importance of those which Equity Judges decided every day. It was certainly not very complimentary to them. What was going on on circuit at the present moment was an absolute scandal. They had sent down four Judges, two to Sussex and two to Surrey, within 50 miles of London, to perform an amount of duty which might be easily disposed of by one Judge in two days, and have prevented the breaking up of the Courts in London. Surely such a state of things called for a radical change. It was, he considered, utterly unreasonable, in the present state of things, to ask for more Judges. The great cause of the waste of judicial power lay in this, that the Judges were being constantly called off from doing one thing before they had finished it to begin doing something else. He would find ample work for the Judges, as he would have them constantly going circuit. There would be no effectual reform until the circuits had been altered by substituting the constant attendance of a Judge at such places as Leeds, Liverpool, and Manchester. The delay in the delivery of our gaols was also a grievance calling for an immediate remedy, as often those awaiting their trial had to remain five or six months in custody. The liberty of the subject was infringed by the lengthened period of incarceration before trial, and an injustice was done from Judges not going constantly into the country and doing the work which the public had a right to expect from them. There was no other part of the world in which such a thing was possible.

MR. CHARLEY said, the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), while ostensibly he asked the country to economize its present judicial power before creating any new Judges, actually proposed to effect that economy by a diminution of the Judges sitting in Westminster by constantly sending them off to the country on circuit. His opinion, however, was that the work was too heavy for the number of Judges at present on the Bench. This was seen at the Assizes, when the Judges going circuit had to call in the services of one or more of the Queen's counsel mentioned in the Commission to take the criminal business off their hands. That was, he considered, a denial of justice to the prisoners, who had a right to be tried by one of the regular Judges. The present Court of Appeal in Chancery gave general satisfaction, and the only objection to it in the eyes of the Bar was that it had not a local habitation, but shifted its sittings from one building to another; at present it was obliged to take refuge in a Committee-room of the House of Lords, opposite a refreshment bar. Strengthened by such Common Law Judges as Baron Bramwell and Mr. Justice Blackburn, it would form an excellent Appellate Court in general.

MR. H. COLE said, the Intermediate Court of Appeal was a most incongruous Court. The attendance of the Master of the Rolls increased the arrears of cases in his own Court, and the same in the Common Law Courts, by taking away the Chief Justices to preside in this new Court. Thus the accumulation of business did not belong to the Court of Appeal, which was well able to get through its work, but to the Courts of First Instance. He had been informed only two or three days ago that there were in Middlesex alone as many as 1,000 remanets at Nisi Prius, and the state of things was, he believed, still worse in the metropolis itself. It appeared, indeed, to such a pass had things come that mercantile men, instead of entering their causes, preferred settling them at any hazard. The only remedy for this was an increase in the number of the Judges, and the more so, inasmuch as the tendency of the Judicature Act had been to bring cases from the country up to London and Middlesex for trial. They all recognized the necessity for a strong Court of Appeal, and that they ought to provide at once. He repeated the arrears of business were not in Banco, but in the Courts of First Instance. The great defect of the present Appeal Court was that it had no chief. There was no head to direct its movements, and no one could tell where it was sitting, or what cases would be heard at any particular time. For his own part, he should wish to see the Intermediate Court of Appeal made as strong as possible, and he concurred in the proposal that two Judges should be placed permanently in the Court, and that it should be done at once, instead of, as now, taking them away from the Nisi Prius when the business was greatly in arrears. The Intermediate Court of Appeal was becoming a most important one, and it ought not to be obliged to have to borrow Judges to get on with its business, and those not always the best. As matters stood, the judicial Staff was unable to cope with the work which it had to do, although it struggled hard, and it was only in the way which he mentioned that the present dead-lock could be done away with.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the Bill had been introduced with two objects—the first to strengthen the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal, and the second to strengthen the Intermediate Court. The provisions of the Bill, so far as it dealt with the first object, had met, he was happy to say, with general approval; but the provisions for strengthening the Intermediate Court of Appeal were somewhat different from those which had been originally proposed. Now, he was not one of those who thought that Court had proved unsatisfactory. On the contrary, he thought it had shown itself to be a good and strong Court; but, still, it was defective, because part of its Members consisted of a shifting body. It would be much better that such a Court should consist of permanent Judges, and that it should sit in two Divisions, which it could not well do now without calling to its aid some of the ex-officio Judges, which would not be convenient. That object might be effected by an extension of the plan suggested by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton. That was to say, by taking three instead of two Judges from the Common Law Divisions of the High Court and placing them in the Intermediate Court of Appeal. And if, for instance, three of the ablest Judges were transferred from the Queen's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer, to sit with Lords Justices James, Mellish, and Baggallay, the result would no doubt be that an extremely strong Court would be constituted. Then came the question, could that be done without creating additional Judges; and if it could not, the matter was one of such great importance, relating as it did to the proper administration of justice, that, speaking for himself, he should certainly advise that new Judges should be appointed. There were, however, some difficulties connected with such an arrangement. A serious financial difficulty had, for example, to be encountered at the outset, for however little some hon. Members might think of an outlay of £10,000 or £20,000, it might not be very agreeable to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He did not, he might add, agree with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton in the opinion that there would be any difficulty, if additional Judges were required in procuring good men from the Bar to fill those appointments. He would undertake to provide 20 of the most able and capable men from the ranks of the Bar for the purpose without the slightest difficulty, while as to the diminution of dignity of which his hon. and learned Friend spoke, he did not attach much importance to that argument either. It was, he thought, as dignified a position to occupy to be one of three out of 20 Judges in a country where there was a great amount of business as one of three out of five in a country where there was much less. Indeed, if he could only secure the service of an able and expeditious Judge, he should forgive him if he was not quite so dignified as he might be. But the question remained, could the plan which he proposed be carried out without duly interfering with the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions of the High Court? He thought it could, because since the new Court of Appeal had been constituted the Judges of those Courts had in some respects less to do, inasmuch as they had been relieved of the duty of sitting on Appeals in the Exchequer Chamber. If the present proposal were carried there would be 15 Judges left. He took it that there were 220 working days in the year, and if 100 days were occupied on circuit, there would remain 120 days in which the Judges could sit in Banco. Three Judges of the Intermediate Court of Appeal would go on circuit, and consequently 11 other Judges would be required for the circuits and one for Chambers. Then we should still have three Judges who could sit during the whole of the 220 days for the purpose of disposing of jury trials or Nisi Prius causes. It had been stated by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton that something like 3,500 Nisi Prius trials had to be disposed of in the course of the year in London and Middlesex alone. If we had a judicial force of three Judges sitting all the year round during the 220 days, and if they took five cases a-day, which would be nearer the mark than three cases, as the hon. and learned Member for Taunton assumed, 3,300 cases would be disposed of. From his own experience he might say it was not an unfair or improper calculation that five causes could be disposed of in the course of a day. Therefore, with three Judges and a little assistance, all the cases in London and Middlesex might be disposed of. Then 12 Judges would be able to sit for 120 days in Banco. There would be three Judges for each Division and three over. In his opinion, if the Judges properly utilized their strength they could get through a vast deal more business than they did at present. For instance, they might to some extent adopt the course pursued by the Chancery Judges. Again, it was absurd for two or three Judges to sit in order to hear applications for rules Nisi. Such applications might, he thought, be made to a single Judge, and when the rule came to be argued, the contentious proceedings might well be disposed of by two Judges. If that were done the Judges would be quite capable of grappling with the business. It had been said that the Chancery Division of the High Court was undermanned. If that were really the case the deficiency must, of course, be supplied by the appointment of additional Judges. It ought, however, to be borne in mind that cases might be transferred from one Division to another, and that in this way the Chancery Division might be relieved of the burdens imposed on it. After all, this was a matter of experiment, and if it turned out that the Chancery Division of the High Court could not grapple with the business brought before it without additional strength, of course additional strength must be supplied. With regard to the Common Law Divisions, we were also in a transition state, and if it turned out that the business could not be transacted by the 15 Judges who would be left in those Divisions, the Government must undoubtedly apply the only possible remedy—namely, the appointment of additional Judges. There was originally a provision in the Bill which he should propose to omit, to the effect that when two of the paid Members of the Privy Council should die or resign an additional Judge should be appointed to the Intermediate Court of Appeal. Instead of that, he should propose that when two of the paid Members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council resigned or died, if it appeared there was a demand for the appointment of a fresh Judge in the Divisions of the High Court, an additional Judge should be appointed. In like manner, when the two remaining paid Privy Council Judges dropped off, another additional Judge might, if necessary, be appointed to those Divisions. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), on the debate on the second reading of the Bill, urged the desirability of having Members of the Judicial Committee who were conversant with the laws administered in India and the Colonies, with the Roman-Dutch law, and so forth. No doubt that was desirable. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: It is necessary.] However desirable, he did not think it was absolutely necessary, as Judges of intelligence could quickly make themselves acquainted with the laws which they had to administer. But though not necessary, it was desirable, and accordingly a provision had been made in one of the Amendments for carrying out the suggestion. With regard to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the Government were by the present law authorized to appoint assessors at £400 a-year. The Government thought that that was not a sufficient remuneration to induce competent men to accept the appointment. They therefore proposed to raise the salaries of the assessors from £400 to £1,000 a-year, and they believed that that would be the means of greatly strengthening the Judicial Committee, and there could be no doubt that men of the highest ability would be ready to act with that remuneration.

MR. GREGORY said, that when the Judicature Amendment Act was first before Parliament, he had proposed an addition of two Judges to the Intermediate Court of Appeal, which was carried in that House; but the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) opposed it on the score of economy, and induced the Chancellor of the Exchequer to adopt his views. If that plan had been adopted it would have prevented much of the dead-lock and inconvenience which had since arisen. The salaries of the Judges might be provided by the gradual suppression of a number of small offices, or by the discharge of the duties of certain offices by subordinates. For example, he thought that the duties of associates and clerks of Assize, whatever those duties were, might be performed by Judges' clerks. No doubt, the proposal of the hon. and learned Attorney General would tend to strengthen the Intermediate Court of Appeal. It had always been his opinion that two Divisions of this Court would be necessary, and his prediction had been verified. But the success of the proposal of the hon. and learned Attorney General depended upon the principle that single Judges should sit in Banco, and the clause carrying out that proposal was so full of qualifications that it would never work in practice, and required further consideration. He approved the principle that sittings in Banco should be assimilated to sittings of the Court of Chancery, and that a single Judge should dispose of such cases; but an increase in the number of Judges was what we must ultimately come to. The Chancery Division required strengthening, not only because evidence was now taken vidé voce, and much time was thus occupied, but because the Chancery Judges should be enabled to give more time and attention to business in Chambers, which was often very important. The Chief Clerks had made no fewer than 20,000 orders in the course of last year, and the Judges should sit at least one day a-week for Chamber practice.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he approved up to a certain point of the Amendments which the hon. and learned Attorney General had placed upon the Table; but he wished it to be understood that he supported them only as a temporary means of meeting the difficulty. The true remedy, and the one to which we must in the end come, was an increase in the number of the Judges, a necessity which, from mistaken notions of economy, the Government had hitherto declined to recognize.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS also deprecated the cold-blooded political economy which measured the number of Judges by the purse of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He could not conceive that anyone who had studied the question could think that the country could have any interest in stinting the number of Judges for the sake of saving £10,000, £15,000, or £20,000 a-year. He rose, however, specially to refer to the trial of Election Petitions. He thought it was very objectionable that the character and fate of Members of Parliament and candidates should depend upon a single Judge. The Committee which investigated the subject last year recommended that all Election Petitions should be tried by at least two Judges. The Government had promised a Bill dealing with the subject, but though they were now within a month of the close of the Session, it had not yet been introduced, and they would probably have another Continuance Bill. The proposal to take three Judges from the Common Law Divisions and add them to the Intermediate Court of Appeal he regarded as utterly inadequate to meet the circumstances of the case.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER strongly deprecated interference with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which had administered peculiar laws to the satisfaction of 200,000,000 of people and of a very large population in the colonies. The Judicial Committee was now composed of men peculiarly conversant with Hindoo and Mahomedan law, and with the Dutch and French Civil Law existing in some of our colonies.

SIR ANDREW LUSK, as a mercantile man, complained of the uncertainty, delay, and expense of legal proceedings. Parties could not get a case settled without waiting till they were sick of waiting. Between delay and expense justice often went to the wall, and a man had much better put up with the first injury than go to law. He hoped this question would be fairly considered, and, if necessary, that additional Judges would be appointed.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN complained that the law was becoming more and more uncertain, more dilatory, more expensive, and more unsatisfactory. Great numbers of cases were waiting for hearing on account of the insufficiency of the number of Judges, and he trusted that the Government would see their way to the increase of the number. He was strongly in favour of the present "wretched system of holidays" being done away with.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preliminary.

Clause 1 (Short title).

MR. LOPES expressed a hope that the hon. and learned Attorney General would not proceed with the Amendments which he had placed on the Paper that day for the first time. Without some assurance to that effect, he would move that the Chairman report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN intimated that it would not be competent for the hon. and learned Attorney General to proceed with the Amendments referred to, because the Money Vote on which they were founded had not yet been taken.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Commencement of Act), agreed to.

Appeal.

Clause 3 (Cases in which appeal lies to the House of Lords).

MR. MARTEN moved, in page 1, line 16, after "England," to insert—

"And of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice in England, or of any Judges or Judge thereof; from which an appeal would lie to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in England, and so that the final appeal may be made immediately, without recourse to the Court of Intermediate Appeal."

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT seconded the Amendment.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN supported it, the system having worked well in the Courts of Chancery.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he was of opinion that an Intermediate Court of Appeal should be established, but he did not see why people should be forced to go there.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not see his way to the adoption of the Amendment, the object of which was to avoid the Court of Intermediate Appeal. If the parties agreed to an arrangement to take their case at once before the House of Lords, they would have the power of doing so; but in important cases he thought it most desirable that the House of Lords should have the benefit of the opinion of the primary Court of Appeal. The effect of the Amendment would be to set up a competition between the two Courts of Appeal.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that in practice the power of carrying the appeal directly to the House of Lords had been found most convenient, and had tended to the diminution of expense, and he knew of no case of hardship having arisen.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he could not see the advantage of compelling parties to go through the Intermediate Court, and thereby incurring an additional expense.

MR. H. COLE also could not see any objection to parties skipping the Court of Intermediate Appeal and going direct to the House of Lords, but he regarded the Amendment as an attempt to get rid of the Court of Intermediate Appeal, in which matters were thoroughly sifted.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS believed that no difficulty existed with regard to cases in Chancery; but thought some difficulty might arise in respect to cases in the Common Law Courts.

MR. GREGORY said, he was not prepared to admit that no difficulties had arisen with regard to cases in Chancery under the old system.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Form of appeal to House of Lords), agreed to.

Clause 5 (Attendance of certain number of Lords of Appeal required at hearing and determination of appeals).

On the Motion of Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Amendment made in page 2, line 5, by inserting after "Chancellor," the words "of Great Britain."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. CHARLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 15, at end, add—

"and shall then only take effect, in case the number of Peers of Parliament for the time being holding, or who shall have held, any of the offices in this Act described as high judicial offices, shall not exceed five."

SIR HENRY JAMES opposed the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not accept it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he was of opinion that only persons of judicial experience should sit in the Supreme Court of Appeal, and would therefore move in page 2, line 20, to leave out all after "offices," to the end of line 22.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN hoped the Amendment would not be accepted, as it would limit the area of selection.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not see his way to accept the Amendment, which would limit the choice of the Lord Chancellor to the Puisne Judges.

SIR HENRY JAMES supported the Amendment. He thought the Minister of the day should have no inducement to appoint a Judge from political motives. They were asked to confer a political vote as well as a judicial appointment.

Amendment, in page 2, line 27, after "every," insert—

"Peer of Parliament for the time being holding, or who shall have held, any of the offices in this Act described as high judicial offices, who shall be present at and take part in the hearing and determination of appeals to the House of Lords, the sum of one thousand pounds a year, such sum to be additional to any sum to which he may be entitled under any Act or Acts by way of pension. There shall be paid to every,"—(Mr. Charley), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, in page 2, line 28, leave out "six," and insert "eight,"—(Sir Eardley Wilmot)—negatived,

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he should move that the Chairman report Progress. The next Amendment, which stood in his name, involved a question of great Constitutional importance, and in the short interval of 40 minutes which remained before the House must adjourn, it would be impossible properly to discuss so interesting a question. The clause proposed that every Lord of Appeal in Ordinary, not a Peer, should rank as a Baron, and it was provided that he—

"shall during the time that he continues in his office as a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary, and no longer, be entitled to a writ of summons to attend, and to sit and vote in the House of Lords."

His proposal was to omit the words, "during the time that he continues in in his office as a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary, and no longer." But the question could not be properly raised at such a time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the Motion, observing that the Committee could very well deal with the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN supported the Motion to report Progress. The Amendment, he observed, was of a very important nature, one touching the very essence of the Bill, and involving the honour and dignity of Parliament. It would, moreover, be followed by other Amendments of almost equal importance.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD suggested that it would be a better course to proceed with the Bill, and to postpone the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment.

SIR HENRY JAMES advised the Committee to report Progress, as they had only another half-hour to devote to the Bill at that sitting, and he thought it would be advantageous to the further discussion of the measure, if they did not proceed with it further at that time.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 29; Noes 156: Majority 127.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 33, after the word "shall," to leave out the words to "longer" in the following line. The effect of the Amendment would be to omit the words which declare a Peer entitled to a Writ of Summons "during the time that he continues in his office as a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary and no longer." The object of certain Members of that and the other House had, he said, been to retain that ancient jurisdiction which the House of Lords, to their credit and in the interests of the public, had themselves relinquished. He would admit that when Parliament came to establish a Final Court of Appeal for

Great Britain and Ireland it stumbled upon a difficulty as to Ireland and Scotland. It was not satisfactory to those countries to bring their appeals to London to be settled by a purely English Court of Law. He did not, therefore, complain that the Final Court should be so constituted as to meet all the requirements of the case; but if the Government had framed a scheme for retaining the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, he should have expected that the scheme would have been compatible with the dignity of the House of Lords itself, and with the objects for which this new Court of Appeal was about to be established. Instead, however, of creating Peers for life, as the Government ought to have done, if they desired to give proper status and dignity to the post, and to attract men of the same high class as had hitherto occupied the position of Law Lords, what had the Government done? They had created for the first time in our history statutory Peers. He was not aware of a single instance in our legal and political history in which such a thing had been done. It had always been held that the Crown was the source of honour and dignities. He did not, however, complain that the House of Lords had asserted the power of creating a new dignity, but the form in which it had been done was a novelty that had been reserved for a Conservative Government. They had created a class of Peers who were not to be Peers for life, but Peers at will—Peers at the pleasure of the holder—and Peers during good behaviour. These Lords of Appeal in Ordinary would hold the rank of Baron for life; they were to receive a Writ of Summons to the House of Lords as long as they discharged appellate duties, and they would be removable, like other Judges, for misconduct. Would such a proposal be likely to attract the proper class of men, or was it consistent with the dignity of the Peerage? It had been said that these Lords of Appeal would be Lords of Parliament only and not Peers; but such high authorities as the Lord Chancellor, Lord Selborne, and Lord Hatherley had spoken of them as Peers. They had also been compared to the Scotch and Irish Peers, and even to the Bishops; but he contended that there was no analogy whatever between them. Were this proposal carried out, a weak and ambitious man might cling to office when he was no longer fit for his duties, and a subservient man might truckle to the Government in order to have an hereditary Peerage, while a man of independent spirit who had excited party animosities might be passed over or prematurely relegated to obscurity.

And it being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, Debate adjourned.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress, to sit again this day.

And it being now five minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its sitting.

The House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

COMMITTAL AND TREATMENT OF LUNATICS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DILLWYN, in rising to call attention to the operation of the existing Laws relating to the committal and custody of lunatics; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, those Laws do not afford sufficient safeguards against illegal incarceration and the maltreatment of lunatic patients," said, that last Session he called the attention of the Home Secretary to the case of a Miss Wood, who held peculiar religious views, and he took up her case on the ground that she had been incarcerated improperly and without the Lunacy Laws having been complied with. His right hon. Friend immediately directed inquiries to be made, and the result was that Miss Wood was liberated, it being proved that she had been improperly imprisoned. It seemed, however, that she was shortly afterwards again committed and imprisoned. That lady might have been a lunatic; but he was somewhat startled at the manner in which the laws affecting lunatics were in the instance of her first incarceration dispensed with, and he therefore had instituted inquiries in regard to the working of those laws. The result of his inquiries satisfied him of two things; first, that the law affecting the custody and treatment of lunatics was in general very loosely administered; and secondly, that the laws themselves were inherently bad. With regard to the lax administration of the law, hon. Members who were magistrates must have noticed in their several counties the great increase of lunatic patients which had led to great difficulty in making provision of county asylums and other accommodation for their reception. He believed a great deal of that increase was due to the extremely lax administration of the Lunacy Laws. From a Return, signed by the clerk of the St. George's Union, Middlesex, it appeared that through the exertions of one of the Guardians who had investigated the matter, the number of lunatics in that Union had been considerably reduced, it being found that a great number of them had been improperly sent there. He would also call the attention of hon. Members to the Reports of the Lunacy Commissioners in 1872 and 1873 to show the lax administration of the law. He found that in one asylum it had been the practice to call in the aid of men-servants to assist in restraining the violence of female patients, and that in another case a lunatic's death had been caused by violence, but he was not aware that there had been a prosecution in that case. What he desired was that the private lunatic should be placed in the same position as the pauper lunatic. The latter were placed under the care of public medical officers, and placed in a public institution subject to public inspection. The fact was, the Lunacy Law, instead of being strongly enforced, as it ought to be, was administered very laxly. That state of things, he believed, was mainly owing to the fact that, practically speaking, the prosecution of violations of the Lunacy Law rested with the Lunacy Commissioners alone, and to them was thus to be attributed in some measure the existing loose state of the administration of the law. He did not think that the power of prosecution ought to rest with those who might reasonably be expected to feel that such prosecutions would be virtually indictments against themselves, and he knew frequent instances in which those persons desirous of instituting these prosecutions were not satisfied with the veto thus practically possessed by the Commissioners, as they believed, rightly or wrongly, that their disposition was rather to condone than to prosecute infringements of the Lunacy Laws in asylums, being supposed to be often on terms of friendly footing with the proprietors, being supposed to be hospitably received on the occasion of their visits to the asylums, and being themselves to some extent responsible for irregularities which occurred in establishments licensed and supervised by them. The question whether there should be a prosecution ought to rest, not with those who were mixed up more or less with the management of lunatic asylums, but either with the Law Officers or some competent independent authority who would not be under any suspicion of favouritism. Again, with regard to detention, he considered it most objectionable that the proprietors of private asylums, who had an interest in keeping the lunatics as long as possible, should have the power to decide whether a man should continue to be incarcerated. The medical man who was in constant attendance was the only person who could really decide whether a man was insane or not. The visiting magistrates were not competent to decide such a question. As to the necessity for an alteration of the law, he might call in aid Lord Shaftesbury, who was the head of the Lunacy Law Commission, and who said, in his evidence before the Select Committee, that the proprietors of asylums were under a severe temptation to detain patients, their object being to get as many patients as long as they can, and stint them in medicines, food, and comfort. Let the House contrast the position of a pauper lunatic sent to a public asylum presided over by the county magistrates, whose interest it was that the lunatic should not be detained a day longer than was necessary, with that of a lunatic confined in a private asylum, the proprietor of which, who had the most potential voice in determining whether the confinement should be prolonged, had a direct interest in keeping the lunatic in the asylum as long as possible. He was only astonished that the noble Lord should have consented to remain so long at the head of the Lunacy Law Commission, without endeavouring to procure an alteration of the law, so as to rectify the abuses he had described. As regarded the private patients, he would, in the first place, do away with the Lunacy Commissioners; and, in the next place, he should require that no person should be placed in a lunatic asylum without the warrant of some public authority. He further proposed that all private lunatic asylums should be abolished, and that all such places of confinement should be public institutions. He thought no lunatic should be set at large without the most careful examination into his state of mind, because his own experience as a visiting magistrate had shown him the difficulty of determining whether or not a person who had once been a lunatic was sufficiently recovered to be released with safety; but he utterly denied that the person most competent to form a correct opinion in such cases, and who must therefore necessarily have a most potential voice in the decision arrived at, should have a direct pecuniary interest either one way or another in such decision. His first intention was to ask the House to appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject; but it was now too late for this purpose, and he had therefore preferred to bring the matter forward in its present form in the hope that the Government would consider the question in the Recess with a view to early legislation. The opinion of Lord Shaftesbury to some extent agreed with his own upon the subject, and he hoped it would be taken up by the Government. He would not move any Resolution on the subject. He would content himself, after the statement he had made, to leave the matter in the hands of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he was deeply sensible of the importance of the subject, but he was glad that the hon. Gentleman had determined to leave the question to be dealt with by the Government on their Ministerial responsibility. There was no doubt a defect in the management of these private asylums, and he hoped the Government would turn their attention to the subject.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter after Ten o'clock till Monday next.

TURKEY—ALLEGED ATROCITIES IN BULGARIA.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: I beg to put a Question to the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, of which I have given him private Notice, with regard to the alleged atrocities in Bulgaria on the part of the irregular troops of the Porte. I shall be glad to know if he has any information of an official character which he can communicate to the House?

THE EARL OF DERBY: I am not in a position to give any definite information of the kind which the noble Earl desires. After the Question which was put the other day by a noble Duke who is not now in his place (the Duke of Argyll), I wrote to Sir Henry Elliot to know what information he could give on the subject. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed for an answer to be received. Seeing, however, that statements of a similar character to those referred to in this House have been repeated in the Press, and that they have excited strong public feeling in this country, I this morning, before Notice of the Question reached me from the noble Earl, telegraphed to Sir Henry Elliot to communicate to us what he knows on the subject with the least possible delay. At present the only information I have on the matter in question is unofficial, and it does not confirm to anything like the full extent the statements which have appeared in the Press.

SCIENCE AND ART—THE TRANSIT OF VENUS.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, When the results of the observations of the Transit of Venus may be expected to be made public?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he was told that the results could not be made public for six months, or, perhaps, a longer period. Of course, he should be glad to make the results public as soon as they had been ascertained.

TURKEY—BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA. QUESTION.

MR. BRUCE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can fix a day for the discussion of the Motion on the affairs of Bosnia and Herzegovina?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, I think it will be scarcely possible, in a manner satisfactory to the House, to fix a day for a discussion on the subject to which my hon. Friend refers until we have the Papers on the Table, because we must act according to precedent in the matter, and when the Papers are on the Table the noble Lord opposite may wish, and it will be perfectly open to him, to bring the subject under the consideration of the House. Of course, under these circumstances, every independent Member on either side will defer to the claim of the noble Lord. I quite recognize that my hon. Friend has a locus standi in this question in the Notice he has previously given; and assuming, as a matter of course, that there will be a discussion on the subject—even if there may not be one which involves the opinion of the House by a formal Motion—I should, under those circumstances, recognize the claim of my hon. Friend and endeavour to meet his convenience. But until the Papers are on the Table, I think I should hardly do justice to the feelings of the House if I made any arrangement for the discussion of a question of such an important character by a private Member.

WEST INDIES—ISLAND OF ST. VINCENT.—QUESTION.

ADMIRAL EGERTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to a Question put by the honourable Member for Longford on May 11th relating to an irregular payment reported to have been made by the authority of the Lieutenant Governor of St. Vincent, If any and what explanation has been received at the Colonial Office?

MR. J. LOWTHER: An explanation, Sir, has been received from the Lieutenant Governor of St. Vincent, in reply to inquiries made in consequence of the Question put to me on the date referred to by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Longford. From this explanation, it appears that the hon. Gentleman was misinformed in the matter. The facts are that the Lieutenant Governor, in the exercise of the power vested in him, remitted the fees of Court, amounting to £12 8s. 9d., due to the Treasury from the plaintiffs in a suit, who were destitute orphan children. It is only right that I should add that the Lieutenant Governor appears to have exercised a wise discretion in the matter.

IRELAND—THE UPPER SHANNON.

QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, considering how little the Upper Shannon is used for navigation, he would be prepared to sanction and assist in removing or modifying the obstructions such as Termon Wall, by which the water is kept back and whole tracts of country flooded, and fishing interests sacrificed?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am not prepared, Sir, to admit that the works at Termanbarry do so much injury to the Shannon Valley, or that the navigation of the Upper Shannon is so useless as would appear to be implied by the hon. Member's Question. If, however, it were proved that the injury which may be done would be materially diminished by the insertion of sluices in the weirs, and the landowners were prepared to bear their fair proportion of the expense, the Government would be ready to consider any proposals that might be made with that object.

FISHERIES (IRELAND) — TRAWLING VESSELS IN GALWAY BAY.

QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any decision has yet been come to on the subject of the inquiry held in 1872, as to the use of trawling vessels in Galway Bay; if not, whether he can explain the cause of the great delay in arriving at such a decision; and, whether he will impress on the fishing authorities the propriety of deciding the question without further delay?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I think I informed the hon. Member, at an early period of the Session, of the reasons for the delay in arriving at a decision on the subject of the inquiry held in 1872 as to trawling in Galway Bay. The result of that inquiry was, that experiments were directed to be made in every month in the year as to the effect produced by trawling on the fisheries in the bay. These experiments were entrusted to the Coastguard, and were conducted in several months of the years 1872 and 1873, but were then discontinued, the officer conducting them being removed. His successor was understood to have resumed them, but he became of unsound mind, and on his leaving the district no record could be found of what he had done. The experiments were again resumed in 1875, and August is now the only month of the year in which they have not been carried out. It is expected that they will then be completed, and the Inspectors will be in a position to make a decision on the matter. In the meantime, fishing of every description is being carried on without interference.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—MILITIA STAFF PENSIONS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he proposes to give pensions to non-commissioned officers and men of the permanent staff of Militia regiments on their discharge after twenty-one years' service?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he hoped a revised pension-list would shortly be issued, which would show his hon. and gallant Friend how it was proposed to deal with this class of officers.

ITALY — CASE OF MR. WILLIAM MERCER.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING MAXWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps Her Majesty's Government have taken or are taking to obtain from the Government of the King of Italy repayment of the expenses incurred by Mr. William Mercer at his trial in 1873 on certain false charges by the police of Castellamare, and payment of compensation for ill-treatment received at the hands of the police, for which Her Majesty's Minister in Italy, in August, 1873, was instructed by Earl Granville, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to prefer a claim?

Mr. J. Lowther

MR. BOURKE: The proceedings, Sir, in regard to Mr. William Mercer occurred in the Italian Courts in 1873, and resulted in Mr. Mercer's acquittal. Sir Augustus Paget, then Her Majesty's Minister at Rome, was instructed by Her Majesty's Government to represent the whole of the facts to the Italian Government, and to express an opinion that the Government ought to consider the equity of the claim Mr. Mercer had against them for the sufferings he had endured. To this representation of Her Majesty's Government the Italian Government positively refused to listen in the way in which Her Majesty's Government expected them to do. Under these circumstances the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown was taken, and another representation was made to the Italian Government, who represented that they had already tried the police of Castellamare, who had caused the sufferings of Mr. Mercer, and that they had been punished. They added that if Mr. Mercer considered he had been ill-used the Courts of Law in Italy were open to him, and that his case would receive exactly the same consideration from a tribunal as if he was an Italian subject. Mr. Mercer had not, in the exercise of his discretion, chosen to appeal to an Italian Court, and, under the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government thought they could not interfere further on his behalf.

POST OFFICE—CAPE OF GOOD HOPE MAIL CONTRACT.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Postmaster General, If it be correct that the contract for the conveyance of the Cape of Good Hope Mails, dated 19th December 1872, with the Union Steam Shipping Company has been cancelled; if so, if he will state upon what terms; whether it be his intention to submit the future conveyance of the Mails to public competition, or enter into a private contract with the owners of one or both the existing steam lines; and, if he will consent to place upon the Table of the House all correspondence between the Post Office, the Cape Government, and owners of vessels now carrying the Mails?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the contract entered into by the Post Office with the Union Company in 1872 was not submitted to the House by the Government of the day; but probably what the hon. Gentleman referred to was the contract of 1868, for the conveyance of the Cape Mails, and which terminated at the close of last month, the usual 12 months' notice having been given. The Home Government did not intend to enter into any new contract, the South African colonies having been left to make their own arrangements for the future conveyance of the Mails. He had no objection to produce the correspondence with the Union Steam Shipping Company; but as the Correspondence with the Cape Government had passed through the Colonial Office, he must consult the Under Secretary for the Colonies as to what portion, if any, of that Correspondence could be laid on the Table.

EASTERN QUESTION.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will state definitely the day on which the Papers on the Eastern Question will be in the hands of Members?

MR. DISRAELI: Every effort, Sir, is being made at the Foreign Office in order that these Papers may be laid on the Table. It is impossible for me to say definitely on what day they will be produced, because it does not depend merely upon Her Majesty's Government; but I saw my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs before I came into the House half-an-hour ago, and he told me he thought he might count on their being laid on the Table at the beginning of next week.

DISTURBANCES.—QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether there is any truth in the report of serious disturbances having recently taken place in the Fiji Islands?

MR. J. LOWTHER: It is true, Sir, that some disturbances have occurred in Fiji; but I am happy to say that the reports which have been circulated are considerably exaggerated, and that the disturbances do not deserve the adjective "serious" which my hon. Friend applies to them. It appears that raids were made upon some native villages by a section of the neighbouring mountain tribes. The Governor reports that the outbreaks were of a purely local character, that he had taken prompt steps to restore order, and that he had no apprehension respecting the peace of the colony.

SALMON FISHERIES ACT, 1861—THE SOLWAY.—QUESTION.

MR. STAFFORD HOWARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can state why it is that, whilst all the stake nets on the English side of the Solway were done away with by "The Salmon Fisheries Act, 1861," those on the Scotch side have been allowed to remain; and, whether he can render any assistance in remedying what is felt by the English fishermen to be a great injustice?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he was not in any way responsible for the legislation of 1861, but the fact unfortunately was, that the law on the two sides of the Solway were different. The subject was mentioned in the Reports of the Inspectors of Salmon Fisheries for 1875, who said it was desirable to remove the anomaly, but the Scotch proprietors were indisposed to adopt the necessary legislation. The Esk was under the English Acts; but there would be a strenuous opposition among the proprietors on the north side of the Solway, which was only the estuary of the Esk, to come under the same law.

LAW AND JUSTICE — THE IRISH JUDICIAL BENCH—SERJEANT ARMSTRONG.—QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the insertion of the names of the Serjeants at Law in the Commission of Assize is not such a matter of ordinary routine as not to confer any right, in case of the existence of a vacancy amongst the Judges, to be selected to go as Judge of Assize; whether the statement which has appeared in the Dublin newspapers, to the effect that Serjeant Armstrong has been appointed to go as Judge of Assize, is correct; if so, whether, at the time of the appointment of Serjeant Armstrong to go as Judge of Assize, the Irish Executive were aware that the Serjeant

Armstrong referred to is the same individual as the "Richard Armstrong" whose name was returned by the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the existence of Corrupt Practices at Elections for the Borough of Sligo under Schedule D, as "guilty of bribery;" whether the said Commissioners further reported that "Serjeant Armstrong" had "expended £1,480 in bribery;" "that the number of voters so bribed amounted to 97; of these we have ascertained the names of 65, among whom the sum of £1,200 was distributed;" whether, in consequence of the said report, the borough of Sligo was disfranchised; and, whether, in view of the foregoing circumstances and the precedent in the Stonor case, Her Majesty's Government are still prepared to appoint, or, if appointed, to cancel the appointment of an individual reported and scheduled as "guilty of bribery," to the important judicial office of going Judge of Assize?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Any official action, Sir, in the nature of making or revoking an appointment such as that alluded to in the Question rests with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland rather than with myself, and his Lordship has, therefore, forwarded to me a statement in reply to the hon. Member, which, with the permission of the House, I will read—

"In Ireland there are three Queen's Serjeants, who are always named in the ordinary Commissions for the Assizes together with the Judges. The Queen's Counsel are not named in these Commissions, and if one is sent as Judge, a special Commission is issued for the purpose. When a Judge does not go circuit the proper person to take his place is a Serjeant. If no Serjeant goes, a Queen's Counsel is sent. The first Serjeant is Serjeant Armstrong. The other two Serjeants are in Parliament, and could not go as Judges, both on Constitutional grounds and because the payment they would receive might vacate their seats. Serjeant Armstrong was, under a Royal Commission, issued in June, 1869, to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices in the borough of Sligo, found to have been guilty of corrupt practices at the previous election of 1865, when he was returned to Parliament for the borough of Sligo. The Act of Parliament under which the Commission was held—15 & 16 Vict. c. 57—being with a view to inquiry and not punishment, protects every person who, like Serjeant Armstrong, is examined before such a Commission and makes a full disclosure, and declares that he shall be freed from all penal actions, forfeitures, punishments, disabilities, and incapacities. Serjeant Armstrong was not disturbed in his office of Serjeant either by the Government of the day or any succeeding Government, and has been named in every succeeding Commission as one of the Judges. Nearly 11 years have elapsed since the election in connection with which the corrupt practices occurred, and the Chancellor considered that Serjeant Armstrong, who is of distinguished eminence in his Profession, and who ranks next after the Law Officers, should not be considered disqualified to discharge the duties of his office, and might, therefore, in fulfilment of one of them, preside in the absence of a Judge at the Assizes."

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—THE VICARAGE OF HALIFAX.—QUESTION.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he proposes to introduce the Bill which he has promised with respect to the vicarage of Halifax?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, this question had attracted the attention of the Government, and he had hoped that by this time a Bill would have been introduced, probably in the other House. There was a difficulty, however, which the Government did not see their way to get over—namely, that the Act which regulated the Vicarage of Halifax was a private Act; and, as private interests must therefore be affected, the Government had come to the conclusion that it would be necessary to deal with the subject by a Private Bill.

NAVY—TENDERS FOR SHIPBUILDING. QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, when tenders are invited from eminent engineering shipbuilding firms for Steam Tugs for Her Majesty's Navy, it is usual to select a tender from the list at a considerably higher cost to the Government in lieu of the lowest tender; and, whether such a selection was not made on a very recent occasion?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that when tenders were asked for by the Admiralty there was always a condition that the Admiralty were not bound to accept the lowest or any tender. This condition was inserted because there was often a great difference in the quality of the work and in the experience of different firms. On a recent occasion, as was indicated in the Question, a tender was accepted which was not the lowest tender. There was a sufficient reason for the course taken by the Admiralty, the firm whose tender was accepted having recently built a vessel of the same kind, and having given great satisfaction, while the firm whose tender was the lowest had executed work which had not been of the same satisfactory character.

ARMY—REGIMENTAL EXCHANGES.

QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Secretary of State for War, If it be the case that Officers who exchanged from purchase Regiments prior to the 1st day of November 1871 into either of twelve new Line regiments forfeited thereby the regulation value of their Commissions; and, if so, by what rule or regulation they did so; and, whether they were warned at the time of exchanging that such forfeiture would be the consequence?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, officers who exchanged from Purchase corps into either of the 12 new Line regiments ought to have been fully aware of the nature of such an exchange, as the Regulation on the subject is as follows (extract from Article 65 of the Royal Warrant for Pay and Promotion of the 27th of December, 1870):—

"An officer exchanging from a Purchase regiment into a non-Purchase regiment shall put into abeyance those rights of sale which he may have acquired by purchase or service, and those rights shall not be revived unless he again exchanges to a Purchase regiment."

PARLIAMENT—ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION) (LONDON) BILL.

QUESTION. EXPLANATION.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY asked the Vice President of the Council, If he could explain why, notwithstanding an assurance given by him to the contrary, the Second Reading of the Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London) Bill was taken on Friday last?

VISCOUNT SANDON, in reply, said, that the mistake was owing simply to his accidental absence and that of his noble Friend from the House. He was very sorry the mistake should have occurred; but the Government would give his noble Friend every opportunity of opposing the Bill at a later stage if he thought fit.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY wished, as a matter of personal explanation, to say that he made no insinuation whatever against his noble Friend. He was aware that his noble Friend was not in the House at the time, and that was the reason he asked the Question. He himself was not in the House, because he went out to the Lobby to ask his noble Friend what his intention with regard to the Bill was, and his reply was, that it was much too late to take the Bill that night, and that he was going to leave the House. Satisfied with that assurance, he re-entered the House and discovered that the Bill had been read a second time. The question had important bearings in its Parliamentary aspect. The way in which important and Opposed Business was taken at times when amid the confusion of hon. Members leaving the House no one could tell what was going on, was not creditable to the House, and had a very injurious effect on Public Business. In order to put himself in Order, he begged to move the Adjournment of the House.

MR. DILLWYN seconded the Motion, and appealed to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair to say what might be the best mode of remedying the inconvenience complained of. Perhaps it might be done by means of a Standing Order.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Lord Francis Hervey.)

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that as he was the Member of the Government responsible for the accident, he wished to explain how it had occurred. He was in charge of the Orders of the Day when the Ministers who had charge of Bills were not in their places. On Friday he noticed that his noble Friend (Lord Francis Hervey) was in his place just at the moment before the Order was reached. His noble Friend had two Notices on the Paper—one that the Bill should be read a second time that day three months; the other that it should be referred to a Select Committee. Having moved, as was his duty, that the Bill should be read a second time, he expected his noble Friend to rise and move either that it should be read a second time that day three months, or, having been read a second time, that it should be referred to a Select Committee. He was surprised, however, to find that his noble Friend was not present; and that he might not be placed at a disadvantage, he asked the Clerk to put down a Notice in his noble Friend's name, for the next stage that the Bill be committed that day three months. If he had had an idea that either his noble Friend or the Vice President of the Council desired that the Bill should be postponed, he would readily have postponed it. He thought it was the opinion of the House that a Bill, which the Standing Orders require to be referred to a Select Committee, ought not to be delayed in the absence either of the hon. Member in charge of the Bill, or of the hon. Member opposed to it.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER suggested that it might be for the convenience of the House that a minute should be allowed to elapse between announcing the numbers of a division and the calling on of a fresh Order.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

TURKEY—ALLEGED ATROCITIES IN BULGARIA.—QUESTION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a Question of which I have given him Private Notice, referring to the accounts of the Turkish atrocities in Bulgaria. Many hon. Members will have read with pain—I may say with horror—the accounts to which I refer, and the Question that I have to put to the right hon. Gentleman is, Whether any reply has been received to the inquiry addressed by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, which on Monday week he said he would make, as to the outrages which had been perpetrated by the Turkish troops? I wish to ask, whether there has been any reply confirming the statements contained in The Daily News of last Saturday, and also in a letter from Therapia, a suburb of Constantinople, in The Times on the same day, to the effect that a large number of Bulgarian girls had been sold publicly as slaves; and also that a very large number of Bulgarians are now undergoing tortures in prisons; and, whether the right hon. Gentleman is willing to lay on the Table any Papers and Despatches that Her Majesty's Government may have received relating to this subject?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, no reply has been received to the inquiry made by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the subject referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. But it would be impossible that a reply could be received by this time. With regard to the Papers connected with these atrocities in Bulgaria, some communications have been made between the Government and our Ambassador at Constantinople and the Consuls at the seats of disturbance, and all the information we have received upon this subject will be found in the Papers to be laid on the Table in a few days. With respect to the reports of the terrible atrocities to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, I would still express a hope that when we become better informed—I would express this hope for the sake of human nature itself—when we are thoroughly informed of what has occurred it will be found that the statements are scarcely warranted. The House must recollect that we are in constant communication with our Ambassador at Constantinople. Every day we hear from him. Sir Henry Elliot is not a man to be insensible to such terrible proceedings. On the contrary, he is a stern assertor of humanity, and I know no man who would more firmly and energetically interfere if he were aware of events such as those to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred. We are also represented in the seats of disturbance by gentlemen, as Her Majesty's Consuls, eminent for their abilities and high character—at Belgrade, at Ragusa, at Cettinje, and at other places; we are in constant communication with those gentlemen, and certainly no information of the kind has as yet reached Her Majesty's Government. That there have been proceedings of an atrocious character in Bulgaria I never for a moment doubted. Wars of insurrection are always atrocious. These are wars not carried on by Regular troops—in this case not even by Irregular troops—but by a sort of posse comitatus of an armed population. We know in our own experience that one of our Colonies, an ancient Colony of England—Jamaica—was the scene of transactions and of a panic which always accompanies insurrection, which no one can look back upon without horror. I cannot doubt that atrocities have been committed in Bulgaria; but that girls were sold into slavery, or that more than 10,000 persons have been imprisoned, I doubt. In fact, I doubt whether there is prison accommodation for so many, or that torture has been practised on a great scale among an Oriental people who seldom, I believe, resort to torture, but generally terminate their connection with culprits in a more expeditious manner. These are circumstances which lead me to hope that in time we may be better informed. I have no doubt there may be much to deplore in what has been done, and we may even become convinced that scenes have occurred which must bring to everyone feelings of the deepest regret. Still, I cannot but cherish a hope that some of the statements—the heart-rending statements—we have heard have not that foundation which some hon. Gentlemen believe they possess. I can only repeat that every effort will be made by Her Majesty's Government, and, as hon. Gentlemen will see when the Papers are before them, has already been made, to impress on the Government of Constantinople that the utmost efforts should be made to mitigate as much as possible the terrible scenes that are now inevitably occurring. When the information arrives I shall not lose a moment in apprising the right hon. Gentleman and the House of what the result may be; but at present I can only repeat that no answer has been received to the inquiry of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and that it is impossible that an answer should have been received.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I trust that the House will allow me to make one remark. The long letter that appeared in The Daily News was in answer to an inquiry sent from London after the Question which I asked in the House. Doubtless that inquiry was made by telegram, and therefore I would venture to suggest to Her Majesty's Government that there should be telegraphic communication with Sir Henry Elliot without delay. I trust I may be pardoned for making that suggestion, and I also trust that the right hon. Gentleman may be right in supposing that there is exaggeration, yet there may have occurred what is intensely horrible, and would excite indignation in us all. I cannot forget this—"Order, order!" If I am out of Order, I will conclude with a Motion; but I think it will be most important that we should obtain this information for this reason—that it appears that we could not have a discussion upon the state of the Eastern Question until the middle of next week. Generally speaking, the delay would matter little; but events are marching quickly in the East, and we see in the papers time after time these terrible statements, which to my mind carry a great deal of truth with them. [Cries of "Order" and "Chair!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, the House would allow the right hon. Gentleman every reasonable latitude in explanation, but he was now entering into reasons and arguments, and he was clearly out of Order, unless he was prepared to conclude with a Motion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Then, Sir, I will put myself in Order by moving the adjournment of the House. I was saying that side by side with these statements we have these facts. In the first place, we cannot have a discussion on the subject for several days. I do not blame the Government for postponing the discussion. I do not doubt that they are doing their utmost to bring out the Papers as soon as possible. I have no doubt that they wish for this discussion as much as we do; but events are marching very quickly in that country, and side by side with these terrible stories—which appear to me to have a great foundation of truth, because they are not merely mentioned in these newspapers, but in others; not only in the Christian newspapers, but in the Turkish papers also—we have constantly statements from Turkey itself, confirmed by information throughout the Continent, that the moral support of Her Majesty's Government is given to a Power which is perpetrating these atrocities. I am not blaming the Government. No doubt they are doing what they can to avoid that impression; but surely it is time now that we should know what is their policy in the future. Our own position is humiliating to the sense of honour of the country, and it is revolting to the consciences of Englishmen that we should be supposed to give our moral support to a Power which has perpetrated these atrocities, unless it be proved to the contrary.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government a Question. He told us that he had received no information, though communications had arrived from the Consuls at Belgrade, Ragusa, and Cettinje; but these are not the districts where these alleged atrocities took place. I should like to know whether he has had any information from Philippopolis and Adrianople, where there are Consuls to whom he has made no allusion?

MR. ANDERSON: I think it would have been more assuring to the country if the Premier, instead of throwing doubt on these statements which have appeared, had rather treated them as if they contained a great deal of truth. We have heard of atrocities committed on non-combatants at which our blood curdles—atrocities upon women and children; and I do not think it is possible for anyone who has read the journals in which these statements appeared to doubt that there is a great deal of truth in them. At such a time as this I think it is the duty of every European Government to unite in representations to the combatants, and especially to the Turkish Government, to endeavour to get them to conduct the war on more civilized principles. Of course we know that war cannot be fought out with velvet gloves, and a good deal of atrocity must be committed. But I think there is a great deal in the present case perpetrated upon non-combatants, and women and children, that might be avoided if strong representations were made by other Governments.

MR. MUNDELLA: I am sure that the House will rejoice if the hopes expressed by the Premier can only be realized, when the House is in possession of full information on the subject, but I am afraid there is no chance of their being realized. From all we can gather by a comparison of the newspapers with private information, I am afraid we have not yet heard the whole of this matter. I have myself heard from private sources that the facts are so horrible that they cannot be recited by an English newspaper; and if that be so, even in the supposition that a tithe of what has been stated should be accurate, would it not be well for the Government to telegraph to Her Majesty's Minister at Constantinople to remonstrate upon these atrocities, and if possible to arrest their further continuance? It seems to me that we are left entirely in doubt as to what has been done by the Government. We do not know whether they have remonstrated or not. We have a magnificent fleet in Besika Bay, and we have a Minister at Constantinople, and are told by The Times and The Daily News all about these facts, and yet we have no information from the Government as to these matters, which are a disgrace to humanity, and which will form one of the bloodiest pages of history.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, looking to the great doubt that is thrown upon the reports that have been made, and the universal sympathy that must be felt for the sufferers, he is prepared to instruct Her Majesty's Minister at Constantinople to send some emissary or other to inquire into the truth of this report?

MR. DISRAELI: I have stated, Sir, that all the information we have received will be found in the Papers which will soon be on the Table, and I believe that information is ample. It will then be found that it was not when the subject was first mooted in the House that the attention of Her Majesty's Government was first given to the subject, but that our Ambassador at Constantinople and our Representatives in the disturbed districts had all been instructed to use their utmost influence to prevent the committal of any of these atrocities. I must again repeat, in order to prevent misconception, that I never for a moment wished to deny that there had been atrocities in Bulgaria or the other places mentioned; but when I was asked with regard to the atrocities particularized in some public journals, when my attention was called to them, and when I was asked whether the Government was aware of those atrocities—whether 1,000 Bulgarian girls had been sold as slaves and 10,000 of the population subjected to torture or thrown into prison, with other details of the same kind—when called on to say whether we had received information of such particulars, I felt it my duty to tell the House that we had received no such information. That atrocities have been perpetrated in Bulgaria it will be clear to the House when it has the Papers in its hands; but none of the particulars upon which the Government have lately been challenged have reached us, although in constant communication with Her Majesty's Ambassador, and also not only with the Consuls that I have named, but also those at the places in the Turkish dominions to which the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) has referred; but in none of these communications have any of these details been mentioned. That is the answer I wish to make to the House, and I do not wish the answer to be misunderstood. I do not deny that atrocities have been committed, and I believe they must be inevitable in insurrectionary wars in such countries; but I have to answer directly the inquiry of the House, represented by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster), whether we had not received information of the particular details and horrors mentioned in the various journals to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. My answer is now, as before, that we have received no such information.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

[BILL 155.]

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Cross.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Viscount Sandon.)

MR. RICHARD,* in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the principle of universal compulsion in education cannot be applied without great injustice unless provision be made for placing public elementary schools under public management,"

said: It is with perfect sincerity that I say it gives me no pleasure to appear here as an objector to the Bill. I came down to the House on the day when the noble Lord was to introduce and expound his measure with as earnest a wish as man ever cherished that it might be of such a nature as to absolve me, at least, from the necessity of offering to it any serious opposition. The cause of popular education is one very near to my heart, and I have been an humble but earnest labourer in the cause for 35 years. Thirty years ago I took an active part in the establishment of a school for boys, girls, and infants in one of the populous districts of the metropolis, through which schools I believe up to the present time some 15,000 or 16,000 children have passed. In the year 1845 I had the pleasure of starting a movement in favour of day school education in Wales, which has led to the formation of the first Normal school ever established there, and of many scores, if not hundreds, of day schools in various parts of Wales. After that I had the honour of being honorary secretary of the Voluntary School Society, which established normal schools in London, and largely aided by means of grants of money the maintenance of voluntary schools in various parts of the country. I hope that the House will excuse this little bit of egotism, as I wish it to be understood that I am not an objector to, and an obstructor of, education, but an active worker in that great cause. It would have been a great satisfaction to me if a Bill had been introduced by the Government which would have allowed all of us, without distinction of sect or party, on equal terms cordially to co-operate in promoting the work of national education; but, unhappily, this is a Bill for promoting, not national, but sectarian education. The object of the Bill is obviously, I may say avowedly, to discourage the formation of school boards, and all that more liberal and unsectarian class of schools that spring from school boards, and to strengthen and extend to the utmost possible extent the denominational schools. The speeches of the Vice President of the Council (Viscount Sandon) and of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) left no doubt upon this point, and we may consider, therefore, this was the dominant idea that presided over the preparation of the Bill. And then we must consider the denominational schools and the immense majority they are in. Out of 14,000 parishes outside the boroughs only 1,749 have school boards, leaving 12,000 or more, where, if there be any schools at all, they must be denominational schools.

Mr. Richard

And now let us see what you do by this Bill for denominational schools. First of all, you subsidize them largely with pecuniary aid; and you do this in three ways. First, by Clause 12, which says, if any parent is unable to pay a fee of 3*d.* a-week for his child it may be paid for him by the guardians of the poor. Next, by Clause 13, you provide that in poor districts a grant may be given to the school to the amount of twice the income of the school from every source. And, thirdly, you give power to the local authorities to force all children in the district, whether they be Roman Catholics, or Nonconformists, or Jews, or whatever they may be, into the denominational schools, and thereby add largely to the income of those schools by their pence. But this is not all. Compulsory bye-laws may be expensive in the working, and the cost of this machinery is to be defrayed, not from the income of the schools that are to profit by them, but from the rates;—so that Dissenters and Roman Catholics will be taxed for the machinery that is to fill Church schools by forcing their own children into them. And if any sturdy Dissenter or Roman Catholic upon grounds of conscience refuses to send his child to the school, you give power to the court of summary jurisdiction, which may be the very clergyman who is the manager of the voluntary school, to fine him 5*s.*, and if he persevere in his refusal, to take his child away from home and send it to an industrial school until he is 14 or 16 years of age, and compel the parent to pay for his keep. Now, I object to this Bill on various grounds. I object to it first on account of its thoroughly unconstitutional character. Is it not one of the principles of our administration that public money is not to be handed over to be spent under the direction and at the discretion of persons who are not in any way responsible to the nation? The hon. Gentleman the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), in an able speech on the Prisons Bill, made the remark that looking at the subject as a question of principle, he thought that local control ought to be exercised over the expenditure of money raised by local rates. But here there is local taxation in the form of the payment of the fees of the children by the guardians, and in defraying the expenses of the compulsory machinery, without any pretence of local management or local control over expenditure. Then I object to the Bill as tending to check, as much as possible, the growth of that part of our educational system which has about it something of national character. Whatever may be the objections alleged against school boards it will be admitted at least that they have this advantage—that they call in the whole nation without distinction of class, or creed, or condition, unitedly to bear a part in what deserves to be called national work, if ever any work merited that designation. But you take the work out of the hands of the nation in order to consign it to the hands of a sect. I believe there is a provision in the Bill by which localities may still have school boards under this Bill; but then we have the belief that the administration of the Educational Department is hostile to school boards, and the presumption is that it will checkmate the desire expressed by localities for the establishment of school boards. A very singular illustration of the animus that actuates the Department in respect of this point has come lately to my knowledge in connection with the case of Winchester. When, 12 months ago, the town council of that city passed a resolution requesting the Lords of the Committee of Council to make an order for the establishment of a school board in that town, the denominational party called a meeting and petitioned against the board, and the Department listened to them rather than to the town council, and refused the order, and have continued to refuse it to this day. Well, there is another objection which many persons feel very strongly indeed against this Bill, and that is its tendency to throw the education of the people more and more into clerical hands. It is well known that in country parishes the clergyman is virtually the sole manager of the schools, and he moulds and fashions them according to his own will; if in thousands of parishes all the children are thrown into the hands of the local clergymen with no effectual check upon the authority they wield, the influence they exercise will be enormous. Now, this is not purely a Nonconformist objection; there are tens of thousands of working men who object to have their children consigned to clerical hands. I was very much struck by a passage in a pamphlet by a gentleman who is known to many gentlemen here, I mean Mr. Henry Dunn, formerly secretary to the British and Foreign School Society. He says—

“The religious denominations, however numerous or well organized, do not when combined represent the people of England. Outside of them all may be found a large and growing multitude who, although far from destitute of regard for religion, decidedly object to the education of the country being handed over to ecclesiastical bodies of any kind. They regard such a course as the evasion of a great national duty, and they feel that more than enough has already been done to encourage our abounding sectarianism. Many among the working classes share in these views, and no good reason whatever can be given why the opinions of these men should be altogether disregarded.”

My own conviction is, that to entrust the education of the people to clerical hands will tend to prolong and embitter our religious and social divisions, and to interfere with the unity of our national life. No man can accuse me of having any special prejudice against the clerical profession. The principle I go upon is, that national education should be national work, and therefore should be as free, as broad, and as exempt from sectional influences as the nation itself. This can never be while education is in the hands of the clergy of any denomination whatever. It is a very curious thing that at the very time when by this Bill we propose to enormously extend the power of the clergy in connection with education, in almost every other civilized country of the world, the State—especially the Liberal Party in the State—are showing a disposition to transfer the education of the people from the hands of the clergy to the hands of the State. This is the case in France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Holland, Belgium, Portugal, Switzerland, the United States, and the British Colonies. It is surely not without grave significance for us to find all civilized countries going in that direction, and it ought to be an instruction and a warning to ourselves. There are especial reasons at this time which in the estimation of many intensify their objections to delivering over the children of this country into the hands of the clergy, and that is the character of the teaching of a large and growing section of the clergy. I do not wish to wound the religious susceptibilities of the Members from Ireland.

who may be present, and I hope they will not deem me very intolerant if I express my own strong conviction that the freedom and the greatness of this country are bound up with the maintenance of its Protestant faith. Mr. Burke on one occasion stated that Nonconformity is the Protestantism of the Protestant religion. I have no particular objection to the definition; but if that be so, the House will easily understand what we, as Protestant Dissenters, feel when we see what is going on at this moment in the Church of England. What is now going on? A society has been established on purpose to arrest the progress of the doctrines and practices to which I advert, at the head of which are Lord Shaftesbury and Lord Ebury. In their address they say—

“That the so-called Anglo-Catholics in the Established Church can count on a perfect impunity has lately been evinced by the startling fact that ‘480 priests’ have signed and presented a petition to Convocation in the Province of Canterbury, asking for the selection and licensing of duly qualified confessors. Already the practice of auricular confession is encouraged in a good many churches; public notice is given of the days and hours when the priest will attend to relieve the consciences of penitents; and there is indication of an intense desire to restore the confessional as an essential religious institution. It is notorious that other practices of the same school are spreading rapidly. The Lord’s Table gives place to the Altar; the observance of the Lord’s Supper is changed into a celebration of Mass; and the blessed Eucharist is reserved as in Roman Catholic churches; prayers are invited for the repose of the dead; and children are being educated (in some degree at the public expense) in familiarity with tenets, hymns, and ceremonies, which are subversive at once of Christ’s Gospel and of the English Reformation.”

But I can call a witness on this point whose testimony will be of more value than that of any other man in this House—the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council himself. In the year 1874 he made a very able and earnest speech in this House on the Public Worship Regulation Bill, and on that occasion he said there was great danger lest the compact between the Church and State, and which rested upon the maintenance on the part of the Church of the doctrines and usages of the Reformation, should be broken. The noble Lord continued—

“That the danger was real was evident from the reply of the two highest authorities in the land, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, who last year, in reply to a memorial presented to them, said—‘There can be no doubt that the danger you apprehend of a considerable minority both of clergy and laity among us desiring to subvert the principles of the Reformation is real. . . . We feel justified in appealing to all reasonable men to consider whether the very existence of our national institutions for the maintenance of religion is not imperilled by the evils of which you complain.’”—[3 Hansard, ccxxi. 52.]

Mr. Richard

Then the noble Lord went on to say—

“Could anything be more serious or more alarming than such an acknowledgment and such an appeal from the two much-respected and discreet heads of the Church?”—[Ibid.]

Then he proceeded to justify the alarm which he felt in regard to the progress of this party in the Church by quoting some passages from their journals and writings in order to illustrate the extremes to which they went. Among them was the following passage from The Church Times, the only one with which I shall trouble the House:—

“We are contending, as our adversaries know full well, for the extirpation of Protestant opinions and practice, not merely within the Church itself, but throughout all England.”

I have seen lately in the same paper another passage in which they boast of their rapid progress, and show the great efforts they are making in regard to choral services, public choirs, saints days, dedication festivals, vestments, and floral decorations, and he estimates that the Extreme Right, as he calls them, possess one-fifth of all the working churches of the metropolis, and a good half of the communicants. It is not in the metropolis merely, but this thing is spreading throughout the whole country. How does this bear upon the question before us? Most intimately and vitally, because the noble Lord proposes by means of compulsion to sweep the education of the people of this country into the hands of the clergy, in thousands of parishes, into the hands of the very men, some of whom, at least according to his own admission, and the acknowledgments of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, are trying to subvert the principles of the Reformation, and are bringing into peril the very existence of our national institutions for the maintenance of religion. I will call another witness on this point, a nobleman held in honour and esteem by all parties in this country. Whatever differences may exist between any of us and Lord Shaftesbury in regard to ecclesiastical and theological matters, we all honour and reverence him for his unbounded philanthropy and devotion to the interests of humanity. Speaking in May last at the annual meeting of the Church Pastoral Aid Society, he made these remarks—

“I say that notwithstanding the new court of law, Ritualism is more rife and more active and more insolent than ever it was before.”

He goes on to speak of the frequent advocacy of the views of this party in the pulpit, and then he proceeds—

“But there is a darker side of the picture than that. The kind of preaching to which I allude is for the most part addressed to adults, and I believe that the minds of the greater portion of the adults revolt from the doctrines which they are constantly hearing from the pulpit. I feel much greater apprehension in reference to the character of the teaching which is given in many of the schools connected with the Church of England; and I say, without fear of contradiction, that in a large proportion of these schools doctrines are inculcated in the minds of children which must eventuate in full-blown Romanism.”

You need not wonder, therefore, that there are multitudes of persons in this country who look with great alarm on this Bill, because its tendency, whatever its design, is to consign to the hands of the clergy the education of the people of this country.

But I will now come to objections that are especially urged by one class of the community in this country—I mean the Nonconformists; for whom, I am afraid, there is not much sympathy felt in this House, although probably there are few Gentlemen on this side who come from England and Wales, who do not in a great part owe their seats here to the influence and exertions of the Nonconformists. But however distasteful it may be to many here, I must ask the kind attention of the House, for I am speaking on behalf and in the name of many millions of my countrymen, who are, I believe, not the worst part of the population of this country, who are as good citizens, as good subjects, as loyal to the Crown, as faithful to the Constitution, as obedient to the laws, as exemplary in the discharge of all their social and civic duties, as any class of the community whatever, and they are equal sharers in the great work of Christian civilization going on in the midst of us. As I stated on a former occasion, they have built and maintained at their own cost 28,000 places of worship in which to carry on the spiritual education of the people of this country, together with all the vast machinery—educational, religious, and charitable—connected with these places. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Hardy), in the speech he made the other evening, and in a slightly sarcastic spirit as I thought, spoke of the Nonconformists as devoting their money to building chapels and Sunday-schools, and not building day-schools but using those provided by the Church. I may be allowed to say in a parenthesis that if they have used the schools they have had to pay for them; nobody ever heard of the Church offering its education gratuitously. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to state that the Church maintained these schools without any unfair influence being exerted on the children sent there. He spoke with entire sincerity, as no one of us can have any doubt, but still he was not entirely accurate. In the first place, it must be observed that popular education in this country began with the Nonconformists. Joseph Lancaster and those that gathered round him were Nonconformists, although in that number was also included many Liberal Churchmen like the Duke of Bedford, and all the House of Russell. The starting of a similar work by the Church, which has since grown to such large and honourable proportions, owing mainly to the noble self-sacrifice of the clergy, which I am never weary of admiring, was due to the jealousy and alarm felt at what the Dissenters were doing. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen laugh; I will give them evidence which they will hardly dispute, for I will give them the evidence of Dr. Bell himself, who was the founder of the National School system. Writing to Dr. Barton, chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, under date March 30, 1807, he says—

“It cannot be dissembled that thousands in various parts of the kingdom are drawn from the Church by the superior attention paid to education out of the Church. The tide is setting fast in one direction, and if not speedily stemmed it may run faster and faster.”

Writing again to Mrs. Trimmer, a great light of the Church in those days, and who, so far from trimming, was a most violent and bigoted Churchwoman, he said—

"What you say of preventing the spread of this scheme against the Church (that is the Lancasterian schools) is what some years ago occurred to me, and I then said, what I shall never cease to repeat, that I know of but one way effectually to check these efforts, and it is by able and well-directed efforts of our own hands. A scheme of education patronized by Church and State, originating in Government aid, and superintended by a member of the Establishment, would most effectually promote our views."

This was the germ of the National School Society. No doubt when the members of the Church of England took the matter in hand earnestly, they very far distanced all competitors, and they had every advantage for doing so. They had wealth, and social influence, and the ear of men in power to aid them. While we had to build and maintain our chapels, they had the parish churches at their disposal; while we had to maintain our ministers they had national endowments; so that in many parishes they had nothing to do with their money except to build schools. I am very far from wishing to derogate from the great work they were doing; I am always anxious, in this House and elsewhere, to express my admiration and respect for the great services rendered to the cause of national education by denominational schools; but even then the representation of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War is not quite accurate. It is not quite true that we have only been building chapels and Sunday-schools; we have built also a large number of day-schools. In Wales alone we have built between 400 and 500 day-schools. Nor was he more accurate when he said that if Nonconformists sent their children to the Church schools no unfair influence was exerted on their minds. On the contrary, I allege that for many years, until the Conscience Clause was forced upon them, education was steadfastly and systematically employed as an instrument of proselytism. The learning of the Church catechism, and the attendance of children at church on Sunday, were sine quâ non conditions in many cases for admission into the Church schools. To such an extent was this carried in Wales that Dr. Thirlwall, when Bishop of St. David's—a high-minded and conscientious man, whose mind revolted against the practice—delivered a very severe rebuke to his clergy on the subject in one of his Charges; and I ask the attention of the House to the short extract that I am about to read, especially of hon. Gentlemen who say there is no religious difficulty, because they find they are allowed to teach the catechism to the children of various Dissenting bodies without any objection on the part of the parent. Indeed, this is one of the most inexplicable things I know—how high-minded, honourable Christian gentlemen, like those who made this boast, can look upon that as a reason for congratulation. For what does it mean? It means that they rejoice at being permitted to teach little children lies in the name of religion. For look what it is. You take a little Baptist child and teach him to say he has been regenerated in baptism, when he has never been baptized at all. You take the children of Nonconformists, and make them say that their godfathers and godmothers have promised and vowed certain things for them, when they have no godfathers and godmothers at all. When you say there is no religious difficulty, I say there ought to be one—if not on the part of the parents, on the part of the teachers and the clergy, who receive children into their schools and teach them to repeat falsehood in the name of religion. Dr. Thirlwall, referring to a poor man, who in the absence of any other means of education for his child but what is afforded by a national school where the teaching of the Church catechism is enforced, sends it there, says—

"Few, I think, will be disposed to condemn him very severely if he yields to such temptation. But in the eyes of a clergyman who attaches supreme value to a 'definite, objective, and dogmatic faith,' he must appear to be guilty of a breach of the most sacred duty; to be bartering his child's eternal welfare for temporal benefits; to be acting a double part, allowing his child to be taught that which he intends it to unlearn, and to profess that which he hopes it will never believe. Can it be right for a clergyman holding such views to take advantage of the poor man's necessity and weakness for the sake of making a proselyte of the child? Is he not really bribing the father to do wrong, and holding out a strong temptation to duplicity and hypocrisy when he admits the child into his school on such terms? And when he enforces them by instruction which is intended to alienate the children from the father in their religious belief, is he not oppressing the poor and needy? I can understand, though I cannot sympathise with it, the rigidity of conscience which closes the school against Dissenters; but I cannot reconcile it with the laxity of conscience which admits them on such terms."

And I cannot. But I am afraid the same spirit is still actively at work, for though I believe that among those who contend for religious education in schools there are many who are perfectly sincere, whose anxiety is genuine, that the children of the people of this country should be brought under Christian influence—and, so far, I cordially sympathise with them—though I think they are mistaken in imagining that can be best done by teaching religion in the day school, nevertheless there are many others who by religious education mean, in fact, ecclesiastical education, and who are much more anxious to make the children good Churchmen than they are to make them good Christians. This is what is said in the monthly paper of the National School Society; and when we read this, need we wonder that Nonconformists should feel jealous at seeing their children pressed and forced into denominational schools?—

“In the present condition of Church schools it is more than ever necessary that they should be made nurseries of Church principles. All that is happening in the matter of education is a call to the Church to put out her strength and do valiant battle for her principles in our schools. Our work, then, is to teach children the facts of our religion, the doctrines of our religion, the duties of our religion. We must teach them the facts of our religion that they may be intelligent Christians, not ignorant as heathens; the doctrines that they may not be Christians also, but Churchmen; the duties that they may not be Churchmen only, but communicants. This last, in fact, is the object at which we are uniformly to aim—the training of the young Christian for full communion with the Church, and, as a preliminary to that, a training for confirmation. The whole school time of a child should gradually lead up to this. They ought to know why they should be Churchmen and not Dissenters; why they should go to Church and not to meeting; why they should be Anglicans and not Romanists.”

But it is said—“You have the Conscience Clause to protect you against this great evil.” My answer is that the clause is a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. It is repeatedly evaded. [“No, no!”] Do you believe the testimony of your own Government Inspectors? They report frequent violations to the Department, though the Department, so far as I know, never punish the schools in which violations take place. In 98 visits of surprise paid by one Inspector he found religious instruction given in violation of the time-table in ten cases. But even when the letter of this clause is observed, there is no protection against the spirit being broken. A clergyman has twenty ways of selecting out and branding a little Dissenter. He is excluded from the Church feasts and treats, and prizes may be withheld from him. I heard lately of a case where the children at a denominational school were formed into guilds called Church Guilds—among which is one called the Guild of St. Timothy—and one of their rules is never to attend service at any place of worship which does not belong to the Church of England. But I distinctly deny your right to subject a poor man, as a condition of his obtaining education and employment for his child, to such a religious test as this. To withdraw his child from the denominational education is a very conspicuous act for a poor man in a country village, and he will hesitate long before doing it, because he knows very well he will incur the displeasure of the squire or the squire's lady. Yet hon. Members say there is no religious difficulty. There may be none of which you are aware, for if a poor Dissenting labourer has any wrong with regard to the education of his child, a Tory Member of Parliament is not the person to whom he is likely to carry his complaint. He is much more likely to go to his own minister, and then it is always open to hon. Members opposite to dismiss the testimony of a Dissenting minister with a sneer, and say that he has manufactured the grievance. To all this you must add that there is a furious fanatical spirit of ecclesiasticism abroad, which has taken possession of many of the clergy of the Church of England, and which makes them look with a perfect horror and hatred upon Dissent. What can you think of the things which are continually cropping up in all parts of the country? What do you think of this advertisement?—Wanted, at once, £50 to rescue 200 souls from Dissent. When this came to be inquired into it was found that the object was to establish a Church school in order to supplant a Dissenting school in the district. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardigan (Mr. Davies) referred in his speech the other day to a little catechism which he said is used in Wales in Church schools. It is called “A second Catechism for the children of the Church. Issued by the Church Extension Society.” I ask the House to listen to a few of the questions and answers in this catechism—

"Q. Is there any other reason why you call her Catholic? A. Yes, because she teaches all truth, and lasts through all ages. Q. How is the Church Apostolic? A. Because she was founded by the Apostles, and is governed by those who succeeded them. Q. Who have succeeded them? A. The bishops, priests, and deacons of the Church. Q. Are these three orders of ministry appointed by God? A. Yes, and no true Church is without them. Q. Why cannot we look for salvation out of the Church? A. Because God's promises are only made to His Church. Q. Is it not then very dangerous to leave the Church? A. Yes, and it is also a very grievous sin. Q. What is this sin called? A. A schism or division. Q. Are we warned against this sin in the Bible? A. Yes, St. Paul tells us to mark them which cause divisions, and to avoid them."

["Hear, hear!"] You cheer that, then why did you cause divisions by leaving the Church of Rome?

"Q. What are those who separate from the Church of England commonly called? A. Dissenters. Q. Are there different sorts of Dissenters? A. Yes, Baptists, Independents, Quakers, and many others. Q. Is it wrong to join in the worship of Dissenters? A. Yes; we should only attend places of worship which belong to the Church of England. Q. Why? A. Because it is the branch of the true Church which God has placed in the land."

Some years ago there was at the head of a normal college in North Wales a reverend gentleman—and he is there still, I believe, for I have never heard of his being removed—who used to give to the young men papers for examination which contained such things as these—

"Show that the Sacraments as administered by Dissenters must be mere blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits. . . . Dissenting ministers, being merely laymen, there is no promise or warrant for supposing that what they do on earth Christ will do in heaven, or that He will be present to bless their ministrations. What inference do you draw?—No bishop, no church. . . . Show that there is a perfect safety in the English Church, and that to leave her for any other Church or any mere sect must be a most fatal error. Puritan doctrine is popular because it is convenient and comfortable. Church principles are not conformed to this world, and therefore the world hates them. Give illustrations. Show from Scripture that a Real Presence is essential to both sacraments. Show that the phrase 'Protestant faith' indicates a ridiculous impossibility."

These are the things which were, and, for aught I know, are still taught in a normal school in which young people are being trained to conduct schools in the Principality of Wales, where the overwhelming majority are Nonconformists. But it is not the clergy only of whom we have to complain in this matter. I believe that in various parts of this country there are systematic attempts made to stamp out Nonconformity and Methodism in our rural districts. Landlords refuse to let farms or houses to Nonconformists. Dissenting cottagers, if they open their houses for prayer-meetings or other religious services, are harried out of their homes. Dissenting servants are dismissed, and Dissenting tradesmen lose their custom. I read lately a speech delivered by the President of the Wesleyan Conference, the Rev. Gervaise Smith, and he says—

"To-day there were 2,000 villages in England where there was not perfect religious freedom. He knew instances where wealthy men had been nominated for high civic offices, but because they were Methodists their names had been scratched out. He knew godly men in farming districts who had been driven from their farms because they were Methodists, and he knew men in different parts of the country who, because they were Methodists, had been obliged to close their shops."

Hon. Members opposite ask for instances. Let me give you one or two. Here is the case of a gentleman, a Nonconformist, who saw a house advertised, and applied to the agent. Everything was going on very well until the agent asked him whether he was a Churchman. "No," he said, "I am a Dissenter." "Ah," said the agent, "you had better not apply; you will have no chance of getting it." Here is a letter addressed by a large land agent in London to a gentleman who applied for a farm in the eastern counties—

"Dear Sir,—The rent, exclusive of tithe to be paid by the tenant, is £1,200 a-year, including the 17 cottages; the drainage rates are paid by the landlord. Shooting is reserved, but the tenant may kill rabbits by trapping or terreting them when they damage him, but we never had a complaint yet from a tenant."

Then there are some other arrangements of the kind described, till we come to this paragraph—

"It is essential that the tenant should be a Churchman, and have £10 an acre of unencumbered capital."

That letter was written to a Nonconformist who had applied for a farm. Here is another letter written when nearly everything was settled—

Mr. Richard

"In reply to your letter of the 22nd inst., I write to say that before I put any rent upon my house and land I should be glad to know whether you are a member of the Church of England and a supporter of the Church, also if, in the event of my letting it to you, you will be prepared at an election to support the Conservative Party by voting for them, as I should not feel inclined to let the houses to anyone who is not a good Churchman and a known Conservative."

I have no doubt that these persons are very sincere, and that they are acting up to their consciences, but we object to have our children placed in the power of men who keep such ferocious consciences as these. Now, some hon. Gentlemen think it a strange display of bigotry and intolerance on our part that we should not want to see our people taken away from us and placed under such influences as those I have described. But let me ask who these people are whom we have thus collected together? They are not people whom we have lured from the Church. They are people who for generations were neglected by the Church, or whom the Church with its utmost efforts had failed to overtake. When our Nonconformist and Methodist forefathers went in search of these people or of their ancestors, they found them, not in the churches, but in the alehouses, in the cock-pits, in the bull-rings, in wakes and Sunday fairs, lounging and gambling on the village green; in Cornwall, sauntering, grimy and savage, around the mouth of the pits; in Wales, frequenting scenes of profane and sensual revelry, or wandering over the mountains like sheep without a shepherd, no man caring for their souls. They went forth, as they believed themselves bidden to go, into the streets and lanes, highways and hedges, and braving the scorn of the educated classes, and the brutal violence of the mob, by infinite labour of body and travail of soul they contrived by the persuasions of Christian love to compel these men to come into what I and they believe to be the Christian fold. We think it is unfair that efforts should be made to take the children of these people out of our hands in order to deliver them into the hands of persons who use their utmost efforts to pervert them from the faith of their fathers. And yet, because we object to and protest against this, you rain upon us a shower of opprobrious epithets. You call us intolerable, impracticable, and sectarian —though I contend that it is you who are sectarian and not we—and one gentleman, in despair of finding within the ordinary resources of the English language any term strong enough to express his detestation and disgust for us, felt himself driven to the necessity of coining a new and barbarous word to fling at us; and he says that not only are we intolerant, but that we are "unclubable." Now, with regard to all these charges there underlies an assumption. The simple truth is this—that members of the Church of England have so long enjoyed the privileges of ecclesiastical ascendancy that they have come to take it for granted that their views in all matters of religion, of doctrine, discipline and practice, are the standard of what is right and fitting and proper; and that if any man depart from that standard ipso facto he is placed on his defence. Well, for a Reformed Church, built on the principle of private judgment, and not claiming infallibility, this is rather a strong view to take. Still, it is a very natural one, and I do not blame them. I dare say that if I and the Church to which I belong had been placed in the same position of ecclesiastical ascendancy as they have been, we should have fallen into the same error; but still you cannot expect us to admit that. We claim the right to exercise our own private judgment and our conscience in all matters of religion, and with all deference to you we refuse to submit our conscience and our judgment to you. Now, let me call attention to one other point which we consider is a great grievance to the Nonconformists in connection with this Bill, and this is that they will be excluded virtually from all share in the teaching profession. For, observe that in all these denominational schools the teachers must be Church people; and this kind and form of legislation, therefore, practically closes the teaching profession against Nonconformists. Even in regard to board schools and endowed schools, which are supposed to be under the protection of a Liberal legislation, we are exposed constantly to instances of injustice and unfairness. We had the other day, in a School Board Chronicle, an advertisement for a mistress for a board school, in which it was stated that she must be a Churchwoman. The Department was appealed to whether it was legal to require that a master or mistress should belong to a particular denomination, and the answer was that they had no power to interfere. Then there was the case which lately occurred at the Perse Grammar School, where a gentleman who had been educated at the University of Oxford, and was an M.A. of his College, was dismissed from the school by the superior Master on the ground that he was a Nonconformist, and therefore not his social equal. With regard to schools belonging to the Church of England, in any number of the National Society's Magazine advertisements abound, coupling the appointment of master or mistress with rigorous ecclesiastical conditions. Here is one—

"Wanted, a master and mistress for a mixed Government school of 80 to 100, agricultural. Must be good Church people. Master must be certificated, and able to play small organ in Church."

Another says—

"Wanted, a master for a mixed school (certificate provisional or otherwise), salary £30, school pence and Government grant. Good Churchman, able to play harmonium in Church occasionally."

And so we see that in this way the Nonconformists, if there are to be none but denominational schools—and under this Bill it is unlikely that there will be any but denominational schools—are entirely excluded from any share in the teaching profession. Now I come to the Motion of which I have given Notice—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the principle of universal compulsion in education cannot be applied without great injustice, unless provision be made for placing public elementary schools under public management."

The House will see that I proceed upon the assumption that for the State to take powers to compel the children of the people to go to school is a strong measure which cannot be justified unless the State at the same time takes care to provide such schools as shall not trench on the right of conscience and the principles of religious freedom. Now, I am bound to acknowledge that for myself I am not, and never have been, so violently enamoured of universal compulsion as some of my hon. Friends profess to be. I am one of the old-fashioned Liberals who think there may be danger in the State meddling too much in our social and civil life. I dislike compulsion everywhere, and most of all in connection with religion and education. It would be far better, in my opinion, to persuade than to compel men to send their children to school. When I was in Holland four years ago, I made considerable inquiries into their national system, and I found that this was the plan which was in operation there. The law gives them no compulsory powers, but ladies and gentlemen of influence and of considerable leisure formed themselves into voluntary committees, and visited the habitations of the working classes and of the poor, and by every kind of argument and remonstrance endeavoured to persuade them to send their children to school. If they pleaded that they were not able to pay the fees, and this statement was found to be well founded, there was a voluntary fund to enable the committee to pay the children's fees, and I was told that the result had been, on the whole, extremely satisfactory. And certainly if compulsion were only enforced in the way described by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley), in that very interesting speech which he made the other day, in which he spoke of how it was administered by himself in connection with a board school, it would partake much more of the character of persuasion than compulsion. But it seems that Parliament and the people of this country are determined to have compulsion in some form. Now all I want is, under that extreme power that you are assuming, to protect the children of those who are not members of the particular denomination to which the schools belong, from any wrong being done to them in conscience. No doubt the best way to secure the end I have in view would be to the establishment of universal school boards and board schools, or else to give power to the new authority which you create under this Bill to call such schools into existence where they seem to be rendered necessary by the character of the population. But I am aware, of course, that this is said to be at present impracticable, partly on account of the cost and partly on account of the prejudice which an active and unscrupulous propaganda has contrived to create in the minds of many people against school boards. Well, I do not insist upon that, but I proceed on this principle—that denominational schools as they are at present placed, or a large number of them at any rate, cannot, with any show of justice, be regarded as either private or voluntary schools, if by voluntary you mean that they are supported by voluntary contributions. I am told that millions have been raised from private resources in order to establish and maintain these schools; but I can also point to millions that have been lavished upon them out of the public funds. By the last Return I find that these so-called voluntary schools have received grants, between 1859 and 1875, of close upon £14,000,000 of the public money, of which £10,500,000 have gone to Church of England schools. According to the noble Lord the schools are supported in this way—Government grants amount to £1,000,000 a-year, children's pence to another £1,000,000, and the voluntary contributions to over £600,000. There are many schools even now, I believe, up and down the country, which do not require, and do not receive, one penny from voluntary contributions—all the cost is defrayed from the grants and from the children's pence, and under this Bill these schools will be largely multiplied. I ask, is it unreasonable to require that institutions like these, many of which will be altogether supported, and many more of which will be nearly altogether supported, out of public resources, should be placed under some public management—especially at a time when you are taking power to force all the children of the country into these schools? I may be told, but people who make this assertion can hardly be sincere, that they are already in public hands, and responsible to the Department. That is to say, Her Majesty's Inspector pays one formal visit and one informal visit in the course of the year; but that cannot be regarded as any effectual check upon the managers throughout the whole year. But you will ask me, What kind of public management do you ask for? Well, take the machinery provided for by this Bill—namely, town councils and Boards of Guardians. No doubt the Boards of Guardians are in many ways an utterly unsatisfactory authority for educational purposes—their mode of election is one which gives the dominant influence to a class who are not immediately or personally interested in the schools; and I am afraid that the ex-officio element would prove singularly unfair as regards a liberal and unsectarian education. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that the want of rural municipalities is one of our greatest administrative defects. But we have none, and therefore I am willing to accept the Boards of Guardians, for they, at any rate, have some sort of representative character. You already give them certain powers under this Bill. I ask you to enlarge their authority, to give them power to see that, so far as the secular instruction is concerned, it is administered at least in accordance with law. The clergy might still retain full power over the building out of school hours. Let some representative authority be appointed who shall secure the parent against the extravagances of Ritualism or the arbitrariness of clerical government. This is surely not an absurd or extravagant demand that I make. I say—"Here you have schools that have ceased to be private or voluntary; they are sustained in great part, and I believe after this Bill passes they will be wholly supported out of public sources, out of Parliamentary grants, and children's pence, and yet you propose to deliver into the hands of these institutions the manipulation of the education of all the children of this country without any check or control whatever upon the expenditure of money that is thus entrusted to them." I am afraid that we got into a wrong groove in this matter from the very first. When the State 40 years ago began to awake to a sense of its duty, or supposed duty, to take care of the education of the people, instead of taking the matter into its own hands, as it ought to have done, it chose to consign it into the hands of certain voluntary societies which it found already in existence; and I believe, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), that the Government did not in any degree discharge its duty by delegating it, not to persons chosen by themselves, but to any number of persons who came forward to found schools. We got into a wrong groove at that time, and we have been getting deeper and deeper into embarrassment ever since. When we reconstructed, in some degree, our system in 1870, I regret that advantage was not taken of that opportunity, without doing any injustice to voluntary schools—for I would not have them wronged in any way—to lay the foundation, at any rate, of what should be a real system of national education. I contend national education is national work, if any work can be called national; and I desire that Government should undertake to do what they can do of that work without trenching on any man's liberty or violating any man's conscience, looking to it that a good, sound, thoroughly efficient secular education is given in the schools, and then throwing the responsibility, as they have a right to throw it, of the religious instruction upon the churches that claim to be divinely-appointed institutions for the training of the people in religious doctrine and practice. If by this co-operation, all classes of the community could be brought to unite in this blessed work, then we might hope before long to find not only an instructed, but a moral, religious, and Christian population.

MR. E. JENKINS seconded the Amendment of the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard). He assured the House that in undertaking to address it upon that question, and particularly from the point of view which he took, in common with his hon. Friend who had just sat down, he felt most acutely the difficulty under which they laboured. They were, unhappily, facing a large and hostile majority in the House, and for that Parliament the ultimate decision of the issue they had raised might be said to be a foregone conclusion. A long discussion had already taken place on the Bill, in which the principles against which they were contending had been practically admitted; and worse than all that for them, there were upon their own side, upon the seats behind them and upon their front benches those who sympathized with some of the objects of the Bill, and who were among the ablest and most determined of their opponents. Therefore, he could not but feel, in rising to address the House, that he laboured under a great disadvantage. It might be true that the principles which were established by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, in 1870, were principles which had received the general acceptance of those who had since then held the Government of the country; but he held that to be no reason why at every stage at which it was attempted, either to re-assert or to crystallize the principles that were then laid down, they who disagreed with them principles, holding that they were politically, economically, and educationally bad, unjust, and impolitic, though they might be in a conspicuous minority in Parliament, should not enter their protest against them. It would be admitted that if, in that House, questions were only to be raised when there was a reasonable expectation of bringing these questions to a hopeful issue, then the House might as well adjourn never to meet again. In seconding the Motion, he would speak with great frankness, and possibly he might be obliged to say some things which would not be received with favour on the other side; but he trusted he should be able to avoid saying anything that could wound the susceptibilities of any hon. Member. They were asked by the Government to approve the course which they were about to adopt, and let them ask themselves what was that course? He took it, it was a course that was intended to discourage the right of local supervision over the expenditure of public money. It was a course which was intended—or, at all events, whether it was intended or not—it was calculated to put off for a long period, and further than ever, the creation and maintenance of an efficient and permanent economic system of education. It was intended, or, at all events, it was calculated, and certainly would operate, to perpetuate and enhance an injustice which arose out of a protection and aid given to sectarian interests with public money. It was calculated, whether intended or not, to help to recuperate the decaying vigour of an inequitable Establishment, to confer on improper and incapable persons jurisdiction which they were neither expected nor elected to exercise, to maintain injurious principles of religious supremacy which were at once unjust in themselves and inconsistent with the spirit of the times in which they lived, the teachings of history, and the tendency of modern politics in every free and enlightened country. That was the indictment which he brought against the Bill, and which he thought he should be able to prove. In reading over the Bill many times, it occurred to him that it was a sort of mirror or index of the mind of the Government on more questions than one. It at once disclosed the extent of their educational zeal and of their political and religious enthusiasm. Their zeal for religious education was indicated by the single clause in which indirect compulsion was proposed as the remedy for educational difficulties, but their anxiety for the maintenance and spread of true religion, as taught by the Church of England, at the expense of the ratepayers, was evidenced by the rest of the Bill. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members might take exception to the statement, but they would see how, in answer to his argument, the Vice President of the Council would be able to dispute this compendious generalization of the true principles of the Bill. It would doubtless be argued that this discussion was unnecessary and inconvenient; but he would point out that since the debate upon the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), some significant circumstances had occurred out-of-doors and in the House which strengthened the ground on which the hon. Member for Merthyr had acted in bringing forward the Motion. In the first place, and on the one side, from every Liberal Body in the country, and from every unestablished religious Body, except the Roman Catholics, disconnected with the Church of England, there had come forth a loud and emphatic protest against the Bill; while, on the other hand, meetings had been held and resolutions passed, and Amendments had been placed on the Notice Paper of that House, which were of a very significant character, as indicating what were the aims and objects, he did not say of Her Majesty's Government, but of those who were supporting that Government. These Amendments were put forward by the so-called friends of religious education. He did not use the words "so-called" in any sense of detraction; but because he held it was unfair for them to arrogate to themselves the exclusive right to assume that title. He ventured to claim that there were some of them on that side the House who might also claim to be sincere friends of religious education. A man might be a friend of religion and religious education when he had sufficient faith in it to believe that by its own inherent force, or by the zeal and sacrifices of those who maintained it, it could be carried home to people's hearts without the assistance of money from the public pocket. Yet there were proposals which had come from hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House, with the too probable approval of the Government, for the insertion in the Bill of clauses which would enforce in all the public elementary schools the teaching of certain creeds and formularies of religion, and which would make such teaching the condition of receiving grants of public money. It seemed a singular thing that, whilst in all other free communities the revolt of human intelligence against the interference of Government in the domain of religious conscience was being maintained, here in England alone, which claimed to be the freest of all free lands, they had a Government which was endeavouring to enforce principles entirely contrary to the principles and feelings of modern progress, and which invited them to perpetuate and enhance an intolerable interference with civil rights and religious liberty. He could not but think that that was a critical period, not only in the history of education, but also in the history of the nation. If this Bill were passed they would have what he could not but feel to be an inequitable, injurious, and mischievous, as well as unpractical system of education. He could not blame hon. Members opposite if they took advantage of their majority for the purpose of maintaining principles which he was sure they conscientiously held, but, at the same time, they (the supporters of the hon. Member for Merthyr) protested and warned them that the system they were about to crystallize and re-inforce must before long be swept away to make room for some system more equitable and practical. In the United States of America, where the diversities of religious sects were certainly not so sharply defined as in other parts of the world, they were now beginning in high quarters to speak of separating secular education given by the State from the religious education which was to be given by the Churches. And if, in a country where the difficulties arising from the establishment of a State religion were not felt, it was found to be practically impossible to work out, with anything like a concurrence of all the citizens, an education based upon some commonly accepted creed, what must it be in this country where all these differences were so sharply defined, where sect looked sect in the face with hostile aspect, and where, altogether, things were more likely to become worse instead of better in regard to the sharp definition of differences. He would like to see a day when all might agree in some form of religious instruction which might be carried on without risk of interference with the liberties of the subject, when all could, without injustice or heart-burnings, join in teaching their children some of the common principles of their faith; but it seemed to him to be impossible, owing to the spread of intelligence and the activity of modern thought, and, worse than all, the impracticable claims of Pontificalists and Sacerdotalists, that there should even be a common agreement on this subject. It was because they knew this — because they were certain that the system they were seeking to re-inforce would be swept away for its inefficiency, its inequitableness, its incompatibility with modern circumstances and political ideas—that they protested against the attempt to root it more firmly in the soil, and against the further passage of the Bill. They could not but be doing their duty in taking that opportunity of bringing before the country the arguments against and objections to the system inaugurated in 1870, and it was their duty at every stage, at every opportunity, to emphasize the difficulties, the anomalies, the solecisms, the wrongs, the perils of the course now being pursued by the Government. Every day those wrongs were becoming more patent, and though now the Government might be able to carry the Bill, and might suppose they had permanently established its principles, a time would come when defeat would be all the more certain and sure. There was no error in politics or legislation which did not work its own revenge, and the temporary success of a fallacy must only make its ultimate confutation the more disastrous and complete. Before he said a few words on the religious aspect of the Bill he wished to draw the attention of the House to its economical and practical consequences. Regarding it merely from its political aspects, it was a solecism. It proposed to create a distinction between the privileges of parents in different parts of the country. Under the school board or in the town, parents whose children were to be educated had a voice in the selection of those who were to superintend their education. In country districts the enforcement of education was to be placed in the hands of boards who were utterly irresponsible to the class from which the children were taken, or who were the nominees of a State Department administered in the interests of the Church. That was a re-action against the whole course of modern English policy in relation to domestic government, and there was a danger in the arrangement. The powers of compulsion conferred on school boards had been generally assented to by the working men, because the breadth of the franchise gave them some voice in the creation and management of those bodies. But could the miner or the agricultural labourer be expected to be reconciled to the exercise of arbitrary powers by bodies completely above and foreign to them, in which they had no representative interest whatever? That was a blot on the Bill which nothing could remove; and the violation of principles of national administration and national economy in the present and in antecedent measures were glaring and indefensible. He would like to know in what other cases the Government asked private companies to undertake a duty like this with only occasional inspection, with only occasional checks on expenditure, with no efficiency, with positive carelessness, if not fraud, in the mode of spending the public money, and with manifest favouritism to one particular denomination? His charges against the denominational system were simple and straightforward. They were based upon Reports and Returns which had been presented to the House, and he could furnish the proofs in detail if required. He said the standard of education results under the denominational system were not only inferior to the education given in the board schools, but utterly ineffective to meet the just aims and expectations of a great national system of education. The standard and results, such as they were, were attained at an unnecessary cost, and this cost was increasing. Over £1,000,000 was being paid to what he might call private-contract schools, whilst the sum paid to board schools was only £75,130; and, more significant than all, out of 2,500,000 who ought to be at school, and out of the 1,000,000 and over who were supposed to attend school, only 508,000, as consistency, and hon. Members opposite had not altogether lost their liking for consistency. But what was the consistency of a Party who refused to abolish church rates in Scotland and consented to abolish them here? What would be the principles of a party who would force other people to send children to a school where those eternal principles were taught which they disbelieved? Logic and justice were equally disregarded, and it was a gentle euphemism to call their tactics by the term "inconsistent." There was one question which he would venture to ask hon. Gentlemen opposite, and which he would ask them carefully to put to their consciences. He would ask them whether, supposing that to-morrow every Church school in England was to become a Roman Catholic school, with a Roman Catholic teacher, under the management of a Roman Catholic priest, even with a Conscience Clause, they would vote for that Bill? He thought they would not; but if they did not, where was their consistency? He could imagine the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, when he went into the Division Lobby, as he would to-day, assisted by hon. Friends from Ireland who were in favour of denominational education, and he could fancy him slipping his arm into that of the hon. Member for Louth and saying—"My dear Sullivan, you have assisted us this year in passing this Bill; and now we will bring in a Bill next year to give to Ireland that which you have asked for—denominational education." The House knew that was an impossibility. Yet how could they justly deny to Ireland what they were taking for England? If the Bill passed, as he hoped it would not do, he, as a true Liberal, should feel obliged to give to Ireland what England had got for herself. He had not said anything at which hon. Gentlemen opposite could be justly offended, and he hoped no hon. Gentlemen would get up and throw at him, or the Party about him, the taunt that they on that side were associating themselves with socialists and infidels—that they did not desire State education, but were mere sectarian bigots. They threw back the taunt, and he would say with diffidence, but with truth, that with regard to the dogmas of the Church of England, that many of those on his side of the House who acted with him held as intelligent an appreciation of them as many on the opposite side, who were most loud in their vindication of Church privileges. He could enjoy the ritual of the Church of England; he could enter with profit and pleasure into her communion; his child lay in an Anglican churchyard, laid there of his own will, and interred by an Anglican minister, with the beautiful Service of that Church. It could not therefore be said that those on his side of the House who were opposing this measure were animated by sectarian bigotry; but he must enter his protest against passing that Bill, because he believed it was inconsistent with the best interests of religion and inconsistent with the principles of civil and religious liberty.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the principle of universal compulsion in Education cannot be applied without great injustice, unless provision be made for placing public Elementary Schools under public management,"—(Mr. Richard,)

—instead thereof.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, that differences of opinion on religion, politics, and on social questions, would, no doubt, always prevail in the country, and would find expression in that House; and he thought it indicated a wholesome state of society that they should be debated, even although it was done with vehemence. But, at the same time, it was fair to ask that, in this great chamber of Legislature, where time was of so much value, those who contraverted any argument should understand the principles of the Party opposed to them, and that they should, at all events, use a common language. If the builders of the Tower of Babel had met together after the confusion of tongues to discuss any subject, they would not have made much progress, nor could hon. Members conduct their discussions properly unless they used words which bore the same ordinary meaning. He maintained that the speech of the hon. Mover and Seconder of the Amendment, and all the utterances of the Liberation Society, the Birmingham League, and other like societies, showed an utter ignorance of the principles of their opponents and a complete disregard of the common English language. Almost every remark of the two hon. Gentlemen opposite showed that they did not understand what Church principles were, and he would therefore state them. The one great principle they held in the foreground was that of religious liberty, accompanied by parental authority as involved in personal freedom. As to the definition of words, it would really be convenient if those hon. Gentlemen would have recourse occasionally to Johnson's Dictionary. They talked of religious liberty when they meant religious equality, which were two distinct things. Religious liberty Churchmen absolutely accepted, as they did also religious equality so far as it implied the equality of individuals before the law; but the supporters of the present proposal when they used the latter term meant the equality of all religions before the law, and this was impossible, because it was at variance with the Constitution of the country. The Sovereignty of England was connected by many statutes with the English Church, and they could not be separated. Again, the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) spoke of the Church of England as "sectarian," and an agglomeration of all sorts of Nonconformists as "unsectarian;" but if he referred to Johnson's Dictionary he would find that a sectarian was a person separated from the Established Church. He probably by sectarianism meant bigotry and intolerance; but then he should say what he meant. He (Mr. Hubbard) maintained that the Church of England was the most unsectarian of all religious communities. He admitted, however, that the religion professed and the education imparted by the Church of England were dogmatic and denominational. The Church was Christian in its origin, Catholic in its creed, and Anglican in its nationality. There was, in fact, no such thing as undogmatic religion, for no one could repeat the first sentence of the Lord's Prayer without enunciating a dogma. He held religion to be the very essence of education, and believed there could be no such thing as education in its true sense without a religious basis. The three R's should be combined with religion, and education, not with three R's but with four, would be better worthy of its name. Though he lamented the change of policy introduced in 1870, he did not quarrel with it; but he asked that the Legislature should, at all events, not obstruct religious education. He (Mr. Hubbard) deeply regretted that no formula or creed should be used in board schools. The great evil of their exclusion was that it had led to so much misapprehension. The Catechism was a part of the Prayer Book, and the Prayer Book was a part of the law of the land, and every child brought to baptism was required by the law to learn the Church Catechism. It was a serious grievance to Churchmen that school boards were restrained from teaching the Church Catechism, were they ever so much inclined. The system of excluding all religious teaching from the school and by the schoolmaster had been tried in Birmingham; but he believed it was an entire failure, and, in any case, it was not one which would find favour with the English people. Then a hope had been held out that we should in time arrive at some system of religious teaching which should satisfy everybody. Some years ago, when Japan was turning over a new leaf and reforming everything, a committee was appointed by the Japanese Government with special instructions to contrive a religion which should satisfy everybody. He had not yet heard that the committee had reported; but until some such religion was discovered, he ventured to say that we must be satisfied to tolerate the co-existence of various and even differing religions, and allow them to influence the education provided by different denominations. Religion was an indispensable element in education, and no education could be really national unless religion was blended with it. Moreover, we must be satisfied that the religion taught in the schools came from the heart as well as from the lips of the teachers. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) in discussing Clause 14 of the Elementary Education Bill, the principle of which he accepted, strongly deprecated the notion that the effect of the clause was to bind the tongues and fetter the convictions of the teachers in the board schools. The right hon. Gentleman said it never was intended to have that effect, and it ought not to have it.

Unfortunately, however, it was obvious from a recent voluminous Return that the effect of the clause had been to create a general feeling throughout the country that Parliament intended to suppress anything like doctrinal teaching in the board schools, and the result was that, in supposed obedience to the law, religious teaching in these schools was often of the most meagre and unsatisfactory character. In this respect the board schools were under a serious disadvantage, and the hon. Members for Merthyr and Dundee should remedy those evils before asking Parliament to accept with open arms the extension of the board-school system throughout the country. Then, again, it had been said, with regard to State aid, that to make any grant whatever was an endowment of the school, whether of the Church or of any religious Body which received it, out of the funds contributed by the whole community. There was some truth in that view, for he had pointed out long ago that, having abolished church rates because they were expended without reference to the religious views of all those who were liable to pay them, they were re-applying that principle to education, and that the same difficulty would arise in an intensified degree and over a larger area. So long, however, as the present system existed, let the voluntary schools have fair play. School rates were raised from all religious denominations throughout the country; and upon what principle were Churchmen, who were three-fourths of the whole population, and therefore contributed three-fourths of the whole taxation, to be excluded from their fair share of the rates raised for the purpose of education? The rates were often now applied in a way which did not give them satisfaction. They were of opinion that board schools in which there was no religious teaching, as in Birmingham, were not a justifiable use of the rates. It was said that religious teaching in board schools could not be made satisfactory to everybody. He was willing, however, to leave a great deal to the teachers, and he thought Clause 14 in the Elementary Education Act should be so amended as to remove the serious misapprehension which now existed respecting its purport, and to make the teachers understand, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr.

Gladstone), that they might freely exercise their own religious instincts and convictions in teaching from the Bible according to the children's capacity. Meanwhile, the attempt to deprive denominational schools of any grant was utterly inconsistent with the principles of religious freedom. "Exclusive dealing" was the only term applicable to the course recommended by the hon. Member for Merthyr. The hon. Member wanted to apply the principle of exclusive dealing to the conductors of voluntary schools, whether Church of England, Wesleyan, or Roman Catholic. What the State said was practically this—"The law requires the education of all children, and the State engages to contribute a portion of the cost, defined and limited by the results attained in secular knowledge." That hon. Gentlemen should decline to allow such a contribution to be made to schools of a denominational character was to advocate "exclusive dealing," a principle destructive of all social peace and all social liberty. Whatever the board schools spent they recouped themselves out of the rates. Consequently they could not incur loss or deficiency; but, on the other hand, the denominational schools had to make great individual efforts and pecuniary sacrifices. The clergy of the Church of England were entitled to the highest praise and gratitude for the liberality with which they had kept their schools alive out of their slender means. He did not see why, because such efforts had been made, these meritorious managers should be further punished by being rated for the maintenance of schools which were their rivals. It was said in Birmingham—"Let all your schools be secular schools, and there will be no difficulty at all." He ventured to assert that the people of England never would assent to such a proposition. The people of England were thoroughly religious, and religious in the wise sense of seeing that all the complaints against dogmatic teaching were nonsense. The British and Foreign Schools of Joseph Lancaster had been held up to their admiration as the pioneers of education. He admitted the merits of Lancaster, and his memory should be venerated; but what was the difference between the systems of the British and Foreign School Society and the National Society? It was that while the latter was distinctly dog-

Mr. J. G. Hubbard

matic, the former was not. But the National Society had received seven times more children into its schools than the British and Foreign School Society. Either the Birmingham League or the Liberation Society issued a strong recommendation to the effect that, wherever the British and Foreign School Society had an opportunity of making a deficiency in the school accommodation of a parish they should shut their schools, so that board schools might be there established; and they did so. But in some cases where that proceeding had not the effect of closing the denominational schools they came again to the Department, and asked to be allowed to re-open their schools on the same terms as before. The hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), in an admirable speech he made a week or ten days ago, told the House how he had been applied to for a subscription to a Wesleyan school in his own neighbourhood, and had given it, as the hon. Gentleman, with his usual generosity, was sure to do. He asked upon what system the school was to be conducted. The answer was—"Our school is to be conducted as a public elementary school under the rule of the Wesleyan Conference, and it will be conducted by myself, a Wesleyan minister, and my assistants. But beyond that there will be nothing denominational about it." He confessed he admired the resolution of these people; they took the very course which the hon. Gentleman opposite would proscribe. The child was to be instructed in his religion in the school, and he would be further instructed in his religion in the chapel. As the child was, so would be the man. The people of England differed in their religious convictions, but in those convictions they were in earnest. The Wesleyans would have their schools. Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth, the father of the hon. Member for Hastings, presided lately at a tea meeting at a Wesleyan school—for the Wesleyans were very fond of tea—and in the course of his remarks he said—

"I am charmed to find that you have determined to connect the school with your own chapel in this parish. You are taking the right course. These schools should in every instance be adjuncts to the chapel."

He entirely concurred in that sentiment. He utterly disbelieved in the figment of a religion which was to satisfy everybody.

With reference to the Motion of the hon. Member for Merthyr, it was impossible for him to accept it. He was not prepared to Americanize our institutions. In the United States they had attempted to carry out the Common School system, striking out everything like religious instruction. Under that system of irreligious instruction a generation was growing up which was a curse to their parents, to society, and to themselves. It was only necessary to look at the picture of New York as drawn in The Times to see how demoralization had spread from the highest to the lowest, and all arising from their unfortunate departure from the true principles of education. He wished to preserve the institutions of which we were proud. If they could not entertain the same views on every subject, still they might have unity in this—that they were willing to extend to every man entire religious liberty, entire personal freedom, and treat with forbearance any expression of opinion by those who differed from them on this very vital question. He entirely dissented from the proposition of the hon. Member for Merthyr.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR said, the Education Act of 1870 would have pleased him much better if it had been more national and less denominational in its provisions. Yet he advocated the policy of endeavouring not to injure or retard denominational schools, already existing, unless where they were condemned as inefficient. But not to injure or retard denominational schools, and to still further encourage, assist, and endeavour to increase and perpetuate them, were very different courses of action, and the latter course appeared to him to be the direct tendency, if not the direct design, of the Bill. The eloquent speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for War would have dispelled any doubt on the question, and it determined several Opposition Members to vote against the Bill. School boards, notwithstanding the determined opposition they had encountered, had been almost universally successful where they had been established, and had not only succeeded in getting hundreds of thousands of once utterly neglected children into their own schools, but had also largely increased the attendance at denominational schools. Nor was he prepared to admit that the cost had been extravagant, whatever might be urged to the contrary; indeed, when they remembered the expensive sites that had to be purchased, frequently under compulsion; that school-houses had to be erected during a period when both labour and material were unusually high; and that the whole of the machinery for efficient school-board work had to be created, the wonder was that a larger expenditure had not been incurred. But, even if the cost were greater than it actually had been, he believed that it would have represented a wise, judicious, and, in the end, an economical expenditure of public money; and, considering that school boards had not yet been six years in existence, they might well be astonished at, and thankful for, the marked progress they had made and the work they had accomplished. He believed the School Board for London, of which he was once a member, had not erected a single school which was not proved by statistics to be required, and which was not sanctioned by the Education Department; and he thought it would be admitted that, in a rapidly-increasing town like Leicester, the accommodation provided was by no means excessive, and would, in a short time, be found insufficient. It would, therefore, be a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy not to make some allowance for the rapid increase that was going on. To judge merely by average attendances at schools was very fallacious. The attendance was much larger at some times than at others, just as it was at churches and other places. An outbreak of measles or scarlatina, the hop-picking season, or some interruption of that kind, would make a serious difference. For an average attendance of 300 children the Education Department held that 400 places should be provided, and the school boards were compelled by the Act to make such provision. Then, with regard to the greater amount of grant earned in voluntary schools, comparisons of that kind, as every one who studied the question must admit, were useless and unfair. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) had informed the House that in Non-conformist schools—including, it was presumed, British and Wesleyan schools—the amount earned was 13s. 0½d.; in Roman Catholic schools, 12s. 10¾d.; in Church schools, 12s. 8¼d.; and in board schools, 11s. 5¼d. But they must not lose sight of the fact that denominational school children had been in regular attendance, and were of a higher class than board-school children were. Many of the latter had been street Arabs, or gutter children, who, when gathered into schools, were utterly ignorant, undisciplined, and difficult to control or manage; therefore, to compare them with children of denominational schools who had had vastly superior advantages both at home and at school was very unfair, and was useless for the purpose the House had in view. There was another fact deserving of notice: the noble Lord had told the truth, but not the whole truth. The fact was that, taking the last year but one, ending the 31st of August, 1874, the grant earned in board schools in London was only 6s. 3d. per head, whereas in the following year, ending the 31st of August, 1875, it had risen to 10s. 11½d., thus showing a rapid and very gratifying improvement. He might add that the certainty of school-board children not being able to secure much of the Government grant was clearly perceived by many voluntary school managers and masters, and that after the formation of the School Board for London, when the Board had no schools of their own, they did their utmost to force the children into denominational schools, and to fill the vacant places of which so much had been said. But the Board soon discovered that they were engaged in a very difficult and thankless task, and that there was the greatest reluctance on the part of the voluntary schools to receive such children, partly because they feared that some parents of the better class might object to their children being associated with street Arabs, and, perhaps, still more, because those voluntary schools foresaw that the introduction of such children would lower the standard of the school and reduce the average amount of the grant to be received. In order to avoid this, the school fees were raised, in some instances nearly doubled, and all sorts of objections were made with a view to the exclusion of these "gutter children." And now what had been clearly foreseen and carefully guarded against was brought forward as an argument to show the inferiority of board schools. The greater cost of board schools in London might also be accounted for by the fact that the balance-sheets in the first year of their existence contained no Government grant, and that all the temporary schools, having to be provided with furniture, books, and apparatus, paid for out of the current account, were much more costly than the permanent schools. But the net cost was diminishing half-year by half-year, as children were induced to pay better fees and as the Government grant became higher. If this Bill passed in its present form it would render the future extension of school boards difficult, if not impossible, and would still further promote the interests of denominational schools; indeed, it would enable many of these schools to be altogether independent of any voluntary aid. Some of them were so at present, and he had heard of instances in which a surplus was secured. It would also enable rate-supported schools in many rural districts to become as sectarian and as denominational as any schools were at present. He believed unfair means had been adopted in many instances to prevent the establishment of school boards; that the Conscience Clause had not always been faithfully acted upon; and that in some cases the law had been broken, or, while its letter had been kept, its spirit had been, he was going to say, shamefully violated. At first the policy was to endeavour to prevent the establishment of school boards, where it was possible to do so; but latterly a different and more objectionable policy had been adopted. Great efforts had been made and undue influences used to obtain a board even in places where ample school accommodation already existed, but where a sufficient number of managers favourable to denominational teaching could be secured. Denominational schools were then let to the board, the hour from 9 to 10 in the morning being reserved by the former managers for any Catechism to be taught or any religious instruction to be given. The schools were, therefore, just as denominational as they had been before, with this important addition—that the protection of the Conscience Clause could be dispensed with, and the schools were supported by the rates. Remonstrances to the Education Department only produced the reply that the law had not been broken. He disapproved of the proposal to substitute Town Councils and Boards of Guardians for school boards, because whatever might be the case with Town Councils, the farmers, as a class, cared very little about education, and were very little disposed to tax themselves for this purpose. Having quoted the remarks made on the education of the children of agricultural labourers by farmers at a meeting at Guildford, the hon. Member said he pitied the poor children who were dependent upon such Guardians for their education. Another objection to giving this power to Guardians and Town Councillors was that some of the school boards had working-men upon them, who were not the least valuable of the members. Town Councils and Boards of Guardians were, however, elected upon a property qualification, and therefore working-men, whose presence upon school boards was a satisfaction to the working classes, would be excluded from these bodies. The noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon) had rendered valuable services to the London School Board while a member of it, and he was the last man to whom improper motives could be attributed. But whatever might have been the intention of the framers of this Bill its effect would be to encourage and perpetuate denominational schools, and it would not, therefore, meet the necessities of the case or do the best that might have been done for the children of this country. Before sitting down he wished to refer to the warm and indignant reply of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) which had been called forth by some observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon). The hon. Member for Berkshire had deprecated the introduction of the religious element into this question, and had said he had read with great regret a certain document containing a remonstrance against the Bill. He (Mr. M'Arthur) heard the speech of the hon. Member for Berkshire with great regret, because he felt that it must elicit an answer, and that it would have been wiser not to agitate such a question, if it could have been avoided. The hon. Member had mentioned a case to show that there was really no religious difficulty, and had asserted that these remonstrances were got up for Party and political purposes. For his part, he must protest against such an imputation, and he could safely protest against it also on behalf of many friends throughout the country with whom he was acquainted. He had no unfriendly feeling towards the Church of England, or any other denomination in the country. There were many Church of England clergymen whom it had been his pleasure and his privilege to know, and with whom he was still associated in various ways. They were men for whom he entertained the greatest respect and esteem. There were many whose ministry he would just as soon attend as that of the Church to which he belonged; many whose instruction he would be equally willing that his children should receive; but he was bound also to say that there were many denominational schools where the instruction given was of a character which he should be sorry for any child of his own, or any over whom he had any control, to receive. The hon. Member had also spoken of intolerance on the part of Nonconformists towards Churchmen in this matter, and said that he had never felt the same intolerance in dealing with them. He fully believed that statement of the hon. Member, and it would be well for the Church if many others would imitate the hon. Member's example. But the hon. Member had also remarked that while Nonconformists were ready to discover points of difference when the question was one of sending children to school, they ought to be a little more consistent than they were when they asked for the help of Churchmen to build their own schools. The hon. Member had then read a letter which he had received from a Wesleyan minister, acknowledging a subscription which the hon. Member had generously given. He (Mr. M'Arthur) hoped the hon. Member did not imagine that such applications came from Nonconformists only. Many Nonconformists received similar applications for help to build schools from Churchmen; sometimes, too, from clergymen or curates, who were so overworked and so underpaid that, unless they had some private means of their own, they found it difficult, if not impossible, to educate their children, to dress respectably, or to live in moderate comfort. When such cases were known to be genuine and deserving they were avourably responded to according to the means of the donors; and that was only as it ought to be, and he did not say there was any particular credit to be attached to any party for it. But as the hon. Member had read a letter, perhaps he also might be permitted to read one, though of a different character, on the subject. It had been written some time in May last, and had probably been sent to a large number of persons. The name of the writer was given, but he had, perhaps, better omit it. It was as follows:—

“ We are very anxious to secure £1,000 before Michaelmas to enable us to begin a mission in a large and poor population sunk in infidelity and Dissent here. Will you kindly send at least £1 towards this work, which has the sanction of our diocesan.”

This appeal was addressed by the clergyman to a well-known Manchester merchant who was the deacon of an Independent church, and whose son replied to it that if he had known his father personally he presumed he would not have addressed him in terms implying that the members of the religious communion to which he belonged were to be classed with infidels. He would not, however, trouble the House with the whole correspondence. Perhaps also he might refer to a catechism published by a reverend vicar in Essex for the use of families and schools, in which the children were taught that the various sects and denominations which came under the head of Dissenters must be regarded as heretics who worshipped God according to their own evil and corrupt imaginations, and not according to His revealed will, and that their worship was in direct opposition to God. He did not think that teaching of that kind was very well calculated to promote friendly feelings between Nonconformists and Churchmen in that House, and when the charge of intolerance was bandied in that way, it must be evident to the House that if there was intolerance it was not to be found all on one side of the House. But they were told that the Conscience Clause would protect the child and prevent any unfair advantage from being taken. He was perfectly willing to admit that the Conscience Clause was frequently fairly acted upon; but he was equally certain that very frequently it was the reverse, and that the law was, if not broken, at all events evaded. They all knew that almost every week brought to light some case in which this was illustrated—some case like that referred to by his hon.

Mr. A. M'Arthur

Friend the Member for Merthyr, which roused the just indignation and contempt of every lover of fair play and civil and religious liberty in this land. They disapproved of caste in India, and were endeavouring to break it down, because they believed it to be injurious to commerce, civilization, and Christianity; but if they might judge from the correspondence which had taken place in the Perse case, no Brahmin in India ever clung with greater tenacity to his caste than the rev. gentleman at Cambridge who had gained an unenviable notoriety was disposed to cling to his, and avoid every Dissenting Pariah. Yet with all these things staring them in the face, they were told that there was no religious difficulty. How any hon. Member could say so, he could not understand. He maintained there was a religious difficulty, one for which Nonconformists were not responsible, but which at the same time pressed very heavily on many of them. He believed that the character maintained in former days by the Established Church of this country, of being the great bulwark of Protestant Christianity in this land, could not be sustained by, at all events, a considerable section of her ministers and people during the present day, and on that point he might also be permitted to give some little illustration. Reference was made by his hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr to the catechism published by the Church Extension Association. He was not going to detain the House by reading extracts from it, but he would just say that that catechism inculcated the doctrines of baptismal regeneration and priestly absolution for both original and actual sin. It also taught that they need not look for salvation out of the Church; the infallibility of the Church's teaching; the Real Presence in the Sacrament of the Eucharist; prayers for the dead, and the necessity of auricular confession and absolution. It was men who held and taught such doctrines that caused a great deal of the unpleasant feeling and the religious difficulty. Hon. Gentlemen opposite professed to be very zealous for Protestantism, and he hoped that they would show that they were indignant when they heard of such doctrines as those he had referred to. Perhaps he might be allowed to quote the opinion of a highly respectable Bishop of the Church of England on the subject. The Bishop of Sydney was in this country a few years ago, and after returning to the colony, and when addressing the Church Society, composed of his own clergy and the Church members, he said that the Church of England's disregard of all solemn obligation did appear to him inexplicable. Her adoption of Roman phraseology and practices and power of sympathy with Romanism and contempt of the Reformation were totally inconsistent, as it appeared to him, with an honest adherence to the Church of England. He (Mr. M'Arthur) repeated that it was not surprising that the Nonconformists in this country should object to send their children to schools where such doctrines were taught and such principles inculcated. He would also commend to the consideration of the House the concluding paragraphs of the Rev. Henry Bowden's letter in The Times on Friday last. He could understand and respect those who from conscientious conviction went over to the Roman Catholic Church, or any other Church, but it was difficult to understand the honour or honesty of men who, while professing themselves to be clergymen of the Established Church and eating her bread, were sapping her foundations, leading astray her youth from the principles in which they were brought up, and betraying the trust reposed in them. He trusted that this, at all events, would be some excuse for the opposition that was offered to this Bill, and that while such a state of things continued to exist, there must and there ought to be a religious difficulty, and nothing short of one school board or undenominational school in every district would satisfy the reasonable demand of Nonconformists in this country.

MR. GREENE said, the Motion submitted to the House by the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) was one he (Mr. Greene) entirely objected to, as being in favour of secular education, and the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. M'Arthur), in supporting it, had alluded to many unhappy circumstances that had occurred to some few members of the Church of England. In so large a body it was to be expected that some would not act wisely or prudently, and he deprecated the teaching of such men. He would point out that the minds of children were not capable of understanding abstruse religious doctrine, and he would rather incur the risk, such as it was, of some error being taught than see religious education abolished in our schools. The question before the House was whether the children of this country should be taught religiously or not, and it was idle to ask hon. Members on that side of the House, who had been returned by those who held different views from the hon. Member for Merthyr, to support the proposition he had brought before them. Religious teaching had always gone hand in hand with education, and he wished to see it continued. An attempt was made to cast a slur on the education given in the agricultural districts; but he would remind the House that the clergy and country gentlemen were the pioneers of education when it found no favour with the cotton spinner or the ironmaster. It was, therefore, late in the day to find fault with an organization that had done so much good. He, for one, felt grateful to the Wesleyans, Independents, and Baptists, for being fellow-workers in the cause of education with Churchmen, and he believed the day was not far distant when they would agree on some principle of religious teaching which would once for all clear away that religious difficulty of which they had heard so much. He hoped, therefore, that they would not spend more time over Motions of that kind, but would go into Committee and endeavour to make the Bill as perfect as possible. He believed the measure was in the main acceptable to the country generally, and that if passed it would do more to forward education than any attempt by direct compulsion to force all the children into the schools. He thought all must give the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council credit for having endeavoured to produce a workable Bill; but he (Mr. Greene) confessed he was not surprised that Nonconformists should feel as they did when they saw such letters as had been quoted from The Times of Saturday, and when they know that there were churches in which such ceremonies as were not in accordance with the principles of the Church of England were performed. But he believed they had power to put that down, and that it would soon become entirely a thing of the past. Certainly, if he believed it was the teaching of the Church of England he would not remain a member of that Church for a single day. But feeling confident that that was not her teaching, he gave the Bill his cordial support.

MR. MORLEY said, the principle affirmed in the Amendment was, that there should be protection for Nonconformist parents who might object to the teaching of Church schools, and he should be thankful to see a disposition on the part of Churchmen to meet them in this matter. He was no advocate for the exclusion of the Bible from the schools, nor of a sectarian system of teaching. The people, he thought, had settled that question. He did not believe that of our large population there was more than a fractional part favourable to the extension of exclusively secular education. [An hon. MEMBER: What about Birmingham?] Birmingham was a striking exception, and he was rather surprised at that town accepting the system adopted by its board. But he was prepared to say, with some slight knowledge of the opinions of working men, that while amidst the conflicts of sects they got sick of the controversy on religious teaching, there was no objection on their part to the honest, fair, and simple use of the Bible in schools by teachers who would not prostitute their opportunities in order to enforce denominational education. He had an extract from the National Society's monthly organ for February, 1872, which threw some light on the directions given by the National Society to their teachers. It said—

“There is need now more than ever that our teachers should be more thoroughly fitted for the religious side of their work; they should not only be religious people, but sound Church people. Is it too much to hope that the Church will furnish an abundant supply of devout young people who will give themselves earnestly to the work of school teaching in the belief that there is no more effective way of benefiting their fellow-creatures than by giving them a sound education in the theology of the Church of England.”

“In the present condition of Church schools it is more than ever necessary that they should be made the nurseries of Church principles. This is the object at which we should aim—the training of the young Christian for full communion, and, as a preliminary to that, a training for confirmation. The whole school time of a child should lead up to this.”

This language, when addressed to Church schools in the City of London, where we had abundance of schools for the people to choose from, and where the children attending the school were connected with the Church, might be very natural; but in the country villages, where the poor were to be subjected for the first time to a special system of compulsion, we had a right to ask for protection for them from such training. The parent, who was exposed to that training, and who conscientiously objected to it, should have the right of appeal, not to the Committee of Council on Education, or by deputation to the Lord President, but to some local power which could interpose and effectually protect him in the training of his children. He had not the slightest doubt that in many of our villages the Conscience Clause was a dead letter. He deliberately expressed the opinion that people dared not expose themselves to the fear of social consequences if, in a small village, they availed themselves of the Conscience Clause and withdrew their children from religious teaching. He knew a village where, out of 135 who attended the National School, upwards of 100 withdrew from the teaching of the Catechism; but that was because it had been made clear to them that they were at liberty to do it, and that no consequences could possibly ensue by their taking such a course. Reference had been made to the religious teaching in the board schools of London. That teaching was based on a resolution moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), seconded by himself (Mr. Morley), and adopted almost unanimously, and was now in operation. The resolution was as follows:—

“That in the schools provided by the Board the Bible shall be read, and there shall be given such explanations and such instruction therefrom in the principles of morality and religion as are suited to the capacities of children, provided always—

“1. That in such explanations and instruction the provisions of the Act in Sections 7 and 14 be strictly observed, both in letter and spirit, and that no attempt be made in any such schools to attach children to any particular denomination.

“2. That in regard of any particular school the Board shall consider and determine upon any application by managers, parents, or ratepayers of the district who may show special cause for the exception of the school from the operation of this resolution, in whole or in part.”

Upon the character of the teaching in the schools, he asked permission to read a few lines from the Inspector's (Mr. Noble's) Report—

“Since the adoption of the regulation fixing the time at which the Bible should be read and explained, I have observed considerable uniformity in the mode in which teachers have acted upon their instructions. A chapter is read either by the head teacher, or the children in the upper class of the school, and then such ‘explanation and instruction’ are given as are ‘suited to the capacities of the scholars.’ This instruction is in no way less reverentially imparted than in voluntary schools, and I have observed no desire on the part of a teacher in any instance to shirk this essential part of his duty. It is but just to say of all our teachers, that they seem to be fully impressed with the importance of this part of their work, and, at the same time, are anxious to avoid the violation of the Board regulations and the Act of Parliament by giving this teaching a denominational colour. In infants' schools, exactly the same practice is followed as in denominational schools; the teacher selects a text of Scripture, which she explains and illustrates in a manner that the children can understand.”

On this subject of religious teaching in schools and the desirability of concession, he would refer to a letter he had received a few days before from a clergyman of the Church of England, who said—

“It is my strong conviction that any enlargement and consolidation of denominational education will henceforth tend to narrowness and to the hurtful increase of sacerdotal influence. The great wealth and organization of the Roman Catholic and Episcopal Churches will enable them through denominational schools to obtain great entrenched camps of the future. If the Government could be induced to assist one kind of school only—namely, a true national school in which the Bible shall be read and taught, I believe the further greatness and harmony of England would be promoted.”

He (Mr. Morley) was assured that not a few of the clergy largely shared that opinion. He understood the object of the Amendment was to appeal to Churchmen to meet them in the matter. He believed if the Catechism were excluded from the day school and reserved for its proper place—the Sunday school, or reserved for special hours in one or two days of the week—a great deal of the difficulty would be got rid of, and he was certain that there were hon. Members opposite who were as indisposed to press upon the consciences and judgment of those whom they were seeking to benefit as any on the Liberal side of the House. He might mention, as showing the feeling of the working classes on this point, that at a very recent meeting of the London

School Board two deputations were received. One consisted of the Rev. R. T. West and the Rev. D. Moore, who presented a memorial objecting to the Board holding a transferred mission-hall school, on the ground that provision for the all children would be made otherwise than by board schools, and asking to have the mission-hall transferred to a denomination. It was stated that the denomination had raised a large sum of money to supply any deficiency. This deputation was introduced by Mr. Mills, M.P., and the Rev. Dr. Irons. The second deputation consisted chiefly of labouring men—one in the uniform of a railway porter—and they were headed by Admiral Fishbourne, who stated that the mission-hall was built 10 years ago to supply a want in the district, and the school had always been well maintained in regard to numbers of children, and the sum received from the Government grant showed a high state of efficiency. When the Act was passed the supporters who subscribed to the school could not afford to pay the rates and subscribe too, and so the school was transferred to the Board with the perfect satisfaction of the parents, who desired that the religious teaching should be unsectarian, such as was taught in the board schools. The objection to the mission-hall school came from Dr. West, of the Ritualistic Church, and the speaker begged to state that if the Board listened to the parochial clergy who had waited upon them, and shut up the school, the original trustees would carry it on, for the parents would not subject the children to the teaching of Ritualistic Churches, and they all regarded this action of the parochial clergy in endeavouring to close the school as a piece of ecclesiastical tyranny. This showed the feeling of the working classes in regard to the religious education as given in the London board schools. He felt that we were under great obligations to the clergy of the Established Church for their services, and no word had ever passed his lips which was otherwise than respectful towards them, and mindful of the sacrifices they had made. But we had come now to a point at which he believed it would be the best policy of the Established Church to make some substantial concession in this matter, and he maintained that in the reading and teaching of the Bible there was every possible guarantee for the religious teaching of the school. He especially appealed to the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council to lend his aid in this matter. He was persuaded that if something was not done, they would have an embittered controversy which would only end in the establishment of secular schools, a result which he personally would regard with extreme disfavour. It would eliminate from education the really honest religious element and the inculcation of truths universally held amongst us. He believed with one of our Bishops, who had said that if half-a-dozen men on each side of the controversy were to go into a room and spend an hour or two in considering the matter, the one condition being that they were all in favour of religious education, they would be able to decide on such a system of religious teaching as would meet the fair necessities of the case. He hoped the noble Lord would aid by endeavouring to influence those who were unreasonable on both sides. The principle of religious liberty was infringed if any parent was compelled from fear of consequences to subject his child to religious teaching to which he had conscientious objections. He thought he might venture to say that his right hon. Friend would confirm that. He was prepared to defend the system of religious teaching of the London board schools, for quite as much of that kind of teaching was given in them as in the denominational schools, and, beyond that, he could point to the recent examinations for the gratifying results of the system they pursued. He had no expectation that his hon. Friend would be able to carry his Motion; but he hoped he would divide the House, for he regarded it as a protest against the embittered controversy to which the Bill would give rise, and therefore he would give it his support.

MR. HALSEY said, the speech of the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) would have been more appropriate if it had been made on the introduction of the Education Bill of 1870. From that speech he inferred that the hon. Member's object was the establishment of universal unsectarian schools. Even if school boards were universally established we should not have universal unsectarian schools so long as we had the Act of 1870, because the existing denominational schools were recognized under that Act. Therefore, in order to carry out the purport of the Amendment, the hon. Member would have to bring in a Bill to entirely repeal the Act of 1870. For his own part, from his experience as a manager of a voluntary school and as the chairman of a school board in a rural district, he was of opinion that hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House were a little too prejudiced against school boards. He could assure hon. Members, on the contrary, that those bodies were of use, and in many districts, he believed, if the difficulty were boldly grappled with, that the school board would provide a satisfactory solution of it; but he hoped the day would never come when universal school boards would be established by force of law, whether with the condition of compulsory bye-laws or not. He greatly preferred the proposal in the Bill, because it was admirably calculated to meet the difficulties that stood in the way of education in country districts. To place power in the hands of a committee of the Board of Guardians was a wise and an economical proposal. He understood that the hon. Member for Merthyr objected to Boards of Guardians having power to make rules for compulsory attendance at school, and insisted that school boards only should have that power. But the fact was that generally speaking 99 out of every 100 members of school boards were members of Board of Guardians. If the proposal for the establishment of universal school boards were adopted the only persons who would be fitted to serve upon them in rural districts would be the same squires and farmers who managed the existing schools. The fact must not be lost sight of that it was more troublesome to serve upon school boards in rural districts than in large towns where the factory owner could leave his work with the certainty that it would go on with the regularity of clockwork in his absence, while the prosperity of the farmer depended entirely upon his personal presence and supervision. Under these circumstances it was almost certain that if school boards were universally established, the duties would be badly performed or not performed at all in rural districts. It must also be remembered that where there was not sufficient school accommodation school boards would still be appointed—a fact that cut away the ground from under the feet of the hon. Member opposite. For these reasons, he thought the proposal of the Government to entrust those duties to Boards of Guardians was a most wise and judicious one, and was especially adapted to the wants of rural districts, for which he claimed especially to speak, from a life-long knowledge of them. He would add, that he also entirely approved the method proposed in the Bill for putting a sort of indirect compulsion upon the parents by not allowing their children to go to work until they had attended school for so many years, or had passed certain educational Standards. That was a better plan than bringing the policeman and the magistrate and fine and imprisonment into play to enforce direct compulsion. He protested against the attempts of hon. Members opposite to mix up the so-called religious difficulty, which in his opinion did not exist at all, with this Bill, as by doing so they were greatly injuring the cause of national education. The Government, in his opinion, had taken the right course; and if the Bill passed, it would do more to promote a thorough general education than any form of direct compulsion which could be imagined, and certainly more than could be associated with the speech of the hon. Member for Merthyr, and the disestablishment of the Established Church, which he trusted would never take place. He should give his vote against the Amendment, and in favour of the Bill.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE, while fully admitting the energy and courage of the Dissenters as a body, could not regard their present action as being consistent with the toleration they had always professed to have at heart. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard) had read a number of extracts from certain works which contained propositions which were utterly repudiated by the Church of England at large, and especially by her authorities, and it was not fair to condemn the whole body of Churchmen for the eccentricities and the follies of the few. It was not because certain absurdities were practised, and an unauthorized catechism was taught in half-a-dozen Church schools that 12,000 voluntary schools were to be made to suffer. This wholesale condemnation on the part of the hon. Member of those who had done so much for education before 1870 was neither tolerant, nor fair.

upon his part. The Motion, too, of the hon. Member in his (Mr. Cowper Temple's) opinion was neither just, fair, nor tolerant. It was capable of several interpretations, and it appeared to offer three alternatives. One was to prevent the powers of compulsion being exercised in voluntary schools; but that would inflict upon our children the injury of continuing to be irregular in going to school, and leave them still under the influence of careless or idle parents, or of their own heedlessness or folly. Another alternative would be the creation of school boards in places where the existing Bodies could do all the necessary work, and this would tend to injure the ratepayers in the localities by increasing the burden of the rates; while a third alternative would be to transfer the management of the existing voluntary schools from their present managers to local Governing Bodies. With regard to the first of those alternatives, he did not think it necessary to say anything, for no one would deny that compulsory powers were needed in all the public elementary schools. The second could not be adopted in the dissatisfaction so generally felt at the burden of school board rates. Although the Boards of Guardians appeared to be the best elective body in the rural districts to administer the duties imposed by the Bill, they would be ill fitted to undertake the ordinary management of schools, and the members would be much surprised if asked to undertake such a duty, in addition to the business now devolved upon them, even supposing they considered themselves qualified. His own belief was that if there was a body of persons who deserved encouragement, it was the managers of voluntary schools, who had, by their own labour and expenditure, supplied education for the poorer classes where the State neglected them. They had discharged this work of benevolence and patriotism well, and did not deserve to have a slur cast upon them. The adoption of any one of the three alternatives he had mentioned would be a great loss to the children, and the supposed remedy would prove worse than the existing evil. It was not correct to assume that clergymen were the sole managers of the voluntary schools. In all cases it was necessary to appoint managing committees as representatives of subscribers, and they were responsible for their share in the affairs of the schools. The defence of the Motion was based upon the so-called insufficiency of the Conscience Clause; and it was contended that under the law, as it stood at present, children were compelled to listen to religious instruction in denominational schools, whether their parents wished it or no. Those, however, who took that view did not really know how the Conscience Clause worked. It was, perhaps, true before the passing of the Act of 1870, when the clergyman or schoolmaster had the power to give religious instruction at any time in school hours. But now that state of things had been altered, and it was only possible for religious instruction to be given before or after the lessons in other subjects had been given. From a Return on the Table of the House, he found that out of 10,800 schools 98 per cent had the religious teaching given before or after the register of attendances had been taken. Consequently, parents could, with the greatest ease, arrange that their children should arrive at the school in time to be entered on the roll after the religious instruction was over, or leave the school before it begun; and the teachers had no pecuniary interest in the attendance of children during the religious teaching. The Conscience Clause was, in fact, self acting. He admitted, however, that there might be a few cases in which the law was not strictly observed; but for these, the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had placed upon the Paper would give an ample remedy. If the Conscience Clause was observed and enforced, a voluntary school was just as secular a school as a board school. That was to say, it was so, so far as the children of Nonconformists were concerned; but it had the recommendation of being a religious school to those children whose parents desired it. He thought it would be terrible if they were, for the sake of remedying a fancied grievance, to deprive children of getting a religious education, which, though very elementary, might prove the foundation of their future progress in religious knowledge. It was difficult to discover cases in which children were proselytized in the denominational schools. Proselytism might be carried on, but it was outside the schools. The proposition to prohibit the schoolmaster and the schoolmistress from giving religious instruction was a most extraordinary one, for they were the persons best qualified for imparting to the minds of the children those elementary truths which they ought to receive. The attitude of the Nonconformists towards the Church was well described during the debate in 1870 by one of the most eminent of their number—Mr. Winterbotham—as being one of watchful jealousy. That jealousy had accomplished a great deal. It brought about the Time-Table Conscience Clause at the sacrifice of much of the good influence previously exercised in the schools. That vigilant jealousy ought not to outlive the circumstances that supplied its excuse, nor be indulged to the hindrance of regular attendance in all public schools. No case of grievance had been made out, on behalf of Nonconformists. If anything like a real grievance existed, he would be among the first to endeavour to remedy it. But this Resolution, if carried, would create a grievance on the managers and conductors of voluntary schools, and those who had subscribed for their support. He opposed the Amendment because he saw in it a tendency to secularism. Secularism was repugnant to the feelings and judgment of the nation; and yet there was a certain power of logic and circumstances which was continually drawing men down towards that gulf. Earnest men, unable to untie the knot of the religious difficulty, were inclined to cut it by stopping religious teaching in the schools altogether. What he disliked in secularism was its tyranny and contempt of the conscientious convictions of Christians. He believed that the great security as regarded religious teaching was to give as much liberty as possible—liberty to those who taught, liberty to those who were taught. Let them leave to the conductors of voluntary schools the freedom they possessed to teach what they believed to be necessary and suitable for the children, with the existing safeguards against any teaching to which their parents objected, and if any cases could be found in which the Conscience Clause was not observed, let them be reported to the Education Department, and the noble Lord might be trusted with the duty of giving an account of them, and of finding a remedy against their continuance.

MR. PAGET said, the hon. Member who moved the Amendment (Mr. Richard) had wandered very far, in recommending it to the House, from the principle it expressed. The hon. Gentleman had laid before them a very long list of the grievances of the Dissenters; but when they came to be examined he believed those grievances would be found to be entirely imaginary. The Amendment, if it meant anything, meant this—war to the knife to voluntary schools. He was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman say he was no great advocate of the principle of direct compulsion, preferring the more gentle system of persuasion. The feeling of the country did not go with an uniform system of compulsion; and if they wished the children of the country to be educated, they must have the feeling of the people favourable to the system of education which they adopted. The hon. Gentleman, though he would destroy the voluntary schools, did not say, and could not say, they were inefficient. The fact that £816,000 had been subscribed in their support in the course of a single year was sufficient to show that the mind of the country was in their favour. It had been asserted though, by other speakers, that voluntary schools were inefficient and expensive. The result, however, proved their teaching was more satisfactory than the rate schools, and a glance at the figures would show that the proposition that they were more expensive could not be maintained. This Bill was intended to supplement and complete the Bill of 1870, but was there no other blot on that measure than that of unfilled schools? It could not be denied that, in endeavouring to avoid the Scylla of the religious difficulty, they had fallen into the Charybdis of the irreligious difficulty. It was a strange fact the outcome of their mutual mistrust in the matter of religion should give rise to what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, in the year 1870, called a monstrous thing. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“Would it not be a monstrous thing that the Book which, after all, is the foundation of the religion we profess, should be the only Book that was not allowed to be used in our schools?”
—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 458.]

Birmingham was the great, but by no means the only, blot on the system, for he found that in no less than 140 board schools there appeared to be no provision for religious teaching, though in some the Bible was used as a text book. He was glad, therefore to see on the Notice Paper an Amendment in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire which would have the effect of enlarging the scope of religious teaching in board schools. He ventured to think the line taken by the London School Board was one which might well be adopted for the whole country, for he found from a Return which had been recently presented to the House by one of the Inspectors of that Board that out of 60,000 children in the district which he visited, there were during the past year only 28 objections on the score of religious principle, 17 out of the 28 coming from members of the Hebrew persuasion, which left a balance of but 11 as the sum total of Christian objections. Now, if that were to be taken as a measure of religious difficulty, was it not, he would ask, too miserably minute to be worth the consideration of the House? Regarding the present Bill as an attempt to supplement the Bill of 1870, he thought it was absolutely necessary something should be done in the matter of finance, because it was in his opinion extremely objectionable that such restrictions should be imposed as under the existing law on Government grants merely by means of departmental arrangements. The main principle of the Act of 1870 was that those grants should be given as payment for results, but when they came to be limited in one direction and another that principle was altogether sacrificed. The system of rating school buildings was also in his opinion mischievous. There was no fairness in it, because board schools, though nominally rated, were actually free from rates, inasmuch, as they put one hand in the pocket of the ratepayers, and paid the rates in that way with the other. In order, then, to place all schools on an equal footing the best things to do was to declare no buildings employed for school purposes should be liable to rates at all. Another Amendment which was, he thought, necessary, was that there should be absolute power to dissolve school boards, for their very name was beginning to stink in the nostrils of the people, who ought to be afforded an opportunity of getting rid of what they declared to be useless. Again, as to denominational teaching, where, he would ask, would the education of the country have been before 1870 but for the denominational system, which had worked so vigorously and heartily, and which was in accordance, he believed, with the feelings of the great majority of the nation? It was an established fact that regular attendance was secured by good teaching, and one of the London School Board Inspectors, whose Report he quoted, thought it would go far to obviate the necessity for continuing the exercise of compulsion. Let it not be said that there was no sufficient sign in the country to induce the Government to adopt some of those Amendments. Let it not be supposed that the Amendments on the Paper were not called for by the country; it was not always the greatest clamour that gave evidence of the deepest feeling, and there was such a force in Nature as silent but irresistible strength. This was the time to give effect to the feeling of the nation in favour of religious teaching—

“Where shall wisdom be found? The depth saith It is not me! and the sea saith It is not with me. Behold the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding.”

That wisdom ought to form part of our national education. Could we not get rid of those twin demons of mistrust and suspicion, and unite in the spirit of charity, to carry on the work of education not only in secular matters, but in the eternal truths of Christianity?

MR. MUNDELLA said, he should not have taken part in the debate were it not for the speech of the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Paget). He (Mr. Mundella) had no difficulty in responding to the challenge just made, and declaring that hon. Members on that side desired to co-operate in a spirit of kindness and charity in promoting the education of the country; if he voted for the Amendment it would not be that he meant to declare war to the knife to the voluntary schools. On the other hand, he had no wish it should be supposed that he desired to promote a purely secular system—what hon. Members opposite regarded as an infidel system, and to exclude the Bible. He never would be a party to any Act of Parliament that would exclude the Bible from the common schools of the country; but, on the other hand, he would not join with hon. Members opposite in an attempt to enforce a minimum of religious instruction in the schools of the country. The safest way to promote the religious education of the country was to leave it to the religious feeling of the country; and they had the best proof of it in the fact that there were more children receiving religious education at that moment, and a better religious education, than ever had been received in this country before. Any man who really desired the religious education of the children of this country ought to rejoice at what he saw going on in all the large towns. [An hon. MEMBER: Birmingham.] Well, let them wait until the hon. Member for Birmingham took his seat for the defence of the Birmingham School Board. He was concerned with the general education of the country; and not for the 7,000 children of Birmingham only, about whom so much was said. He could point to twice as many in the schools of Sheffield who were receiving a religious education which was not surpassed by that given in any of the schools of the country. In the metropolis the schools gave a religious education which could not be excelled, and it was a matter for rejoicing that such was the case. He repudiated the animus against voluntary schools that was imputed to him and others, and admitted that there was enough to do to supplement their work; but a further question was raised by the position of the schools referred to in the Amendment. The words "public management" were both ambiguous and embarrassing, and meant where they stood a great deal more than his hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydvil put in his speech. There were few Members in that House who had not been or were school managers, but nobody dreamt of taking away the control of voluntary schools from such managers. ["Oh, oh!"] His hon. Friend stated that as plainly as possible towards the close of his speech. ["No, no!"] What he desired was that there should be public supervision of voluntary schools, and no more than that public control over the expenditure of public money, which was contended for by so many in the debate on the Prisons Bill. From a Return just placed in the hands of hon. Members it appeared that £3,800,000 was expended last year on education in England and Wales. Of that, £800,000 was voluntarily contributed—a fact which deserved the highest consideration at the hands of the House. But that £800,000 would under this Act be a decreasing quantity, while the £3,000,000 were an increasing quantity, and two or three years hence we should be spending £5,000,000 a-year on education, not 10 per cent of which would be derived from voluntary contributions. He admitted that in London and in the large towns the religious difficulty was a trifle, for if the parents of a child were not satisfied with a denominational school, they might send it to a British and Foreign or to a board school, but that was not the case in the rural districts; there would be there but one school, and to that all the children of the district would have to resort, and the increased grants would be given almost exclusively to the schools of one denomination. If there were only 100 purely Roman Catholic schools in the 14,000 parishes in the country to which the children of Church people must be sent or not be educated at all, would hon. Gentlemen opposite pass this Bill without further safeguards? ["Yes, yes!"] Not they. He did not believe they could honestly answer this question in the affirmative. Would they pass a Bill to compel their children to go to a Roman Catholic school? The noble Lord, in the Amendments he had put on the Paper, had partly met the grievance of the hon. Member for Merthyr. They were glad the noble Lord had done so, and hoped he would go still further towards relieving the consciences of Nonconformists. In rural districts the schools were exclusively Church of England schools, and in a majority of these the Conscience Clause would be fairly worked, but it would be evaded in some cases, and he was sorry to say that the action of the Education Department would increase the difficulty of meeting these cases, for it had been decided that wherever a Church school was in itself sufficient to supply the wants of a district, Nonconformists should not be allowed to establish a British or Nonconformist school. He hoped that by reference to the Law Officers of the Crown the noble Lord would find that this was not a proper construction of the Education Act. Meanwhile he could not refrain from under the shadow of that influence, will be able to enforce the Conscience Clause if the parent does not desire to call upon the Government Inspector to do so. Undoubtedly cases may occasionally occur in which the whole tone of the teaching of a school is distasteful to a parent and the whole village community. In such cases some local supervision would be an advantage. But in many other cases quarrels and disputes of a most undesirable character might occur between the existing managers and the local elected authority, and I must point out to my hon. Friend that he does not meet the whole of the Conscience grievance by the Amendment which he has proposed. He does not meet the Conscience grievance of Roman Catholics, or, in a less degree, that of some members of the Established Church. A Roman Catholic board school, where no religious instruction is given, is just as great a stumbling block as any religious instruction that is given in a denominational school to the child of a Dissenting parent. It seems to me that the only security which it is in our power to provide is the establishment of some power to strictly and effectually enforce the Conscience Clause. My hon. Friend says that the Conscience Clause is a delusion; but although he was extremely profuse in his quotations and extracts from various books and papers in support of many of his assertions, he did not, I think, bring before the House any convincing proof in support of that assertion. It seems to me that the Amendment of my hon. Friend goes too far. I do not understand my hon. Friend to wish to put an end to all denominational schools, but to substitute for the present management of denominational schools a management by some local elected authority. If that is so, I fail to see for what object a voluntary school would exist. If you take away the power of management from the managers of voluntary schools, I do not see in what better position they will be placed than if the districts were made school-board districts, and the schools turned into district board schools, and employing not only compulsion under the Bill, but also under the Act of 1870. Under that Act a school board, although it might apply compulsory bye-laws, had no power to interfere with the management of denominational schools. Take, for instance, the borough of Stockport, where a school board passed compulsory bye-laws, but, as I understand, has established no board schools. But the effect of my hon. Friend's Amendment would be to compel the Stockport school board, whose compulsory bye-laws are working very well, to undertake the management of schools with which at present there is no necessity whatever for interfering. While I think the Amendment of my hon. Friend goes too far in these respects, I cordially support the Amendment to which some reference has been made, and of which Notice has been given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford. The effect of that Amendment, as I understand, is to make it the duty of the local authority to report any infraction of the Conscience Clause to the Education Department. That proposal will not disturb in any degree the management of the denominational schools by the existing managers, whilst it will give to the local authority, whose duty it will be to force the children to go to school, the duty and power of seeing that the security intended is given to them, and of which they can only be deprived by culpable neglect or abuse of the power of management. It is only right and reasonable, when powers are given to the local authorities, that the children and parents should be protected from any probable abuse of power by the manager of the schools. I am not surprised that my hon. Friend is dissatisfied with the present system. I must confess it is a remarkable, and I believe it is an anomalous system. It is a system which places in the hands of religious Bodies and private individuals duties and powers which, in every other country in the world, are considered as appertaining to the State and should be exercised by it. It is a system which has undoubtedly worked very much to the advantage of one denomination and to the detriment of others. But when I look to the hold this system has acquired, when I look to the vast amount of educational machinery which would be put out of gear by any sudden and violent change, when I look to the power which the present managers have of resisting any such sudden change, when I look, above all, to the immense check which would be put on the existing educational progress of the country, I admit I cannot go with my hon. Friend when he proposes universal compulsion, until a system has been established which he and I perhaps would regard as more perfect. This Bill does not, in my opinion, interfere in any degree with the progress of school boards. If, as my hon. Friend believes, and as I am inclined to believe, the school-board system is a more perfect system, if it is becoming daily more suited to the wants, and more congenial to the feelings of the country, then I think we may depend upon it that it will make its own way; and it will make its own way all the more rapidly, if it be not forced on an unwilling country. If denominational schools gain something, the Nonconformists and the advocates of a State system of education also, I think, gain something under this Bill. For the first time—and this seems to me to be by no means a small matter—in the history of our legislation, public authorities are not only to be permitted, but enjoined to take part in the work of education, and that not only where school boards are established, but universally throughout the country. That I look upon as a step of no unimportant character. It may not be a very great step, but it is a step in the direction which my hon. Friend and those whom he represents advocate. It is a step which has been taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and my hon. Friend may rest assured that if it be found necessary that this measure should be followed by others, they can only be such as will go further in the direction of this step, and cannot be of a retrograde character. For the first time, public authorities throughout the country are vested with some share of its educational business, and, looking at that fact and to the educational advance that is made by the measure, I cannot agree to vote for the Amendment, which would in practice put off sine die the adoption of universal compulsion, which it is now admitted the country is prepared to accept, and therefore I am compelled, however reluctantly, to give my vote against the Motion of my hon. Friend.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the debate had now lasted for a considerable time, though, in the early part of the evening; it seemed so much to flag that he was apprehensive the whole matter would come to a premature conclusion. He did not therefore think that he was rising too early to address the House. During the first two or three hours of the debate he felt disposed to regret the tone which had been adopted by more than one speaker. He had during that time heard a good deal which seemed to indicate that religious feuds and bitterness would be introduced into the discussion; but then he felt himself bound to admit that, after all, Nonconformists had many wrongs in the remote past to complain of, and that Churchmen ought not to be too sensitive if, even at the present day, when those wrongs were about to be removed that those who belonged to the older generation of Nonconformists should still be very susceptible when they approached a subject such as that before the House, which they considered was likely to touch on the rights and liberties of the subject. For his own part he must confess he wished the House in dealing with it could follow the example of the school boards, so that no Catechisms of any kind should be introduced into its debates; for their introduction, in his opinion, neither tended to the dignity of those debates, nor to the promotion of that good feeling which ought to prevail. But if there were some speeches in the early part of the evening to which he could not listen with satisfaction, there were others later on full of grave and serious arguments, such as that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hants (Mr. Cowper-Temple) and that of the noble Lord who had just sat down, which would, he thought, do good service to the cause of education; for, while they entered fully into the grievances of the Nonconformists, they came to the conclusion, with the Government, that those grievances were only imaginary. He might also observe that he had received several communications from various parts of the country in which he was informed that such denunciations of the proposals of the Government as the House had on more than one occasion heard were by no means acceptable to the great mass of Nonconformists. Now, there were two or three points which had been raised by the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard), the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. M'Arthur), and others to which he wished to advert before entering into the general argument. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr had spoken of it as one of the great grievances of the Bill that under its operation Nonconformists would be excluded from all share in the teaching maligned Conscience Clause a total of over 3,300 children had been withdrawn from religious instruction. That was to say, out of 8,586 public elementary schools of the Church of England, scattered all over the counties, there were withdrawn from religious instruction 1,446 children; out of 1,755 British, Wesleyan, and undenominational schools, 249 children were withdrawn; out of 528 Roman Catholic schools, 1,325 children were withdrawn; while out of 1,319 board schools 358 children were withdrawn. That showed that the Conscience Clause had not proved nugatory, but had to a large extent done the work it was intended to do. He would not now dwell on the religious difficulty, but he thought that evening's debate had shown it was generally acknowledged that that difficulty was not a real and serious one. Granting for the sake of argument that a religious difficulty did exist, he would ask why it had not been started when Mr. Dixon brought forward his Bill? Mr. Dixon stated over and over again that his was a Bill of direct compulsion, but it contained no provision for making new schools. Why was not the religious difficulty mentioned then? Well, then, he would ask whether the Government Bill aggravated the religious difficulty in any way? Perhaps the best answer he could give the House to that question was to quote from a printed circular which had been forwarded to him at the Privy Council Office. It was marked private, but he presumed that he might use a document coming to him in his official capacity, and he would appeal to this circular as containing trustworthy information as to whether the Government Bill really aggravated any supposed religious difficulty. It was written before the Bill was printed, but it went minutely into details. It stated that no power was given under it to the authorities to establish school boards. It was dated from Birmingham, and he would ask the permission of the House to read this passage—

"The effect of these proposals will be to introduce both direct and indirect compulsion into many parts of the country where Nonconformists are numerous, but where the only schools in existence are schools connected with the Established Church. The Committee (the Central Nonconformist Committee) feel strongly the injustice which is involved in compelling the children of Nonconformists to attend schools which are established with the avowed intention of educating children in the principles of the Church of England, and which are under the almost irresponsible control of the clergy. But practically the injustice already exists. It is one of the inevitable evils resulting from the denominational system. Nonconformists of every description are anxious to give their children as good an education as possible; but in many parts of England they have no choice of schools. They are obliged to send their children to the schools of the clergy or to leave them uneducated. We believe, therefore, that the number of Nonconformist children who are not actually at school, and who would be driven into Church schools by Lord Sandon's Bill, is extremely few. The children whom the Bill would reach are for the most part children of ignorant or careless parents, and it is better that they should be driven into the schools of the Church than that they should receive no education at all. While, therefore, we recognize the strength of the abstract objection to the compulsory proposal of the measure, we cannot recommend that these proposals should be resisted. In the interest of the neglected children and of the country at large, we think that they should be accepted.—Signed by William Middlemore, J.P., chairman: R. W. Dale, H. W. Crosskey, J. Jenkyn Brown, hon. secs.; F. Schnadhorst, secretary."

This was remarkable testimony, and if he wanted an argument to show that the Government Bill was one of perfect fairness to the Nonconformists as well as to the Church he thought he might rest his defence upon the important circular that had been forwarded to him. It was clear that the meaning of the Amendment was not whether the schools were to be under public management. It was the old story that the board schools should be put within the reach of every Nonconformist parent. The Bill was in fact a Police Bill. It prosecuted the employer who infringed its provisions, and it brought the parents of neglected children before the magistrates. The real meaning of the Amendment was that the voluntary schools should be thrown on the rates, and that Parliament should create universal school boards. This, however, was a proposal which the Government could not entertain for one moment. He regretted that the subject should be brought forward again, but he trusted that the calmer judgment of the Nonconformists themselves, when they thought the Bill over, would lead them to see that it had been framed with no sectarian spirit whatever. It had been framed in an honest endeavour to make the best, soundest, and most satisfactory provision for the education of those children who, when they grew up, would be the future citizens of this great Empire, without introducing those great changes in the habits of the people which would set them against education, and also without unduly interfering with the institutions already existing. He trusted that for these reasons the House would not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. WADDY said, that as it was evident that the debate was not exhausted, it would be better that the discussion on the subject should be adjourned. ["No, no!"] Then he must proceed with his speech, because it was a subject on which he could not be content to give a silent vote—"Divide, divide!"—and one on which he felt so strongly that any interruptions of the kind he heard would only protract his remarks. Although his views might not be the views of hon. Members on the opposite side and some on his own, yet these views did influence a large number of the people of this country, and without understanding them he did not think the House could fairly enter on the discussion before them. They were told that the grievances of Nonconformists involved the remote past and involved imaginary grievances—"Hear, hear!"—and that view seemed to find favour in some who cheered at that moment. He was prepared to hear those cheers from the enormous and crass ignorance there was on the subject. It was desirable, therefore, in the clearest way to bring the true view of the matter before the House. It was right to tell the House that this grievance did not belong to the remote past, but belonged to to-day, and was not an imaginary, but a real grievance, and the reason why they objected to the Bill was not that it was such a very very bad Bill—he would make hon. Gentlemen a present of that—but because it was a continuation of a course of legislation which was exceedingly destructive, as many of them believed, of the religious liberties of the country. He did not mean to argue at any great length as to whether this was the tendency of the Bill; but he could not help seeing that the tendency was to strengthen the denominational direction of existing legislation, and to destroy the entire religious liberty of large bodies of Nonconformists in regard to the education of their children. He was quite prepared to go further and say that that was the natural result, to a great extent, of previous legislation, and which seriously imperilled the liberty he had mentioned. He did not speak there as the Representative of any religious Body. ["Oh, oh!"] He did not; he had no right to do it; he was not authorized to do it, and it would have been impertinence to do it; but being a member of a large religious Body—the Wesleyan Methodists—and knowing the feelings and views of those who composed it, he felt it right to express those views not as their Representative, but for the information of the House. They believed the natural tendency of that legislation was to throw education into the hands of the Church of England in this country, and to the Roman Catholics in Ireland, and they did not know which was the more objectionable of the two. They did not think it fair that in Ireland education should be thrown into the hands of a Church which took every possible advantage of the principles of toleration in this country, and took care to act on opposite principles in every other country in which it had power. They did not think it desirable that education should be thrown into the hands of the Church of England. According to the views laid down on the other side, the Nonconformists were fighting on the side of infidelity; but there were so many things to be said in favour of the views they entertained that he could not help thinking, when they were accused of teaching "There is no God," such a suggestion as that, though made in the British House of Commons, was not worthy of any reply at all.

MR. HALL: I beg to contradict that. I said it was time for Nonconformists and Churchmen to unite against infidelity—not that the Nonconformists favoured infidelity.

MR. WADDY said, that if he borrowed the tactics not long ago used, he should say he was glad to hear that retraction—"No, no!"—but he did not borrow those tactics. He would rather say he was glad to hear he was wrong. This was not a question which could in reality be touched by the Conscience Clause at all. He would not allude to the scolding of people who were constantly evading the clause.

VISCOUNT SANDON: I must take exception to "who are constantly evading." I said, "now and then."

MR. WADDY: Surely "now and then" were the indicta of many of whom the country never heard at all. He cared very little about the Conscience Clause, or very little about the Catechism, nor did he think any number of them would remedy the evil of which he and those who thought with him complained. He did not think all the theology they could teach children of tender years was worth anything. That was child's play; that was not the real difficulty, the real mischief. As a Wesleyan Methodist, if the Government would prepare a Catechism of good sound Protestant theology, he should be glad to see it read in every school of the land. Differences of dogmatic theology would have no effect. The really important matter, and what he did care about, was that the Bill would hand over teaching to one religious denomination of the country which would have the aid of that subtle influence which would tend to show that was the one religion of the land. That was what was done. If children were led to believe that the clergymen of the Church of England were the one ministers of the Gospel, and the one minister from whom to derive all holy things, they would be driven from that learning which their parents believed to be proper for their interests. In that way, in the course of a few years, they would be driven by shoals from the religion of their fathers. Take Lincolnshire, where the majority belonged to the Church he belonged to. They were poor, and education was in the hands of the parson and the squire. By this Bill the management of the school would be under the ægis and care of the Church of England clergymen, and the minds of those children would be taken from the religious learning their parents were disposed for them to have. ["No, no!"] He said "Yes." Whatever they might have had of denominationalism before there would now be denominationalism plus compulsion. The Bill would drive their children away from the training they ought to have, and give them that which their parents did not wish them to have. There was not a day of their lives that they did not find out that they were looked upon—as they were gracefully informed a few days previously—that they were looked upon as belonging to an inferior social sphere. They had borne this for a long time at the hands of the Church, but all that they asked was to be let alone. They were not jealous of the position of the Church, notwithstanding her position and wealth. ["Oh, oh!"] They only wanted to be let alone; but, unfortunately, that was not the course which had been adopted. They had been accustomed to outrage in connection with almost every service of their Church—in the baptism of their children, the marriage of their adults, and the burial of their dead. An absurd and narrow-minded bigotry pursued them all through life, and endeavoured to snatch a paltry victory over the tombstone of the dead carcase, but they had borne it all. There was, however, one thing beyond, which would stir the Nonconformists of the country, and that was any legislation of which the distinct and inevitable consequence would be to interfere with the training of their children, and if the Government were going to introduce a Bill to add compulsion to denominationalism, and which would turn their children from the faith of their fathers; if this sort of thing were to go on and the string were continually to be tightened in favour of the Church and against the Nonconformists—there were a number of them who had hitherto held their hands, but would now join in the fight and raise a battle-cry which would be very disastrous to the Established Church. When the time came for the reversal of the policy of the Government, as come undoubtedly it would, let them not imagine that any proposal for compensation would be listened to when that policy was reversed. He should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Merthyr, and he would appeal to hon. Members in the moment of their power to consider that they were not legislating for a day, but for all time.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord President.)

(No. 150.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its object was to remove various inconveniences which had been experienced in the working of the Poor Laws. As it was now 40 years since the New Poor Law Act had been passed, it was not surprising that during that period some defects and inconveniences should have been discovered which required amendment. The remedies for these evils which had been suggested or adopted by the Local Government Board were embodied in the present Bill. These amendments might be arranged under four heads. It proposed, in the first place, a better division and arrangement of parishes forming unions and other local areas, and it gave power to annex isolated parts of parishes to the parishes by which they were surrounded. In the next place, it authorized various changes in the administration of the Poor Law; it gave power to the Local Government Board, under certain circumstances, to dissolve Unions or to change their names. The third part contained amendments of the Law of Settlement and Removal. The fourth related to the Poor Law as it affected the metropolis, enabled the managers of fever and small-pox hospitals, who might, under emergencies, have admitted persons not actual paupers into those institutions, to recover from those persons all reasonable charges, in the same manner as Guardians were now empowered to do in respect of paupers. The advantage of the provisions for dealing with isolated parts of parishes would be apparent when he stated that there were no fewer than 13,000 split-up parishes in England and Wales, chiefly in the North. The provisions for re-adjusting areas and dissolving Unions were likewise calculated to be very useful. At present the Local Government Board, although they had the power of transferring parishes from one Union to another, could not dissolve a Union, however much such a step might be for the advantage of all parties concerned. Much benefit was also likely to result from the provisions for the consolidation of small Unions, especially in the Eastern Counties, where one workhouse would be sufficient for two or more Unions. With regard to the Law of Settlement, the Bill, as originally introduced, applied only to Irish people who came to England in search of work, but it had since been extended—with justice, he thought—to the country generally. It proposed that a continuous residence of three years should entitle a person to a settlement in a parish. That provision, he believed, would be of considerable advantage to the labouring classes who were compelled to migrate from one part of the country to another. There were some miscellaneous provisions in the Bill to which he might refer. The Bill repealed an existing enactment rendering it illegal to apprentice boys belonging to the metropolis at a greater distance than 40 miles from London—a provision which could not possibly be maintained in the present day, however right and proper it might have been in former times; and it enabled authorized Guardians to send any boy in receipt of relief who might desire to enter the naval service to any part or place for examination. The measure also gave a power which those who had any knowledge of the working of the Poor Law would agree was a useful and beneficial one—namely, that of treating a woman living separate from her husband who might not altogether have deserted her, but who had left her chargeable to the parish, in the same manner as a widow, and therefore applying the workhouse test to her; and it allowed the Guardians to permit husband and wife admitted into any workhouse, being over 60 years of age, or disabled by infirmity or accident, to live together. The exemption of municipal corporate property from being rated to the relief of the poor was repealed, as was also the exception of the Inns of Court and Charterhouse from inclusion in any Union. These were the main points in the Bill. These provisions were founded on the experience of the Local Government Board of the workings of the Poor Law over a large number of years, and he believed that if the measure received the sanction of their Lordships it would effect a considerable improvement in Poor Law legislation. The noble Duke concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET regretted that so many miscellaneous subjects had been mixed up in that Bill. With regard to the alteration of the boundaries of Unions, he hoped that the Government would bear in mind that their great object should be to bring the area of Unions as near as they could to the area of counties.

LORD EGERTON OF TATTON pointed out that it would be impossible in some districts, which he named, to bring the boundaries of Unions to the boundaries of counties, although he believed it would be of great advantage if it were possible to do so.

LORD HENNIKER said, he should be glad to say a few words on one or two points in the Bill, and particularly as to one, that part of it which dealt with the Law of Settlement and Removal of the Poor, for he had ventured to bring this question before their Lordships on two occasions—in 1874 by a Bill to do away with removal, and again last Session by a Motion for a Return. He would not claim to have started this question, for it had been brought forward on several occasions, but he might say he had revived it. It had been discussed, since he first brought it before the House in 1874, all over the country, and public opinion had been brought to bear upon it. Whatever he might wish to see done eventually, he could not but thank Her Majesty's Government for the concessions they had made. It was, indeed, a great stride in the direction which, he believed, all those who wished to see the Poor Laws properly administered, and had the interest of the poor at heart, with very few exceptions, could not but think was the right one. He had presided over, perhaps, the largest Poor Law Conference which had taken place in England a short time ago—and all events, one of the largest—and then the feeling was strongly in favour of the abolition of the Law of Settlement and Removal. However, be that as it might, he was sure the feeling generally went in the same direction throughout the country, and that the steps taken by the Bill would be most acceptable. He should have been glad to have seen a difference made between the Irish and English paupers. The Irish paupers were, in some respects, on a different footing, and large towns, such as Liverpool, might have a claim to be specially considered. Under these circumstances, he would have been glad to see the settlement in England made to depend on exactly the same conditions as the present status of irremovability—namely, that three years should make a settlement for Irish paupers, and one year a settlement for English paupers—the same time as was now required to make a pauper irremovable in England for English paupers, and three years for Irish paupers, who would, in any case, gain no small advantage by the passing of the Bill. He would raise this question probably in Committee, when the proper time arrived. Another point he wished to touch upon—the great advantage the Bill would give in allowing Unions to be amalgamated. He did not think it was possible to amalgamate them generally, at present, as far as Boards of Guardians were concerned; but it might be done with great advantage for the purpose of providing house accommodation. It was quite true what the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) had said as to the number of unnecessary workhouses in the Eastern district. In his own Union the question had been set on foot. The Union house and the one in the adjoining Union were nearly empty, and, probably, would never be full again, from various causes too lengthy to go into in their Lordships' House on that occasion. This was one of many cases, and what was more, not only could Union houses, unnecessary Union houses, be done away with under the Bill, but it would, he hoped, encourage the establishment of district schools. Even some of the empty workhouses, when they were done away with under the Bill, might be used for that purpose. There was actually only one separate pauper school in the Eastern Poor Law District at the present time, and that was in his own Union: all the other pauper children were in the workhouses, or boarded out. Nothing could be worse than to bring children up as paupers, and the advantage of these schools could be seen wherever they had been established. He had visited an excellent one at Anerley the other day, and could not speak too highly in praise of the way in which it was managed, or say too much as to the evident good work it was doing. If large and useless establishments were kept up, nothing was more unlikely than that ratepayers would be willing to establish district schools. Only one more point he wished to refer to—that of medical relief. In country districts it was the most pauperizing part of the present administration of the Poor Law; it made men paupers who would not in any other way become paupers. It was a comfortable way of receiving medical treatment. He hoped some Amendment might be introduced into the Bill in their Lordships' House to make medical relief in some manner less easily obtained.

THE EARL OF POWIS suggested that before any change was made in Unions ample notice should be given, so that all persons interested might have the opportunity of considering it. He understood that the Bill proposed to give parishes the locus standi to oppose a scheme, provided two-thirds of the ratepayers should desire it, which, in a parish like St. George's, would require the signatures of 7,000 ratepayers; but he would suggest that a small portion of the ratepayers—such as 10 or 20 of them—should have power to oppose.

LORD ABERDARE agreed with the opinion of the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) that the Bill dealt with too many subjects. He approved of the powers which the Bill would give for the purpose of amalgamating Unions, and of the powers which it would confer on the Local Government Board. It was quite right that there should be a power of amalgamation; but he thought that a smaller proportion of the parishioners should have power to oppose, if they objected to any proposed scheme. Some parishes were of an unwieldy character.

He lived on the border of two extensive parishes. On that border a large mining village had sprung up, and it contained no fewer than 8,000 people. One portion of the village was in one of those parishes, and the other portion was in the other parish. Why should not facilities be given to enable that distant portion of those two parishes to amalgamate with neighbouring parishes, and so form a new district?

LORD COTTESLOE said, no doubt it would be a very good thing if all Unions could be made conterminous with counties; but there were various circumstances connected with local administration which rendered that suggestion impracticable.

LORD REDESDALE believed the Bill would be a useful measure, and concurred in the view of the noble Lord (Lord Cottesloe) that Unions could not possibly be made conterminous with counties, because of the manner in which the Unions were situate, and for various other reasons concerning the management of Union affairs.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he had no reason to complain of the manner in which this measure had been received, because it was clear that the House was generally in favour of it, although various suggestions concerning details had been made which would receive careful consideration at the hands of the Government. He dissented from the opinion of the noble Duke and the noble Lord opposite (Lord Aberdare) that too many provisions had been introduced. The Government were placed in the dilemma of either inserting the several points which required alteration, or placing them in separate Bills, or else not dealing with them at all; and he maintained that the proper course had been chosen of inserting them in the Bill, for they would by no means hamper its passage through the House. He entirely agreed in the observations that had fallen from the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees as to the impracticability of making Unions conterminous with counties; but, at the same time, he must point out that the provisions for the dissolution and re-arrangement of Unions would tend to carry the proposal into effect wherever it was expedient to do so. The Act would come into operation directly it was passed, so that persons who had been residing three

(*Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,
Mr. Ascheton Cross.*)

[BILL 155.] COMMITTEE.

On Question, "That the Preamble be postponed,"

MR. J. COWEN explained that he had on the previous evening moved to report Progress in order that several Gentlemen who had not spoken might have the opportunity of further urging the Nonconformist objections to the Bill. These Gentlemen had not come down at that early hour, and probably they thought, as he thought, that further remonstrance on the part of the friends of non-sectarian education would be hopeless. He did not wish to give a factious opposition to the measure; and, as the front benches on both sides of the House appeared to have agreed as to the course to be taken, he left it to them to arrange matters between them.

MR. STORER said, he thought that this subject had been viewed too much from an urban point of view. The agricultural ratepayers were, in point of fact, paying upon their incomes seven or eight or ten times more than those of the towns, and yet this Bill professed to make the rural districts contribute out of their Imperial taxation towards the educational expenses of the towns, which were much richer in proportion than the country districts. He hoped the Government would take some notice of this fact.

MR. MUNTZ said, he thought they had met to discuss the Education Bill, and not the question of rating, and therefore on that point would only say that the towns paid an average of 3*s.* 7*d.* in the pound, whereas the rural districts paid only about 2*s.* 6*d.* or 2*s.* 8*d.* in the pound. Some extraordinary statements had been made in the course of last night's discussion to the prejudice of his constituents, and from these statements the House might also infer that Birmingham was a nest of heathens. He was, therefore, anxious to say that among the members of the Church of England, the Roman Catholics, and the Dissenters of Birmingham were some of the most eminent men in this country, and that the school board had merely tried to carry out a system for religious education which had worked satisfactorily to all sects for 12 or 14 years in New South Wales and South Australia. They had only undertaken the work of secular education, allowing certain times for religious instruction. The plan had failed because the Church of England and the Roman Catholics refused to carry it out. But the school board were not to blame for endeavouring to introduce a system which existed, under the sanction of the Imperial Government, in another part of Her Majesty's dominions, and which was there approved by the Church of England, by Roman Catholics, and even by Buddhists. At any rate, he did not wish it to be thought that the Birmingham School Board consisted of a body of men who wished for no religion. As to the Bill, he had hitherto supported it, but hoped that now in Committee Amendments would be introduced which would render it more palatable.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he desired before the House went into Committee on the Bill to call attention to a fact that seemed to have been overlooked. He was very anxious that something should be done for national schools, and that the voluntary schools and the national schools should be placed by this Bill on a better footing than at present, so as to avoid the difficulty into which they were now in danger of drifting—namely, that voluntary, national, and other school committees, although they had provided buildings and expended large sums on school houses, would never be able either to hold their own or to recoup themselves. No doubt some hon. Gentlemen opposite thought that it was advisable everything should be handed over to the school boards that permeated the country. He differed entirely from that view. He was anxious that religion should be taught in the schools, and there could be no question in the minds of most hon. Members on both sides of that House that while possibly some persons might object to the use of the Apostles Creed, the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments ought to be taught in every school. He was one of those who would never dissociate religion from secular instruction. There ought to be in every school at least the option to the parent to send the child to a purely secular school, or to one where he would unquestionably receive religious instruction. The Birmingham School Board had been very much reprehended for the course they had taken. He was not there to find fault with them, but he did complain that the National School Committee should not have the power to keep in their own hands so much of their own money as would educate their own children, and to allow the school board money to be so used that it might be applicable to education in which religion was taught along with the ordinary instruction.

MR. PEASE said, he should not have joined in this discussion had it not been for the attack made on the previous night by the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) on the British and Foreign School system.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member would not be in Order in replying to the speech to which he referred.

MR. PEASE said, he would accept the ruling of the Chairman, and make no further allusion to the right hon. Gentleman's speech. With regard to the Bill itself—passing its Preamble—there were in the House three classes of educationalists. There were the advocates of secular education, who were divided into two sub-sections; one represented by the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard), who, on religious grounds, declined to have anything but secular instruction in schools supported by the State, and the other—who were a small section of those who took an interest in the subject—composed of those who believed in no religious education at all. On the other side of the House there was the school of dogmatic Scriptural education. He belonged to a school of ardent friends of religious education, which he believed was common to the majority of the people of this Kingdom, and which, under the Education Act of 1870, had become the religious education of a large proportion of the children of this country. Between 40 and 50 school boards only, of which 28 were in Wales, had declined to have Scriptural education in their schools. Therefore, Scriptural education was carried on by about 1,000 school boards, and it was of the undenominational and general character which he thought the House would be willing to support. The great majority of the people of this country were opposed to State funds being devoted to dogmatic religious instruction, and the secular educationalists were a small minority. During the debate on the Act of 1870, 20 teachers from the National Schools Society, 20 from the British and Foreign Schools Society, and 20 from the Wesleyan School Board conferred together and reported that, putting aside the creeds and catechisms of the Wesleyans and the Church of England, the religious education was practically the same in all these schools, and this was the unsectarian religious education of about 1,000 school boards. Consequently, he maintained that the system of the British and Foreign Schools Society had not been a failure, and that it was the only one which could be generally approved by the House.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD stated that the late Birmingham School Board, of which for three years he was Vice Chairman, had adopted an undenominational system of religious instruction, so simple that no parents objected to it; but the new board had abolished the unsectarian plan. The result was that 6,000 children were receiving from voluntary sources on two mornings in the week religious teaching of a certain kind, under no public authority or responsibility, and the children attending other schools, with accommodation for 7,000 children, never once in the whole year heard a word as to their duty to God or their neighbours. This might be copying an Australian system; but he hoped the House would see the change in its true colours. So far from the Birmingham School Board being pioneers of education, as some people regarded them, they ought rather to be considered to have served the less pretentious, but still useful, purpose of scarecrows to frighten the country from secular teaching, into the adoption of a better and more truly liberal system.

MR. MUNTZ explained that under the Australian system he had mentioned the education given was secular except on one day in each week.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY hoped this irregular discussion of Australian systems and Birmingham squabbles would not be continued, and that the Committee would proceed with the consideration of the Bill.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK did not accept the ruling of the noble Lord that this discussion was irregular. He wished to remark that this question was not in a stage where it could be considered to be settled. Hon. Gentlemen opposite represented the opinions of a considerable section of the country, but they did not by any means represent the opinions of the majority. Those who shared his views were content to wait for a better time. The tendency of the Bill was to check the further adoption of school boards where they were not at present established. He did not pretend to say whether or not that was a fair solution of the education difficulty. He believed the education given by the State in State schools, while every facility was given to all denominations to carry on the religious instruction of their children, was what the country would have to come to, but they would have a great deal to get through in the interval.

VISCOUNT SANDON desired to express his thanks to the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen) for the handsome manner in which he had refrained on that occasion from pressing the views which he and some other Gentlemen opposite held in favour of secular education in order not to cause any further delay in going into Committee on the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Preamble postponed.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preliminary.

Clause 1 (Short title), agreed to.

Clause 2 (Extent of Act), agreed to.

Clause 3 (Commencement of Act).

VISCOUNT SANDON appealed to the hon. and learned Member for Oldham (Mr. Serjeant Spinks) to postpone the Amendment of which he had given Notice for Clauses 7, 8, 9, and 10, to take effect immediately after the passing of the Act, for the attendance at school of children habitually neglected by the parent, or habitually wandering and consorting with criminals and disorderly persons, and attendance at industrial schools. The Government were preparing with great care Amendments for the formation of day industrial schools, which he hoped to be able to submit to the Committee in two or three days' time. He therefore asked the Committee not to pass any judgment on the question until after they had considered the Government Amendments, and also that his hon. and learned Friend would not press his Amendment until the subject was ready for full discussion.

MR. SERJEANT SPINKS said, he readily assented to the request of the noble Lord.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the noble Lord if he intended to postpone also Clauses 7, 8, 9, and 10?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Yes.

Clause postponed.

Law as to Education of Children.

Clause 4 (Regulation as to employment of child under ten, and certificate of education or previous school attendance being condition of employment of child over ten).

MR. HARDCASTLE moved, in page 1, line 21, after "ten years," to insert—

"Unless any such authority as is hereinafter in this Act referred to as the local authority shall have granted a certificate in writing certifying that such child has attained the age of nine years, and that the employment of such child is upon grounds which the said local authority has investigated and found sufficient: Provided, That the employment into which such child is taken is such that the child while employed will attend school half time."

The Amendment had been suggested to him by men of great practical experience, which had convinced him that the Act would operate most prejudicially on certain portions of the population, residing especially in Manchester and Salford. The clause laid down the hard-and-fast line that under no circumstances should a child less than 10 years of age be allowed to work at all. The experience of the Manchester School Board was that unless the clause was modified in the way he proposed it would furnish no inconsiderable number of occupants for the new industrial schools, towards the building of which the Government proposed to contribute. In many instances, when women as well as their husbands were employed in factories, they had to leave their homes at an early hour, and had no opportunity of seeing that their children went to school. The consequence of this was that many of these children became truants; whereas if they were allowed to go into some employment, upon condition of attending school half-time, they would be reclaimed from those truant habits, while they would be usefully occupied, and at the same time their instruction would be going on. He wished it to be distinctly understood that the Amendment was intended to meet exceptional cases, which, however, not unfrequently arose in the manufacturing districts.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there might be exceptional cases of hardship under the operation of the clause; but if the Amendment were adopted it would practically fix the age up to which a child could not be employed at nine years, and it would be impossible to maintain the limit of 10 years, owing to the pressure which would be brought to bear on the school boards, and this part of the Bill might as well be abandoned.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that the Factory Act of 1874 fixed the age for work in textile factories at 10, and it was only just to put all other industries on an equality, and not give an advantage to one over another. In the interest of the great mass of the Lancashire manufacturers, he hoped the noble Lord would not give way on this point.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Act of 1874 had been found to work very well. The only objection to it was that other employments were not under its provisions. One of the objects for which the Royal Commission was issued was to inquire not only into the operation of the Act, but to see how far other industries ought to be subjected to the same restriction.

MR. BIRLEY thought there was some misapprehension as to the object of the Amendment, which was not intended to undermine the clause, but to make the compulsory system gradual, instead of forcing all persons at once into the extreme limits contemplated by the Bill. It would facilitate education by an extension of the half-time system in certain cases under a continuance of the present law.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, this Amendment would restrict the very stringent rule laid down in this Bill, not at the request of the parents, but on good grounds being shown by them to the attendance committee that it should be done. He should support the Amendment.

MR. HERMON said, the Amendment would inflict injury upon Lancashire, for its effect would simply be to produce a demand for the labour of children too young to enter the factories, and to counterbalance the benefits conferred by the Factory Acts, which had done great good. He hoped it would not be pressed.

MR. WHITWELL opposed the Amendment, urging that children outside the factories would be under less efficient supervision.

Amendment negatived.

MR. CLARE READ moved, after "ten years," to insert—

"3. That the child being of the age of nine years has made 250 school attendances in each of the previous four years, and since it reached the age of nine years made 250 school attendances, or had received a certificate fixed by Standard 4 of the Code of 1876."

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the Amendment was based on a misapprehension of Clause 5 as it would stand after the Amendment of which he had given Notice. After the opposition offered to a similar proposal on behalf of the manufacturing interest, it would be unfair and inconsistent on the part of the Government to accede to a similar request from their agricultural friends. As a matter of fact, children in the agricultural districts were often employed in the mornings and evenings in light labour, while they attended school during the day, and were thus able to earn 1s. 8d. a-week.

Amendment negatived.

MR. SANDFORD moved, in page 1, line 21, to omit that portion prohibiting the employment of a child—

"who, being of the age of 10 years or upwards, has not obtained such certificate either of his proficiency in reading, writing, and elementary arithmetic, or of previous due attendance at a public elementary school, as is in this Act in that behalf mentioned."

The hon. Member said, the clause as it stood would interfere with labour in a most objectionable manner. The object which the Bill arrived at was that a child should learn to read, write, and cypher, and if it did not learn to do so, having been at school from the age of 5 to 10 years, it was probable that it would never learn. To prevent such a child from obtaining employment in the agricultural districts between the ages of 10 and 14 would be intolerable. The labour question was difficult enough at present, and instead of endeavouring to increase they should do all in their power to lessen the difficulty. Much as he was opposed to compulsion, he should prefer it to the system proposed by the clause that a limit of 10 or 12 years should be fixed up to which a child could not be employed, provided he were left free after that age.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT contended that agricultural children could not be dealt with in the same way as manufacturing children in towns. It was much better, in his opinion, that they should have compulsory education of children between the ages of 5 and 10 years than that they should be prevented from earning their livelihood between the ages of 10 and 14. He quite believed that this portion of the Government Bill would break down altogether in the agricultural districts. Why should children between the ages of 10 and 14 be prevented from working because they had not attended school a certain number of times between 8 and 10 years? He should like to hear some explanation on this point from the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill, because he felt quite assured that if the provision objected to became law it would cause much dissatisfaction among the agricultural classes.

COLONEL RUGGLES - BRISE supported the Amendment, and said he had always been favourable to direct compulsion. He should be sorry to interpose any obstacle to the passing of the Bill; but if his hon. Friend below him went to a division he should vote with him on the principle that he was in favour of direct, as distinguished from indirect, compulsion.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the Amendment really raised the question between direct and indirect compulsion. Now, the Government had taken their stand upon the proposal that they had made, that they should not apply direct compulsion in all cases. They proceeded upon the presumption that the great majority of well-doing industrious parents, if the temptation of getting their children's earnings were withdrawn from them, would do their duty without being embarrassed by attendance officers. If they adopted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon, and did away with the labour pass, they must adopt the other alternative and go in for universal compulsion, which meant universal inspection and universal school authorities. He was very glad to find that which he had never doubted—that there was so much earnest zeal for the promotion of education among those who were connected with agriculture; but then he regarded that portion of the Bill against which the Amendment was directed as essential, and he could not therefore consent to depart from it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed, that the 10th clause of the Bill as amended by the noble Lord would practically introduce a measure of direct compulsion. He had no doubt that the labour pass would be of considerable advantage, and should be sorry if it were disregarded. He could not vote for the Amendment; but he hoped that some provision might be made for a half-time system between 10 and 14.

MR. STORER said, that if the age of 12 years were substituted for 14 they would get out of the difficulty. Many lads were so dull that they would never pass Standard IV. even if they were kept at school till 21 years of age.

MR. WHITWELL opposed the Amendment, believing that the clause would operate beneficially.

MR. EVANS remarked, in reply to what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Walter Bartelot), that the half-time system had been found to work beneficially in the case of agricultural children.

MR. CLARE READ said, he would support the Amendment. As it at present stood the clause would allow children between 5 and 10 to wander about idle for half of the year. If the Amendment were carried he hoped that something more definite would be done for children between 5 and 10.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU observed, that hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed now to be in favour of universal compulsion. He (Lord Robert Montagu) was not so easily converted, and would therefore vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON suggested that, in the clause defining child, the word "fourteen" should be left out, and the word "twelve" substituted.

Mr. RITCHIE said, that if the concession now asked for were made in the case of agriculture, the same relaxation should be made in the case of children employed in manufactories under the Factories Acts.

Mr. HENLEY deprecated one uniform law applying to poor families under all circumstances. He should therefore hesitate to support the Government on this question. The first necessity of children was to eat, and the parent's first duty was to feed them. If these half-fed children were forced to school—especially one in which they were taught no religion—they would be very apt to lay their hands on what they could. An enactment of this sort should not be too sweeping; there should be some modification in the case of large families or the children of widows, and he should support the Amendment.

Mr. ISAAC said, that direct compulsion was not required in the borough of Nottingham, and he should support the Bill as it stood.

Mr. J. K. CROSS thought there should be direct compulsion up to the age of 10, and then there would be no occasion for the cruel enactment that children up to 14 should not be allowed, under certain circumstances, to earn their own living. He doubted whether the fear of punishment four or five years hence would force parents to do their duty at present.

Amendment negatived.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH observed, that the clause imposed a penalty on any person employing a child under 10 years of age unless it could be proved that he had acted in good faith, in which case the penalty would fall on the parent. He believed that such penalty would be unworkable, and moved, in page 1, line 23, after "certificate," to insert "of age and." The enactment without some such security would be inefficient and worthless.

VISCOUNT SANDON admitted the necessity of some bond fide arrangement of the nature pointed out, but thought it might be more conveniently introduced into the 15th clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, in page 1, line 25, to leave out "public elementary," and insert "certified efficient," in order that schools that were giving a sound education might count equally with the public elementary schools.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH moved, in page 1, line 26, at end, to add—

"Unless such child is employed, and is attending school in accordance with the provisions of the Factory Acts, or of any bye-law of the local authority sanctioned by the Education Department, regulating the attendance at school of children who are necessarily and beneficially employed."

His object was to exempt from the necessity of a certificate persons employed under the Factory Acts or attending schools in accordance with bye-laws framed by any of the local authorities. He contended that such certificates were unnecessary, and would be practically inoperative, as they had been in the case of the Mining Acts; while, according to the Report of Mr. Tuffnell, in 1867, the enforcement of such certificates would compel Inspectors to visit every parish, and every school in every parish, four times every year, in order to examine the children. It would be a great advantage in such cases to make employment and education simultaneous, under the half-time system. If they accepted his Amendment it would not in any way affect those districts where compulsory education was now carried out, and he trusted, therefore, that the noble Lord would not object to it.

Mr. J. K. CROSS supported the Amendment on the ground that it might open the way to the adoption of the principle of half-time in the agricultural districts.

SIR WALTER BARTHELOT expressed his gratification that the Amendment had been moved, and declared his readiness to vote for it. The proposal was one that went in the right direction, and he was sure it must commend itself to the mind of everybody.

Mr. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH also supported the proposal. If adopted it would be extremely valuable in the agricultural districts. He hoped the Government would support it, as it would tend to carry out their own principle of compulsion.

Mr. KNOWLES hoped the Amendment would be adopted, if only for the sake of uniformity.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, would also express a hope that the Vice President of the Council would accept the Amendment. He did not like to relax the stringent provisions as to education that were necessary; but unless this Amendment were adopted it would be impossible to work this clause. They were all agreed that these children between 10 and 14 ought to be working to a certain extent, and it was important that no obstacle should be thrown in the way of a child earning its own livelihood after 14. What he and the noble Lord desired to effect was that between these ages a child should be allowed to go both to work and to school until it had had schooling enough, when it should be allowed to devote itself to work altogether. The noble Lord said the child must either have had schooling enough or must show a sufficient number of attendances; but, through the fault of the parent and not the child, he might not have had the proper number of attendances, and there would be several cases in which the child would not be able to pass the Standard or the attendances. What ought to be done in such cases? The child ought not to be prevented from working. He would not deny that the desire to get hold of the labour pass would affect the minds of parents; but the Legislature ought not to subject ignorant and neglected children to the additional calamity of idleness.

MR. HERMON thought the proposal was a step in the right direction, and ought to be embodied in the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the balance of argument was in favour of the relaxation of the clause in accordance with the wish of the noble Lord, but he could not promise to make any amendment to Clause 7 in the same direction. He was happy, on the part of the Government, to accept the improvement of the Bill proposed by the noble Lord.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY remarked that the provisions affecting the employment of children were scattered up and down the Bill in such a way that it would be somewhat difficult for the poor people to whom this applied to apprehend them.

MR. FAWCETT feared that the effect of the Amendment would be to encourage parents in wilful neglect in sending their children to school because they would say "Our children will obtain work whether there has been the requisite number of attendances or not." The result would be to entirely destroy the system of indirect compulsion between the ages of 5 and 10. If this was done to the extent proposed they should have some security that the system of direct compulsion between those ages should be strengthened.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH reminded his hon. Friend of the important Amendments already made in the Bill, and of the provision made for the attendance of such children.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU moved to add at the end of the Clause—

"Provided, that a list of Public Elementary and other Schools where efficient elementary instruction is given (whether such schools are or are not in receipt of grants provided by Parliament) shall be annually published by the Committee of Council on Education; and that the list so published, or any supplementary list published during the year, on the request of the local authority or of the managers of a school, shall be sufficient evidence that every school so named is an efficient elementary school."

There were 534 Catholic schools, and he knew not how many Nonconformist, which might be affected unjustly in this way. If a school were inspected, and the Inspector reported that it was not quite efficient, it would have to be shut up; but if proper efforts were made it might be made efficient, say within 10 months. He thought justice required that such a case should be met. If he received a proper assurance from the noble Lord opposite he would not press the Amendment.

VISCOUNT SANDON thought it was hardly necessary to insert such a provision, because he did not think the local authorities would be rash enough to close a school such as the noble Lord had described. If, however, he found on further consideration that further provision was required he would be happy to meet the views of the noble Lord.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER called the attention of the noble Lord to the position of the canal children throughout the country. He was not going to propose any Amendment, because he believed the noble Lord had the case under consideration. He knew how difficult it was to ascertain precisely the residences of such children, of whom there were a great number, chiefly located in the canal boats.

VISCOUNT SANDON admitted the importance of the subject. Though he thought these children would to a certain extent be caught under the operation of the Bill, yet he was afraid that great numbers of them would succeed in eluding its provisions. In fact, they were a class of children with whom it was extremely difficult to deal, and he was disposed to think that the best course to pursue would be to postpone the further dealing with our canal population until the time when his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department would have to legislate with respect to the various labour suggestions of the Factory Commissions. If, meantime, he found any opportunity of dealing with the question he should be glad to do so.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU was of opinion that it would not be well to defer dealing with the subject for so long a time.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Enforcement of Act by existing local authority of inspectors of factories or mines).

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, in page 2, line 5, to leave out from "district," to "in this Act," in line 10, and insert—

"By a committee (in this Act referred to as a 'school attendance committee') appointed annually, if it is a borough, by the council of the borough, and, if it is a parish, by the guardians of the union comprising such parish.

"A school attendance committee under this section may consist of not less than six nor more than twelve members of the council or guardians appointing the committee, so, however, that, in the case of a committee appointed by guardians, one-third at least shall consist of ex-officio guardians, if there are any and sufficient ex-officio guardians.

"Every such school board and school attendance committee."

They were anxious, if possible, to attach the best people in the district to Boards of Guardians and to Town Councils. He trusted that, indirectly, this would strengthen the district local government of the country, and that change, he hoped, would add very much to efficiency.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT thanked the noble Lord for having introduced into the Bill an Amendment substantially such as he had himself proposed, and expressed his confident opinion that it would be found to work well throughout the country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER was very glad the noble Lord had made this alteration, and that he had not adhered to the proposal that authority should be given to persons not of the local authorities. The noble Lord had up to this time completely fulfilled his promise that he would listen to proposals for improvement from all parts of the House. He would suggest whether there were not some districts where it would be almost impossible to secure the proportion of one-third of ex-officio Guardians.

VISCOUNT SANDON thought it would be well to follow the precedent that had been adopted for guidance.

MR. PELL said, that from his experience ex-officio members were not so willing to act as elected members.

MR. PEASE said, he was much pleased with the alteration proposed to be made in this section. As the clause stood it would not work well.

CAPTAIN NOLAN objected to the committee consisting of one-third ex-officio Guardians. He did so because it was likely to make a precedent for Ireland, and there it would not at all work well.

MR. CLARE READ said, it would be better to amend the Amendment by providing that, in case an adequate number of ex-officio members could not be obtained, the deficiency should be made up by elected Guardians.

MR. PAGET could not conceive on what ground it was assumed that ex-officio Guardians would not discharge their duty as members of the education committee.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, in page 2, line 13, after "known," to insert—

"It shall be the duty of such local authority to report to the Education Department any infraction of the provisions of section seven of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' in any public elementary school within their district which may come to their knowledge; and also to forward to the Education Department any complaint which they may receive of the infraction of those provisions."

He hoped that this Amendment would commend itself to the Government and the Committee generally. It was designed to guard against an evil which every Member of the House would wish to see prevented, and in a way that was not open to objection. He did not believe that the Conscience Clause of 1870 had been often infringed. Indeed, he was not himself aware of any such case. But there was great fear of its being infringed, and it was a suspicion which must be treated by the Government and the House as a fact. Some security, therefore, should be provided against such infringement. He could not vote last evening for the Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. Richard), believing that it would not work well if the schools were put under the management of the local authority. But as the power now to be given to the local authority would benefit the schools by obtaining for them a larger grant and larger fees from the children, it was only fair that the local authority should report to the Education Department if the conditions were infringed upon which their compulsory powers were exercised. The Amendment also provided that the local authority should forward to the Education Department any complaint made to them of the infraction of the Conscience Clause.

VISCOUNT SANDON observed, that the Government and all hon. Members on that (the Ministerial) side were as anxious as any hon. Members on the other side could be that there should be no doubt as to the Conscience Clause being strictly and honestly carried out. In point of fact, the cases were very few in the country generally in which there were any complaints of the infraction of the clause; but whenever a complaint was received by the Education Department they immediately caused inquiries to be made into it. They had had two or three cases, and the school had been notified that if the infraction were repeated the annual Parliamentary grant would be stopped, and there was an end of the matter. He thought that the Amendment was a very good one, not for removing any real difficulties which existed; but if it was an additional assurance to persons that their conscientious scruples would not be interfered with, it would have done good work.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU contended that as no grant was made to certified efficient schools they ought not to have a Conscience Clause imposed upon them.

MR. PAGET said, he agreed with the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) that he wished to see the Conscience Clause carried out in the most complete and loyal manner. He feared that the Amendment, if accepted in its present shape, would oblige the local authorities to report any idle tale or rumour as to the infraction of the clause, and if so it would do great mischief and cause strife where we wanted peace. He would therefore move to amend the proposed Amendment by omitting all the words after the word "authority" in line 2 down to "also" in line 5.

MR. W. E. FORSTER pointed out that it was not a mere rumour, but an infraction of the provision of the section referred to that should be reported.

MR. A. MILLS said, he could not conceive words more clear than the terms in which the Amendment was drawn. It was satisfactory to the Committee to have the testimony of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford that he had known of no infraction of the Conscience Clause.

MR. RICHARD said, he was greatly obliged to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford for proposing the Amendment, and he was no less obliged to the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) for the frank and generous spirit with which he had received it. It would be a great advantage to give this power to the local authorities.

Amendment (Mr. Paget), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. W. E. Forster) agreed to.

THE O'CONOR DON moved, in page 2, line 16, to leave out "and not of," and insert "to assist." If the clause were left unaltered it would throw upon the Inspectors of Factories, and upon them alone, the duty of looking after the children employed in all the smaller workshops, and the consequence would be that in a great portion of the country the Act would be inoperative. The effect of his Amendment was to throw upon the local authorities the duty of enforcing the observance of the law, providing at the same time that the Inspectors of Factories should assist the local authorities in the carrying out of that duty.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. W. S. STANHOPE said, some Amendment was absolutely necessary in the mining districts, where the Inspectors had so many important duties and large districts to attend to; thus it would be impossible for them to attend to the schools in the manner required by the Bill.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR said, it was utterly impossible that the Inspectors could do what this clause imposed upon them.

VISCOUNT SANDON admitted that it would be imperilling too much the interests of education if they relied solely upon the Inspectors, and he would therefore accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Roscommon.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

CORONERS.—RESOLUTION.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY, in rising to call attention to the Law respecting Coroners and Coroners' Inquests; and to move—

said, the conditions on which Coroners were appointed and the mode in which they exercised their duties had become so antiquated and obsolete as to call imperatively for reform. The number of Coroners in counties in England and Wales was 233. The number in boroughs was 99. The first thing that struck one in examining the Return from which he obtained these figures was the anomalous manner in which Coroners were distributed. The county of Middlesex, for instance, was satisfied with five. The county of Huntingdon was not satisfied with less, whilst the county of Dorset was not satisfied with less than 11. Norfolk had seven, and Suffolk five, in addition to Coroners at Bury St. Edmund's, Ipswich, Yarmouth, Norwich, Thetford, Sudbury, and King's Lynn.

Manchester and Liverpool, again, had only one Coroner a piece, while the borough of Malmesbury thought itself entitled to two, though he did not suppose cases of sudden death were more prevalent there than elsewhere. But it was in the qualifications of Coroners that the necessity for reform was most evident. In counties, for instance, one of their qualifications was believed to be the possession of a certain amount of landed estate, but no two authorities could agree as to how much it should be. In fixing that qualification our ancestors were supposed to have aimed at securing for the office the services of men who as being possessed of lands in fee would not be afraid of anybody; but it was unnecessary to say that the possession of land was a ridiculous qualification for a Coroner at the present day. The qualification of borough Coroners was even less satisfactory than that of their county brethren. All that was necessary in their case was that they should answer to the somewhat vague description of being fit persons, and that they should be neither aldermen nor councillors. To any reasonable mind it was perfectly ridiculous that functions of so important and delicate a character as those of Coroners should be left to auctioneers, retired tradesmen, and other persons of a similar kind. He did not believe, for his part, that they could be properly discharged by any man who had not a good legal training. He would say, indeed, that no one but a barrister or a solicitor ought to be made a Coroner, though he was well aware that The Lancet and other medical organs, which regarded such appointments as a nice perquisite for their profession, would raise an outcry at the bare idea of such a thing. In counties Coroners, generally speaking, were elected by the freeholders, and however reasonable that mode of election might have been in ancient times, it was far from being reasonable now-a-days. In these days there could hardly be a worse way of appointing a judicial officer like a Coroner than by exposing him to the chances and changes of a popular election. Of our 232 county Coroners, 175 were elected by the freeholders, and 58 by lords of manors and various officials and dignitaries of that description. In Derbyshire a Coroner was appointed by right of the possession of a horn—a hereditary relic. In Essex a Coroner was appointed by the tenants of a manor; in the county of Northampton by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; in Suffolk by the Dean and Chapter of Ely. The case of the boroughs was, perhaps, better than that of the counties. The borough Coroners were elected for the most part by the Town Councils. In the small boroughs there was likely to be a good deal of jobbery, and perhaps in some of the large ones also. In the boroughs of Rye, Tenterden, and Haverfordwest the Mayor was ex-officio the Coroner. He should not like to live, or rather to die suddenly, in any of those boroughs, because the inquest then held would probably be of the most imperfect character. The question of the appointment of Coroners, therefore, required a solution of a radical kind, and yet the needed reforms could be based on several ancient precedents. They had centuries ago ceased to appoint magistrates or sheriffs by popular election; and his proposition now was that Coroners should in counties cease to be chosen by the freeholders or appointed by lords of manors or other authorities such as had been mentioned before. To storm the municipal corporations was a more difficult matter, and he felt some alarm in suggesting that they should be deprived of their patronage. He now came to the remuneration of these officers, about which there had been much difficulty and squabbling between Coroners and Justices. Formerly county Coroners were paid by fees, when the county Justices used to do all they could to prevent their payment. The result was that if the Coroner did not hold an inquest he was liable for nonfeasance; and if he did he was almost sure to lose his fees. A Royal Commission and a Select Committee, however, some years ago inquired into that matter, and an Act was passed which put the remuneration of county Coroners on a proper footing by giving them fixed salaries. Borough Coroners, however, were still paid by fees, and in an inconvenient and even absurd manner, as was shown by a Return relating to that matter which was issued in 1872. But the real pith and substance of the question he had to introduce related to the duties of Coroners. He passed by inquiries into wrecks, treasure trove, and other minor duties of Coroners which were now practically obsolete, only remarking that many years ago the Coroners, in retaliation for the injury done them by Justice, attempted to claim a jurisdiction in cases of arson. The Court of Queen's Bench seemed to have been sorely perplexed at the array of antiquarian arguments marshalled before them, but at last decided very sensibly that Coroners were not to inquire into incendiary fires or into anything but the death of human beings. The function of Coroners, then, was to make inquiry into all cases of violent, unnatural, or sudden, and suspicious death, but still their duties were not clearly laid down or clearly understood. He had been told of a case of most sudden and suspicious death, which occurred within the last few months, where the Coroner absolutely refused to hold an inquest, and where, though application was made to high authorities, nothing was done, and it was supposed that nothing could be done to make him hold one. He believed that as the law now stood, if a Coroner refused to hold an inquest where one ought to be held, an application could be made to the Court of Queen's Bench by the Attorney General. But that was a roundabout way of getting him to do his duty, because if he did not hold the inquest at once he might as well not hold it at all. The inquest must be held super visum corporis; and if there was much delay this might become impracticable. It was, therefore, a matter of importance that if the Coroner neglected his duty, there should be some machinery for promptly compelling him to do it. On the other hand, within the last year or two they had several times heard of a Coroner exceeding his duty, and obtruding himself without cause upon the private grief of a family to their great annoyance and discomfort. The Home Secretary was obliged to deal with a case of that kind not long ago when an eminent man died. Coroners certainly had not been very successful from the dawn of their history. The first mention of them that he found was that King Alfred hanged a Judge for treating a Coroner's inquest as conclusive. We were not so foolish in these days as to treat an inquest as conclusive. He need not remind the House of the scene in Hamlet which had immortalized "Crownor's quest law." Lord Holt had made some very severe remarks on a "weak, silly" Coroner of his day. At no time did Coroners seem to have been treated with respect. Blackstone spoke strongly of the incompetency of Coroners, and, coming down to the present time, Sir John Jervis, in his book on Coroners, spoke of them as being in some instances incompetent to discharge even their present limited authority. So that, looking at the history of Coroners' jurisdiction on the whole, it might be said of those officials that, like the unfortunate maid-servant in Barnaby Rudge, they had "failed to give satisfaction." But was there nothing to be said in excuse for Coroners? The statute law relating to Coroners and Coroner's inquests was contained in something over 30 different Acts of Parliament. But if the Statute Law on the subject was confused and intricate, it was almost impossible in any case to say what was the Common Law on those matters. When a Bill on that question was brought in, as it must be before long, he hoped that some effort would be made to remove the obscurities and clear up the doubts and difficulties which beset Coroners on all sides in the discharge of their duties. At any rate, the Statute Law on the subject should be reduced to a single Act, and if the Home Secretary could at the same time clear up the doubtful points, or at any rate some of them, in the Common Law, he would do very serviceable work. For instance, what was to be done if a Coroner did not properly discharge his duty? The Attorney General had found it a very difficult matter to get a fresh inquiry in a case where the performance of the Coroner was admitted to be perfunctory and imperfect. The Attorney General knew how difficult it was for him to say what was the proper remedy in such a case, what was the proper mode of proceeding, and how many different modes of proceeding there were. There were a few other suggestions which he would make with regard to the manner in which inquests were held. Could anything be more prejudicial to the proper holding of a Coroner's inquiry than the holding of it, as was so often the case, in a public-house? Surely there was something perfectly disgusting in holding an inquiry so solemn and sometimes so delicate in a public-house with jingling glasses and the shouts of drunken persons all around. As to the publicity of the proceeding, to his mind it was of cardinal importance that a judicial inquiry of this kind should be taken in the full light of day, and that it should not be open to the Coroner, from mere caprice or a desire to make a show of his authority, to clear his court—a Court of Record—of all the public, and conduct the proceedings as he pleased in the dark. That was surely a very important point. Was it advisable that we should invariably have recourse to a jury in inquiries of this kind? Did a jury really assist the Coroner? In many cases was not the Coroner impeded in the inquiry by a jury? The Coroner was supposed to take down the evidence of the witnesses in writing, and to procure the signature of the witnesses to it. On this point the law was obscure. But the Coroner sometimes took down the evidence wrong, and did not read it over to the witness. Was it to be tolerated that statements should be put into the mouths of witnesses which they never made? The object which our forefathers in their wisdom wished to attain by establishing Coroners throughout the country was that in cases of sudden or violent or suspicious death there should be a searching and immediate inquiry. They wished, as far as they could, that that inquiry should be held before officials of whose abilities there was no question, whose character was beyond reproach. We could not altogether say that that was the case now. It was surely not less necessary in these days than of old that a Coroner's inquiry should be searching and immediate and before competent persons. He thought he had made out a case for a considerable and a speedy alteration of the law on this subject. The noble Lord concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON, in seconding the Motion, said, the House was indebted to the noble Lord for having brought under its attention this subject, which was only one of many illustrations of the extent to which the English nation was apt to tolerate an evil until some striking instance of wrong occurred. A recent case had brought the question of Coroners' inquests under public consideration. The office of Coroner was one of the oldest judicial offices on record. In olden times Coroners were not allowed to take fees. Their office was a most dignified one, and Chaucer, in his description of the Franklein mentions it thus—

“At sessions ther was he lord and sire,
Ful often time he was knight of the shire,
A shereve hadde he ben, and a coronour,
Was no wher swiche a worthy vavasour.”

In fact, by the Statute of Westminster I. none but “lawful and discreet knights” were to be chosen as Coroners, and in the reign of Edward III. a Coroner was removed from office because he was only a merchant. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) greatly doubted the utility of the office of Coroner at the present time. If we had stipendiary magistrates all over the country he would say, transfer the duties of Coroner to them. But as that was not practicable we had to consider how we could best give effect to the object for which the office of Coroner was intended. Coroners had formerly to inquire into wrecks and to perform the duties of the Sheriff during his absence, and they thus combined judicial with administrative functions. The office, however, at the present time was purely judicial, involving great responsibility and requiring judgment and tact, and great experience in the ways of life. The Coroner should possess legal knowledge to enable him to conduct his inquiries efficiently and delicacy of feeling and a wise discretion to know when it was necessary and when it was unnecessary to intrude into the privacy of a sorrowing family. He could name one signal instance where a lady having died by her own hand the Coroner had directed a post mortem examination for the purpose of ascertaining not the cause of death, but her condition which had led her to take her own life; and there were cases where Coroners through want of tact and delicacy had unnecessarily dragged matters to light which could serve no public good, and would have been better left in darkness. He had many communications corroborating his assertion that many Coroners discharged the duties of their office inefficiently, and often so as to render the inquiry a mere waste of public time and expense, and as a means for the promulgation of idle gossip. In his opinion, the office should be filled by a trained lawyer accustomed to judicial proceedings, and qualified to deal with evidence, and not by a medical man. On the question whether these inquiries should be conducted openly or in private he referred to a decision of Lord Tentarden, in which that learned Judge laid it down that as an inquest was a preliminary inquiry in which the reputations of persons might unnecessarily be placed in jeopardy, it should be left to the discretion of the Coroner whether or not it should be held openly or in private. Occasions might arise on which unnecessary pain might be occasioned to surviving relatives and friends by the holding of public inquests, and therefore power should be given to Coroners to hold inquests in private; but, as a power of this kind might be abused, it was important that every person chosen to fill the office of Coroner should not only possess the necessary professional ability, but should be a man of the highest character. He ought to be above suspicion of corruption, and should be a man of honour and a gentleman. With reference to the mode of the appointment, nothing could be less conducive to the credit of the office than the mode of election. He had great regard for popular election when applied to its proper objects; but certainly objected to popular election when applied to a judicial office. The contest for the office often turned upon the question of who could spend most money. Altogether it seemed to him that it was well worthy the consideration of the Home Secretary, whether the time had not come for bringing in some measure which would remedy the evils complained of. For his own part, he agreed with the noble Lord as to the need there was for a consolidation of the laws relating to Coroners, an alteration of the mode of appointment, and the providing of some guarantee that Coroners should be men of character and possessing proper qualifications for the office.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That further legislation is desirable with regard to the qualification and appointment of Coroners and the mode of holding inquests.”—
(Lord Francis Hervey.)

MR. CLARE READ, in supporting the Motion, said, he was prepared to go further than his noble Friend who had brought the question forward, and to say that the time had arrived when the office of Coroner might be abolished altogether with very satisfactory results. The office was a very ancient one, but it was of no use continuing it if it was not required. In 90 per cent of inquests held the verdict was one of death from natural causes, and he believed that a great number of inquests were held when they were entirely unnecessary, and much trouble and expense were thereby entailed upon everybody concerned. He hoped to live to see the day when a great change would be made in the mode of these inquiries, some of which would be much better made before magistrates. One of the chief difficulties arising from the existing state of the law was that the jurisdictions of the Coroners overlapped each other, and the people who found it necessary to suggest the holding of inquests did not know to which Coroner in a county, or a division of a county, application should be made. With regard to the mode in which Coroners were elected, there were many absurdities that ought to be swept away. As they had heard, there were no fewer than seven different Coroners for Norfolk, while in East Anglia there was one Coroner an auctioneer, another a land agent, a third a doctor, a fourth called himself a gentleman, but he (Mr. Read) really did not know what he was by profession, and there were two or three who were lawyers. Could anything be more confusing, perplexing, or stupid than this arrangement? Conservative as he was, he was enough of a Reformer to think that the time had come when the office of Coroner might be abolished, and when better arrangements might be made for the fulfilment of the duties of the office.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the noble Lord opposite had done good service in bringing the subject under the consideration of the House. He had not expected, however, to hear the question treated in so radical a spirit as had been evinced by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down; and he could not go so far as to say that Coroners ought to be abolished, as there was a great deal of work which could be properly and justly done by Coroners. The recommendations of the noble Lord were more practical. He agreed with the noble Lord that the existing mode of appointment was unsatisfactory, and that a change was necessary; but as to how the appointments should be carried out that was a difficult matter to decide. He should not like to see all these appointments centralized in the Home Office, although it would probably be acceptable to almost every Member of the House that the responsibility of choosing the body which should in future appoint the Coroners should be left with the Government. Inquiries before the Coroner had often to be re-opened, and of late there had been many cases of complaint of this kind in relation to Coroners, and there was a case in point relating to the case of Mr. Bravo. There were numerous cases in which Coroners' inquests did not give satisfaction; and there were some in which there was an absolute failure of justice. Surely it ought to be sufficient to make application to the Home Secretary or the Lord Chancellor to have an inquiry re-opened instead of having to resort to the circuitous process of applying to the Court of Queen's Bench. The question of law was one which affected the legal administration of the country, and there was no doubt that the present appointment of Coroners was bad, and that there should be some better procedure in the matter of Coroners' inquests. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite intended to deal with the subject, he would suggest that all the Acts relating to Coroners should be consolidated.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS expressed a hope that the House would disassociate the discussion altogether from any recent case which had happened. He rather regretted that the Motion should have been brought forward just after a case of a Coroner's inquest had been prominently brought before the public. Long before that case occurred this question had occupied a good deal of his attention, and indeed he had for years been of opinion that the time had come when the whole question of Coroners and their inquiries should be subjected to great change. After what had been said as to individual Coroners, however, he would say that a great deal of good had been performed by the existing Coroners. Though in individual instances justice might have miscarried, the great body of the Coroners did their duty to the best of their knowledge and ability, and that a great deal of good had resulted from their inquiries. In his opinion, it would not do to abolish the office of Coroner. He happened to be mixed up to a great extent with inquiries as to colliery and other explosions, and in such cases a great deal of information had been furnished to him, and the inquiries by Coroners had given rise to great satisfaction among the classes whose lives were subjected to accident in this particular way. He had, indeed, in such cases sent down an officer from the Home Office to see that the case was properly conducted and the whole facts brought out. Having said so much on behalf of the Coroners as a body, he had not the slightest hesitation in adding that the present state of the law was bad in many particulars. It was true that there were too many Coroners, and that they were unequally apportioned over the country, though this did not work any practical evil; but, if the law was to be altered, that question must be taken into consideration. In the case of the appointment of an officer who had one of the highest judicial functions to perform, and who always held out his office as being older and higher than that of the magistrate, such an officer should, in his opinion, have particular qualifications for his office. An inquest was a judicial inquiry, and the person presiding at it ought to have been trained as a lawyer, to be practised in weighing evidence and drawing the truth from the witnesses, so that he might guide the jury to a right conclusion. If, therefore, the law was altered, the qualification for the office of Coroner should be a knowledge of the law and some standing in the legal Profession. A great deal had been said of the election of Coroners, and he must say he could not conceive a worse mode of election for a judicial officer than a popular election by the freeholders of the county. There were instances without end of enormous sums of money being spent in order to secure the election of a Coroner. He did not know that the statutes against bribery extended to the elections of Coroners, although the Common Law might; but if such sums of money as were sometimes heard of were necessary to be spent in the election of Coroners, the sooner that kind of election was put an end to the better. He would not, however, say with whom he thought the appointment of Coroners should rest. He certainly had not the smallest wish that it should rest with the Secretary of State; but he thought the means might be found by which the process of appointment might be much simplified and the best man selected. With respect to the duties of the Coroner, he must say that a man duly qualified was appointed, they ought, in a matter of this kind, to leave a great deal to his discretion. Formerly the Coroner stood in a very awkward position. The justices of quarter sessions might be of opinion that he had held inquests which he ought not to have held, and might stop his fees, and, at the end of five years, fix a low average in order to limit his salary. One of those cases which often happened was this—a great explosion occurred in a mine and a large number of people were killed. He had known instances where the Coroner held as many as 30 or 40 inquests. He might clearly have ascertained the cause of death by holding two or three, though more than one might have been necessary, because all the persons might not have met their deaths in the same way; and certainly imputations had been brought against Coroners of increasing the number of inquests to increase the amount of fees. That was extremely improper. But he thought the duties of the Coroner might very easily be better defined by statute than at present. Something had been said of holding inquests in public-houses. He always regretted that should be the case, but inquests must be held somewhere. They had no right to hold them in a private house, and they could not always secure a place other than a public-house in which inquests could be held. He thought that was a matter that might fairly be left to the discretion of the Coroner. With respect to the persons who should compose the Coroner's jury, he thought they should be drawn from the same panel as in all other cases. Every man was bound to perform the office of juryman for the benefit of his fellow-countrymen, and this was one of the most important functions of a juryman. The jury lists for the Coroner should, therefore, be made out like all other lists by the Sheriff. With regard to the consolidation of the law relating to the office of Coroner, he thought the whole law should be put in one clear and intelligible statute. The re-opening of the inquiry was, he thought, rather a difficult question. When a duly qualified man was properly appointed, he did not think the inquiry should be rashly reopened. The Court of Queen's Bench for some time considered that they should not grant a second inquiry unless some imputation, almost imputing fraud, were made against the conduct of the Coroner. But in a recent case they had come to another conclusion. He certainly thought that it would not be right to give the Secretary of State or even the Lord Chancellor power to grant a second inquiry. They ought to take great care where the liberty of the subject was concerned not to place such a power in the hands of any political officer. It would be much better to leave it to the Courts of Law, although it might be possible to simplify and shorten the process by which the application should be made. He was very glad this question had been brought forward by the noble Lord; but he hoped the country would not think it had been brought forward simply on account of any special circumstance that had arisen of late. It was a question which had received not only his own attention, but that of other Secretaries of State, and he promised the noble Lord it should not be lost sight of. He was far from wishing that the noble Lord should withdraw his Resolution; he rather desired that it should be affirmed by the House in order to show that it was the deliberate opinion of the House that the time had arrived when the office of Coroner should be reformed. In what he had said he had no desire to impute to the Coroners anything like misconduct in the way they generally discharged the duties of their office, believing that in the vast majority of cases honest and substantial justice was done.

SIR THOMAS BAZLEY feared that the conduct of some Coroners had fairly exposed an ancient office to the attacks that had been made upon it; for instance, take two cases in which Coroners had directed juries to return verdicts of wilful murder. In one a young schoolboy inadvertently killed another by discharging a pistol, and in the other a child was run over by a brewer's dray, and the verdict was given, not against the driver, but against the owner, who was a hundred miles away from the place. He concurred in the opinion of the Home Secretary that the office of the Coroner should be perpetuated, but altered so as to make it more serviceable to the country by a better discharge of the duties appertaining to it. He was in favour of a thorough reform of the present law for the election and regulation of the office of Coroner.

DR. LUSH said, he was glad to hear from the Home Secretary that he was desirous of preserving the ancient office of Coroner. As a general rule, Coroners were not open to the reproach that had been cast upon them in the course of that debate. No doubt many inquiries were improperly held, but they had a beneficial effect in deterring persons from committing punishable offences. They were Courts of Inquiry rather than Judicial Courts, and if judicial knowledge was necessary in the person who filled the office, so also was medical knowledge essential to the proper discharge of the duties.

MR. H. T. COLE said, that last Session he introduced a Bill on this subject, but unfortunately it shared the fate of Bills introduced by private Members. In considering the question he came to the conclusion that the election of Coroner by the freeholders—a grave in a churchyard giving a qualification—should be abolished, and given to the magistrates in quarter sessions; and if that was not sufficiently popular the Guardians of the poor could be joined with them, which would give a sufficiently popular mode of election, and materially lessen the expense attendant on the present mode of election, which frequently cost from £10,000 to £12,000. The result was that the expense deterred the most competent man from soliciting the office. He had no wish to abolish the office, because if that were done a similar one must be created. He was much pleased to hear the Home Secretary say that the office should be held by a trained lawyer, because trained medical skill could always be obtained, and at a moment's notice, to make the necessary examinations and give the proper evidence as to the cause of death. The noble Lord had done good service in bringing the subject before the House, and he trusted the Resolution would not become a dead letter.

Motion agreed to.

NAVY—CAPTAIN SULLIVAN.

RESOLUTION.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in calling attention to the circumstances under which Captain Sullivan R.N., was recently superseded by the Admiralty from the command of H.M.S. "London;" and to move—

said, that this was not brought forward as a personal grievance or at the solicitation of Captain Sullivan, who was entirely unknown to him till a few days ago. He brought it forward in the public interest, as it involved a question of importance connected with the Naval Service. The Correspondence which had been laid on the Table spoke for itself. Briefly stated, the circumstances were these. Captain Sullivan, a distinguished officer of 30 years' honourable service, sailed from England in July, 1874, for the East Coast of Africa in command of Her Majesty's ship London. Among the officers of the ship was a chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Penny, and it was on account of the disagreement between the captain and the chaplain that Captain Sullivan was superseded in his command and recalled home at the end of 1875. The purport of the Resolution he offered to the House was that under the circumstances which he would shortly relate Captain Sullivan should have been granted a court martial, for which he had asked no less than three times. It was unnecessary to weary the House with all the details of the squabbles—for that was the most appropriate word—which for 15 months embittered the relations between the superior officer and his subordinate. Captain Sullivan was not a member of the Church of England, and he undoubtedly appeared to have been a Nonconformist by conviction, and to have been ready at all times to assert his principles. Mr. Penny, on the other hand, belonged to the very High Church party—in fact, to the highest order of priestcraft. Each, no doubt, was sincere from his own point of view, but the discordant elements no sooner met than they exploded. The first cause of dissension that arose between Captain Sullivan and Mr. Penny was the absence of the former from the Holy Communion, which Captain Sullivan declined to receive at Mr. Penny's hands. Shortly afterwards Captain Sullivan thought it his duty order the chaplain that the service on Sundays, which was held on the quarter deck, should be shortened by limiting the amount of chanting, so as not to interfere too much with the working of the ship. The week-day service was also directed to be limited to "short prayers" from the Liturgy, strictly in accordance with the Instructions for the Navy. These orders evidently constituted in Mr. Penny's mind an unpardonable offence, for from that moment he "out" his captain and behaved on many occasions in a most disrespectful manner. This was acknowledged by the Admiralty letter of 15th of September, 1874, in which—

"My Lords are of opinion that Mr. Penny's conduct has in several instances been highly disrespectful towards his Captain."

When the London arrived at the Cape, Captain Sullivan applied to the Commodore there for a Court of Inquiry to investigate these matters of difference between himself and Mr. Penny. Commodore Hewett replied that he should forward the application to the Admiral commanding on the Indian Station, to which the London was going, in order that the ship might not be delayed, and that Admiral Cumming should decide as to the charge of "disrespectful behaviour" made against Mr. Penny. The Admiral, however, declined to grant a Court of Inquiry, but directed the chaplain to cease wearing certain gold crosses on his stole, which had given offence, and which Captain Sullivan had remonstrated against as being a "non-regulation uniform." Mr. Penny, however refused to comply with this direction of the Admiral, and the authorities at home, by a letter of the 4th February, 1875, declined to make any order on the subject. This was a small matter, but it was a triumph for the chaplain, and contributed to make him persist in his defiant attitude on other points. A few months after, in February, 1875, Mr. Penny again sent through Captain Sullivan a complaint as to the conduct of Divine service, which Captain Sullivan forwarded, with his remarks, to the Admiral. The Admiral, in his Report to the Admiralty at home, stated that, in his opinion, Mr. Penny—

"Had acted in a spirit apart from that which should be shown by any officer, and especially by a clergyman."

He also said—

"That on any future occasion he should consider it his duty to take most serious notice of it."

It was a pity that serious notice was not taken of it at the same time. Nothing further occurred till the arrival of Admiral Macdonald to relieve Admiral Cumming on the station in July, 1875, when, by instructions from home, he directed that a Court of Inquiry should be held "in the disputes between Captain G. L. Sullivan and the Rev. Mr. Penny." Of course, nothing was known to the public of what had taken place, but an answer to the Report of that Court came from the Admiralty, in a letter dated the 16th of September, 1875, and it was to the following effect—

"After a careful perusal of the whole correspondence, commencing as far back as September, 1874, my Lords have been compelled with regret to come to the conclusion that Captain Sullivan has not acted towards Mr. Penny with that consideration and judgment which is expected from the Captain of one of Her Majesty's ships.

"My Lords are further of opinion that Mr. Penny's conduct has in several instances been highly disrespectful towards his Captain; and as they entirely agree in the opinion of the Court that so long as these two officers remain together no harmony can be expected, they have decided to remove them both from the ship, and they are to be so informed."

But the correspondence of 1874 here referred to was not admitted before the Court of Inquiry, so that Captain Sullivan had no opportunity of dealing with it; and, further, Mr. Penny was not removed, although Captain Sullivan was, and the "disrespectful" subordinate had the satisfaction before the whole ship's company of bowing over the side his commanding officer, with whom he had been notoriously at war for a long time. He should ask the First Lord of the Admiralty to explain how this happened, and whether he considered such an affair to conduce to the dignity or discipline of the Service? Captain Sullivan had since in vain sought for a court martial to vindicate himself. The Lords of the Admiralty stated in a letter of the 6th of December, 1875, that, apart from this disagreement with Mr. Penny, they were quite satisfied with the way in which he discharged his duties while in command of the London, and yet they appeared to justify their very arbitrary proceeding by refusing the redress which the Captain demanded. Admiral Macdonald wrote to Captain Sullivan as follows:—

"My dear Sullivan,—I can assure you it was with much regret I heard first through the papers that the Lords of the Admiralty had resolved to remove you from your command. I make no comment as to this discharge, but a sense of justice alone has induced me to write to their Lordships my very high opinion of the zeal and ability that you displayed under trying circumstances in the arrangement of the ship."

Considering the trying duties which Captain Sullivan had to perform, it was only natural that he should have lost temper with a chaplain of that kind. Before leaving the London he wrote to the Admiralty making a formal complaint of gross misconduct on the part of Mr. Penny, in the presence of several Natives, to which the Admiralty replied that they had called upon Mr. Penny for an explanation. Mr. Penny, accordingly, did write an explanatory letter, in which he made the grossest accusations against Captain Sullivan; but would it be believed that letter had never been seen by Captain Sullivan till it appeared in the Correspondence which was published yesterday? In his (Mr. Ashley's) opinion, the fact alone of such a letter having been written by Mr. Penny rendered it imperative on the Admiralty to grant the court martial which Captain Sullivan had asked for three times and failed to obtain. It was conducive neither to the welfare nor to the popularity of the Service that commanding officers should be subjected to the treatment which Captain Sullivan had experienced. Even had the two officers in the present case been treated alike, their punishment would have been very unequal; for there was a very heavy pecuniary fine inflicted on Captain Sullivan by the circumstances of his supersession, not to mention the greater publicity which attached to the recall of a commanding officer. Captain Sullivan had been 30 years in the Service, and the Lords of the Admiralty had themselves expressed an opinion that what had taken place ought not to operate against his future employment in Her Majesty's Navy. He was content to rest the case thus. The Admiralty said that this officer was deserving of employment, and yet he had been superseded in his ship, because he had not been able to get on with a subordinate officer who had been pronounced guilty of highly disrespectful conduct. It seemed to be the opinion of the Admiralty that an officer in command of one of Her Majesty's ships should combine the indifference of a Gallio in religious matters with the tact of a Talleyrand in the affairs of the world. He doubted greatly whether the demand for such qualities would secure for us equally efficient officers; but certainly, if the absence of these qualifications were to be made reasons for punishment, the interests of Her Majesty's Service would be gravely imperilled. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON seconded the Motion, because he believed that great injustice had been done to a distinguished officer, and that the Admiralty in his case had departed from the line of procedure laid down by Parliament for the administration of justice in the Navy. He was an entire stranger to Captain Sullivan, but he had come forward to support this Motion from a sense of duty. Captain Sullivan was accused of undue interference with his chaplain; but according to Naval Regulations a captain was responsible for the due performance of religious duties on board his ship, and was invested with a certain amount of discretion as to the length of the prayers to be read. It was also to be borne in mind that Captain Sullivan had on board his ship some 52 Nonconformists, whose religious opinions were entitled to some consideration. He asked hon. Members acquainted with the practice adopted in private families whether it was usual at prayers to read the Creed and those parts of the Liturgy which Captain Sullivan had directed should be omitted? Why, the Chaplain of the House of Commons who read short prayers before they commenced their Sittings, was not required to read the Creed or those parts of the Liturgy; and the House could hardly blame Captain Sullivan for following its own example in that respect. The second complaint made against Captain Sullivan was that he directed the chaplain to omit chanting in the open air on the upper deck, and to confine himself to the singing of hymns. There he thought that gallant officer had used a wise discretion. The third objection raised by the chaplain was that he was desired to omit the priestly invocation, which, as being in the Church service of the Church of England, Captain Sullivan was justified in requesting him to omit. The priestly invocation would have been offensive to all the Nonconformists on board, as it certainly would have been to him if he had been in the ship. The fourth and most important point was that Captain Sullivan found that his chaplain appeared in a dress which he had never seen before—a stole with three gold crosses upon it, and on asking his chaplain what that dress was, as he did not know of any Admiralty Regulation authorizing it, the chaplain told him it was a dress given him when he was made a priest by the Church, and that the Admiralty should not take it from him. Captain Sullivan, in his complaint about the stole with those gold crosses on it, said it would destroy the simplicity which had hitherto characterized the service held in the ship, and thus justify the Nonconformists, of whom there were 50 in the London, in objecting to it, and in absenting themselves from it, as would certainly have been the case if these novelties had been tolerated. Admiral Cumming, who commanded at the Cape of Good Hope Station, writing to Captain Sullivan in reference to that matter, asked him to inform Mr. Penny that it was his wish that he should discontinue the use of the stole with the gold crosses on it in order to prevent dissension on board the London. The Rev. Mr. Penny, in a letter to the Admiralty of the 7th February, 1875, which was not among those Papers, but which the First Lord of the Admiralty had that day kindly laid on the Table, said that in regard to the Admiral's wish that he should for the present discontinue the use of his stole, he felt himself conscientiously unable to gratify him; that he had used the stole for 10 years without its causing the least offence to any one except to Captain Sullivan, who was not a member of the Church of England. Therefore, it was the opinion of the chaplain that to give offence to a person who was not a member of the Church of England was of no importance, forgetting that Captain Sullivan and the 50 Nonconformists were as much members of his congregation as the highest Churchman on board. What was the decision of the Admiralty? On the 2nd of March, 1875, my Lords said that as regarded the stole described they made no order on the subject, observing, however, that in a matter so indifferent no unnecessary offence should be given to anybody on board. Therefore, the Admiralty declined to give any opinion and left that unfortunate difference to be fought out in the ship as best it could be. What had been the consequence? Why, that in the same command, on board of a man-of-war, within the last few months, the chaplain was seated at table, and never rose as the other officers did to the Admiral, saying that he had nothing to do with the Admiral, that he was independent of him, and was under the Lords of the Admiralty. If that was the way in which the Lords of the Admiralty upheld the discipline of the Navy, he thought they would find that discipline rapidly sink. That insubordinate chaplain had been encouraged in his insubordination. He wrote a letter in June which caused Captain Sullivan to apply for an inquiry, which was this time granted, but it was too late. The Court of Inquiry could not go into the matter, because the Admiralty had given their decision upon it. Therefore, Captain Sullivan had had no opportunity of defending himself against the accusations made by the chaplain. No doubt the House would be told that Captain Sullivan had not been dismissed, but only removed from his command, and that had he been dismissed he would have been entitled to a court martial. When he himself asked for the Papers relating to the dismissal of Captain Sullivan, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) corrected him, and said that that officer had not been "dismissed," but only "removed." He had altered his Notice accordingly; but he asked the House what was the difference to Captain Sullivan? If Captain Sullivan had been tried in accordance with his request by a court martial, he did not think they would have done anything more than to severely reprimand him, and he would have remained in command of his ship up to the present time. But the Admiralty had practically inflicted a more severe punishment on Captain Sullivan than if he had been tried by a court martial. He believed he was correct in saying that the Chaplain's Department of the Admiralty was managed by the private Secretary of the First Lord. The private Secretary of the First Lord was not a responsible officer. If he gave advice to the First Lord, the First Lord was responsible. He would now allude to what was, perhaps, the most important point connected with this question—namely, the holding of Courts of Inquiry instead of courts martial. That was a practice which had been gradually growing for many years both in the Navy and the Army, to the great discontent of the officers of both Services. He did not at all wish to raise the question of the prerogative of the Crown to dismiss any officer. He freely admitted that the Crown had the right—and had properly the right—to dismiss any officer without giving any reasons whatever. But that was a very different thing from the course that was now adopted—namely, that of condemning an officer first of all and then removing him. The Crown had no prerogative to condemn any man without hearing what he might have to say in his defence. The Lords of the Admiralty referred to the opinion of the Court of Inquiry as justifying them in removing Captain Sullivan. They did not say they removed him by virtue of the prerogative of the Crown without giving any reasons. If Courts of Inquiry were to be held, they ought to be regulated on well-known principles. He thanked the hon. Member for bringing forward the Motion, and he hoped the House would agree to it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That, in the opinion of this House, Captain Sullivan should not have been removed from the command of one of Her Majesty's ships for any alleged error, shortcoming, or neglect of duty, without having been given an opportunity, if he desired it, of explaining or defending his conduct before a competent court."—(Mr. Ashley.)

MR. HUNT said, the Motion which had been placed on the Paper by the hon. Gentleman opposite was somewhat ambiguous in its terms. ["No!"] It said that—

"Captain Sullivan should not have been removed from the command of one of Her Majesty's ships for any alleged error, shortcoming, or neglect of duty, without having been given an opportunity, if he desired it, of explaining or defending his conduct before a competent court."

The hon. Gentleman did not explain what a competent Court meant in this Motion; but he inferred from the speech of his hon. and gallant Friend who seconded the Motion that he was of opinion that Captain Sullivan should not have been removed without having been tried by a court martial. Well, that raised a very important question—namely, whether the Board of Admiralty, in exercise of the power of the Crown, which was delegated to them, were or were not competent to supersede an officer in his command without a court martial. He maintained that they had the fullest power and authority to do so, and when his hon. and gallant Friend spoke of there being no difference between dismissing an officer from his ship under the Naval Discipline Act and removing him by superseding him and appointing another officer in his place he made the greatest mistake possible. What had been done in the case of Captain Sullivan had been done outside the Naval Discipline Act. The Admiralty had exercised the supreme authority reserved to them by the Naval Discipline Act, and had not apportioned to Captain Sullivan any punishment mentioned in the Naval Discipline Act. Therefore, it was perfectly correct to say there was a great difference between the case of dismissing an officer from a ship and that of relieving him from his command by the supreme authority vested in the Admiralty. Hon. Gentlemen might say that in each case the officer had to leave the ship. That was perfectly true; but in the one case he left his ship with a distinct punishment recorded against him, and in the other he was simply told that he no longer commanded his ship. In the case of Captain Sullivan no punishment whatever was recorded against him in the books of the Admiralty. He had been relieved of the command of his ship because the Admiralty considered it undesirable on public grounds that he should any longer continue in command, but no disgrace or punishment was recorded against him, as would have been the case had he been dismissed from his command. The hon. Member opposite had not alluded to the question of the power of the Admiralty to supersede an officer in his command without an inquiry before a court martial; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman behind him (Sir Alexander Gordon) had fully admitted the existence of that power. The power, indeed, had been exercised by the right hon. Gentleman who had preceded him in office in a notable case in which he had superseded two Admirals in their command. He therefore submitted that the Admiralty possessed an undoubted right to supersede an officer in his command if they thought fit to do so, and that such a course was for the good of the Service. The hon. Member who had brought forward this Motion had made a very clever selection of passages from the Papers suitable for his own purposes, and with the permission of the House he would read other passages from them which would give a different colour to the transaction. What was the case of Captain Sullivan? He had himself appointed Captain Sullivan to the command of the London, and he had also appointed the chaplain; therefore, he was naturally inclined to have supported the captain whom he had himself selected. It was also the practice at the Admiralty to support an officer in command as far as they could properly do so, and therefore he had a double motive in desiring to support Captain Sullivan. But what had happened? When the ship arrived at the Cape of Good Hope on her way to Zanzibar complaints were made by the Captain of the chaplain. It so happened that Captain Sullivan had come within the notice of three senior officers—namely, Commodore Hewett, the Commodore of the Cape; Admiral Cumming, the Commander-in-Chief on the East Indian Station; and Admiral Macdonald. What was the view taken of the conduct of Captain Sullivan by these three officers? When the London touched at the Cape, Captain Sullivan made a complaint with regard to the conduct of his chaplain; but Commodore Hewett thought that there was no necessity for an immediate inquiry into the matter, thinking that were one instituted it would delay the ship unnecessarily, and that the vessel had better go on, leaving the question to be determined by the Admiral on her arrival at her station. It had been put to the House that the chaplain had been insubordinate from the beginning to the end, while all that Captain Sullivan had done was to carefully discharge his duty. But what said Commodore Hewett upon the subject? The Commodore at the Cape was satisfied that the apprehensions of Captain Sullivan with reference to the performance of the Services by the chaplain were imaginary, and that the chaplain had acted in a temperate and a proper manner, and had complied with his orders in every respect. Thus the matter was passed over to the Commander-in-Chief on the East Indian Station. It was exceedingly painful to him to have to bring forward what he believed to be these unfortunate indiscretions of Captain Sullivan. He was anxious that the matter should have rested where it was. In the interests of the Service, and in the interest of Captain Sullivan himself, he was anxious that the conduct of the latter should not have been dragged into notoriety. He was not satisfied with his conduct, but he was willing to have treated it as an exceptional incident in his career. He knew how fiercely the odium theologicum burnt in some breasts, and he was willing to make allowances for it, and for the excitement produced by the temperature of Zanzibar, in the case of Captain Sullivan, and he had told him that he intended to give him further employment. But it had been said by the hon. Member opposite — “What was the use of superseding a man to whom it was intended to give further employment?” Therefore, because he had taken an indulgent view of Captain Sullivan’s case, he was told that he had no right to take any notice of his conduct. What said the Commander-in-Chief? In his letter of the 7th of January, 1875, he said, after duly considering the whole correspondence I have informed Captain Sullivan—

“I cannot see any ground for inquiry into the manner in which the chaplain has conducted himself. He appears in every instance to have implicitly obeyed his orders.”

He was not going to uphold the chaplain of the London. He had superseded him. But that was the recorded opinion of these two officers? He went on to say he could see no great disrespect or unbecoming conduct which had been shown towards Captain Sullivan by the chaplain. He went on to say that if Captain Sullivan, instead of pointing out what prayers should be said and what parts of the Church Service should be chanted, had told the chaplain what length of time he wished the Service to occupy, he believed all the discussion which had arisen might have been avoided. He went on to say that if the Captain had desired that the chanting should be omitted for reasons made known to him it would have been wrong if the chaplain had not complied. But he added that Mr. Penny appeared to have conducted the Service in accordance with the Liturgy of the Church of England. With regard to the wearing of the stole, the matter was referred to the Admiralty, and they thought the wearing of the stole should be discontinued for the present. The hon. Gentleman had stated that he did not know what a stole was. A stole was a black narrow silk scarf worn by clergymen of the Church of England over their surplices, which fell down towards their ankles. It was worn in nearly every Episcopal church in the country, except where the clergyman was entitled to wear a broad scarf. For himself he saw no virtue or magic in a stole, and he listened with equal pleasure to a clergyman if he did his duty well whether he wore a stole or not.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON reminded his right hon. Friend that the stole was not so much objected to as the gold crosses on the stole.

MR. HUNT: Well, as a matter of taste, he preferred the stole to the gold crosses on the stole. But the crosses on the stole were simply crosses worked in yellow floss silk. It was a pity that crosses should be worn where they gave offence; but when they were sanctioned by Bishops in this country it was impossible for the Admiralty to lay down a positive rule that no chaplain should have a cross upon his stole. They made no order about the stole, but suggested no unnecessary offence should be given to anyone on board the ship. He maintained that to be a truly Christian principle, and held that they were right in not in making a positive order as to the crosses. He now came to the next complaint. The House would observe that according to the opinions of Commodore Hewett and Admiral Cumming, up to that time the chaplain conducted himself most respectfully and obeyed every order. He regretted, however, that that course was not continued; but he must say that the Captain’s conduct to the chaplain was most vexatious and aggravating. He interfered with what was to be read, to say nothing as to interference with the chanting of portions of the Service, which the Rubric said might be said or sung. Chanting, however, might possibly be inconvenient on board a ship; but when the Captain went on to forbid the use of the Apostles' Creed, he was certainly going beyond the line of his duty. But he must tell the House also that when the chaplain got up to preach Captain Sullivan walked out. He said he "withdrew from the service when the chaplain preached." [Sir HENRY JAMES: Because he was personally referred to.] Yes, that was what he said; but the chaplain denied that he had made any personal reference, and said he could not have done so, as he was preaching an old sermon. Of course, if the chaplain was preaching at the Captain he was doing what was very wrong; but there were other ways of dealing with the matter besides getting up and walking out, and he altogether denied that he made any personal reference to the Captain. Then there was another matter. The chaplain was in the habit of taking a voluntary mission service on shore, and the Captain forbade him to do so. It was true that he rescinded the order after a certain time, but it was calculated to annoy; and nothing could be more aggravating or tend more to lessen the influence of the chaplain than that the Captain should tell him to shorten the prayers, omit certain parts of the Service, walk out when he began to preach, and stop his volunteer service on shore. It appeared from the Correspondence that the chaplain had occasion to complain that the Captain had neglected to make any provision for the officers and men of the smaller ships of the Squadron attending Divine Service, and the Admiral, while he considered the explanation of Captain Sullivan indefinite and unsatisfactory, found fault with the chaplain for complaining to another captain who appeared at the station, and who was senior to Captain Sullivan. He was not there to defend the chaplain, whom he had superseded. Going on a little further a new Commander-in-Chief, Admiral Macdonald, was appointed, and on the 30th of July he wrote to the Admiralty, saying that he had ordered a Court of Inquiry. That was occupied 10 days with these wretched squabbles, from the 14th to the 24th, and the Report was made on the 24th, so that the duties of the station were neglected for a fortnight. According to a rule that had always been maintained, he could not produce the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry; for his own sake he wished he could, because he thought they would show that a right decision had been arrived at. He read the proceedings most carefully, and the conclusion produced by the perusal of that Report was that both the chaplain and the Captain were to blame—the Captain, in the first instance, when the discussions arose, and the chaplain afterwards, when he exhibited an improper spirit for a clergyman and disrespect for the Captain. Therefore, he could not uphold either, though the Admiralty, if possible, always upheld a captain, and, with the entire concurrence of his Colleagues, he felt that the only thing to be done was to supersede the Captain. A Court of Inquiry was most essential and most desirable. This was not a case of a charge against the Captain and of evidence before a court martial. These were matters of manner, and a course of conduct creating ill-feeling, which could not be placed in a charge before a court martial. It seemed to him that this was a case in which the two officers should be superseded, for it was impossible that the state of things which had arisen should be allowed to continue; there was discord in the ship, and the services of the ship could not be properly carried on with the existence of so much ill-feeling. [Both officers were simultaneously informed that they would be superseded, and that their successors would be sent out by the next steamer. Unemployed captains were many, but unemployed chaplains were few, and it was much easier to send out a captain than a chaplain. He had intended that both should come home at once, and it was through an accident and inadvertence that this was not the case, though they were both superseded at the same time. The captain came home, and the chaplain was directed to come home before his successor arrived. The captain came home and demanded a court martial. The fact did not appear in the Papers because the demand was made on a personal interview. The request made was that a ship should be sent to Zanzibar with a lot of officers to form a Court, for at these distant stations it was often impossible, even when desirable, to obtain a sufficient number of officers to form a Court. The reply he gave to the demand was that he did not consider it possible to frame a charge that would be cognizable by a court martial. He had been told that the Captain ought to have been tried by a court martial, but some of the witnesses were in England while the others were in Zanzibar, so that the difficulties were insuperable. The truth was that both these officers had got into such an antagonistic attitude and into such a state of excitement that everything in their conduct to each other appeared to their jaundiced vision to be disrespectful. He believed that there had been faults on both sides; that originally the fault was in Captain Sullivan, that it soon became a matter of mutual offence, and that eventually the Admiralty did the best thing for the service by removing both officers from the ship. In a private interview, he informed Captain Sullivan that it was an unfortunate business, but that he might tell his friends it would not be looked at in the light in which he regarded it, and that the Admiralty were willing to employ him again. In his opinion, it was to be regretted that Captain Sullivan did not accept this proposition instead of taking the steps he did. The matter would then have been forgotten, for it was one of those unfortunate personal squabbles which sometimes, though very rarely, arose on board Her Majesty's ships. However, as the subject had been brought before the House he had been obliged to go into it fully and to say things against Captain Sullivan which he should not have said except in self-defence. The Admiralty was responsible for order being kept on board Her Majesty's ships. In conclusion, the right hon. Gentleman expressed his belief that the Admiralty acted wisely in removing both officers and in refusing the court martial to investigate a question of insolence of conduct and manner that was wholly beneath the dignity of such a tribunal.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the right hon. Gentleman had not mentioned any charge which could be brought against Captain Sullivan. In the course of this discussion many hon. Members must have asked themselves the question — "What has Captain Sullivan really done, and why has he been discharged from his ship?"

According to the right hon. Gentleman, it was on account of some miserable squabbles which ought not to have been brought under the attention of the House. It was indeed to be regretted that incidents which had caused scandal in the Navy should have occurred at all; but it was not by shirking the question in that House that the difficulty could be got over. Captain Sullivan ought to have been supported in his position in order that it might have been shown that the presence of a chaplain did not make it a difficult duty for a Nonconformist to command one of Her Majesty's ships. Captain Sullivan's position as a Nonconformist was full of difficulty, and seemed to have been made more difficult by the conduct of the chaplain in introducing some of the more novel forms of the Church of England Service, and, arising from this, the proper order and discipline of the ship was risked in consequence of a miserable squabble about a stole and a gold cross. It was bad taste also and want of discretion on the part of the chaplain to speak as he did of "the heavy disabilities under which the Church of England labours in this vessel," for members of the Church of England on board the London certainly enjoyed advantages as compared with the Dissenting portion of the crew. He thought it was well that cases of this kind should be brought forward, in order that chaplains should understand that the enormous advantages they enjoyed should be exercised with some consideration for the opinions and feelings of those who differed from them. Inasmuch as the Admiralty had recorded their opinion that the chaplain's conduct in this case was "highly disrespectful towards his Captain," it was an unfortunate inadvertence, to say the least, that the chaplain had not been superseded at the same time with the captain; nor was it usual, he thought, when a superior and an inferior officer could not work harmoniously together and the conduct of the inferior had been "highly disrespectful," to remove the superior officer. The difficulty might surely have been cut short by the removal of the chaplain, and not of the Captain. To be removed from the command of his ship was a most grave circumstance in a captain's career, and any personal assurances given to him to the contrary would count for very little. One point made against Captain Sullivan was that he had desired the omission of the Creed from the services; but it should have been added that these were the week-day, not the Sunday services. On the whole, he thought that a reprimand in the case of Captain Sullivan would have met the case. There might have been indiscretion justifying such a reprimand as had been given in the case of other captains; but surely to come into collision with a chaplain was not so great an offence as to come into collision with one of Her Majesty's ships. It was said in the Papers that the chaplain had strictly complied with orders. But there was a way of strictly complying with orders, and yet doing so in such a manner as to be very insubordinate. There might be inuendoes, too, even in an old sermon. But how did the right hon. Gentleman know that this was an old sermon? He saw nothing to this effect in the Papers. Did this statement occur in the private proceedings of which the House knew nothing and which the Captain therefore was unable to contradict? That brought him to the last point, which was that a private inquiry might properly lead to a court martial, but ought not to be allowed to take the place of one. The Admiralty stated that, in their opinion, the matters involved were not of a kind that required to be submitted to a court martial. He thought, however, it would have been better if the Admiralty had decided on the Papers alone without a private inquiry, instead of having to fall back again on the Papers. He acknowledged that the Admiralty had a perfect right to supersede any officer who might have been guilty of indiscretion, or whom they might think unfit to command one of Her Majesty's ships. But then they were in this position: that the Admiralty had information before them which the House had not. On the whole, the matter was left in a most unsatisfactory state, and he regretted that the impression should go forth in the Royal Navy that the Admiralty would not sustain the authority of the captains in the maintenance of discipline.

MR. HUNT said, that he found in the letter that had been placed on the Table of the House that day that the chaplain stated that the sermon which Captain Sullivan said was preached at him was an old sermon preached 12 months ago.

SIR JOHN HAY regretted exceedingly that Captain Sullivan's application for a court martial had not been accorded to. The place where an officer who had his conduct arraigned should be called on to defend himself was before a court martial. He must remark, however, that the First Lord of the Admiralty had justified the course he had taken by the precedent which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) had established in the case of Admiral Wellesley and Admiral Wilmot. If a division were taken he should certainly support the Resolution, on the grounds that captains were entitled to have their conduct publicly inquired into.

MR. ANDERSON pointed out that the punishment of the two officers was utterly unequal, for Captain Sullivan had lost the opportunity by his supersession of gaining an increase of half-pay.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 91; Noes 103: Majority 12.

BLACKWATER FISHERY (IRELAND).

RESOLUTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA rose to call the attention of the House to the circumstances affecting the public rights of Fishery on the Blackwater and on the tidal waters of the estuary of that river; and to move—

"That, without desiring to infringe upon private rights of several fishery in the Blackwater, this House is of opinion that it is the duty of the Government to watch over and protect the rights of the public in respect to fishery in the tidal waters of that and other Irish rivers."

He strongly recommended the matter to the attention of the Government.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, without desiring to infringe upon private rights of several fishery in the Blackwater, this House is of opinion that it is the duty of the Government to watch over and protect the rights of the public in respect to fishery in the tidal waters of that and other Irish rivers."—(Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he had hoped the hon. Member would have stated a little more clearly what it was he wanted the Government to do. He understood it was a question of law.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) (No. 2) BILL.

(Mr. Richard Smyth, The O'Connor Don, Mr. Charles Lewis, Mr. James Corry, Mr. William Johnston, Mr. Dease, Mr. Thomas Dickson, Mr. Redmond.)

[BILL 194.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. R. SMYTH, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that this measure had been so amply discussed, as far as its principle was concerned, on the 12th and 13th of May, when several hours were devoted to its consideration, that it would be quite superfluous on his part to occupy the time of the House with any explanation or defence of it. The Bill consisted of four clauses, the general object of which was to forbid the general sale of intoxicating drinks during the whole of Sunday in Ireland. He used the words "general sale" advisedly, because the serving of liquor by public-houses on Sundays was not proposed to be prohibited in the case of lodgers or bond fide travellers. When the Resolution on the subject was discussed and approved by the House on the 13th of May it was said by some hon. Members that the passing of the Resolution would create alarm all over Ireland, and that something in the form of a re-action would take place against the principle of the Bill. There had been no such re-action. Nothing of the kind had occurred. Their prophecies turned out to be without foundation. There was no general movement in Ireland against the Bill, though the people of Ireland must now be aware that the House of Commons was thoroughly in earnest in their desire to pass a Sunday Closing Bill. He admitted that a certain section of the people in Ireland had made, from their point of view, very laudable attempts to get up an agitation on the subject, and subscribed £1,000 for that purpose; but the result of that subscription would be found in the presentation of the two Petitions presented to the House that day; and in all probability it would be found if they were examined that the signatures were those of the same persons who had petitioned the House on a former occasion, and could only be regarded as duplicates of the Petitions formerly presented. Considering that the House, by a large majority, had already expressed approval of the principle of the Bill, it was impossible after the reception accorded to his Motion two months ago that he could refrain from introducing a measure this Session. The question now stood exactly where it stood on the 13th of May, and, that being so, he would content himself with simply moving the second reading of the Bill.

THE O'CONOR DON seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. R. Smyth.)

MR. M. BROOKS said, that while he had the most sincere admiration for the benevolent motives of the Gentlemen who promoted the Bill, still with all possible respect he must be allowed to say—and with an intimate knowledge of those to whom he was about to allude he did so—that it was not in accordance with either the views or the wishes of the working men of Dublin. Indeed, he felt fully justified in saying—no matter what might be the opinions of the promoters as to its necessity, that it was a proposal opposed to the deliberate wishes of the majority of the working men. It had been found on inquiry that from 50,000 to 100,000 persons visited public-houses on Sundays in the Irish metropolis, and he desired to learn if those places of public resort were closed to them what was the substitute suggested to be provided? He believed the Bill to be unnecessary, and he hoped it would not become law. He should certainly vote against such legislation, believing that it would be productive of great harm, as any measure must be which debarred, for the future, the working classes of Ireland from obtaining on Sundays the refreshment of which they stood in need.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Perhaps I may say a few words on the course the Government propose to take in regard to this Bill. I quite agree with the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) that, after what has occurred already, we are not called upon to enter into any discussion of the principle of the Bill. A few weeks ago we had a full discussion upon the merits of total Sunday closing in Ireland, and all the arguments for and against it were then adduced. There appeared to be an almost unanimous feeling in the House that there should be some further restriction in regard to the hours during which the public-houses in Ireland were to remain open on Sundays, and I on the part of the Government met the Resolution of the hon. Member for Londonderry with a counter proposal, that instead of the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday, there should be a further restriction of the hours of opening. My proposition, however, was not accepted by the House, who adopted the Resolution of the hon. Member by a considerable majority. No attempt was made to treat the question as a Party question, but the House decided in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Londonderry, and against the proposal of the Government. The Government has since considered the position of the Question, and especially, of course, their own position in connection with it. We thought it was only fair and right that the vote of the House should be taken by us as equivalent to a vote on the second reading of the Bill. The Government, therefore, decided not to oppose the Bill of the hon. Member either on its introduction or on the Motion for second reading. At the same time, in making that statement, I wish it to be understood that it is not the opinion of the Government that this Bill could become law this Session, or in its present shape. If, therefore, it should be further proceeded with this Session, it will become my duty to submit certain Amendments.

MR. FORSYTH said, he was exceedingly glad to hear the announcement just made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He had voted for the Bill last year, and he was prepared to do so again; but after the statement made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the part of the Government, he had no doubt the measure would be carried. But his principal object in rising was to protest against the interpretation which had been put upon the speech he delivered last year. He had been told that he was understood to have to some extent impeached the loyalty of the licensed victuallers of Ireland. He could not understand how any speech of his could have produced that impression, for no one could be more convinced of their steadfast loyalty than he was. What he intended to convey was that Sunday drinking in Ireland might lead to meetings of persons who were disaffected; but he did not mean that these meetings were likely to take place in licensed public-houses kept by respectable publicans. He wished to set himself right with the licensed victuallers in Ireland, and to assure them that he intended to make no such reflection or attack on them. If he had said such a thing he should have been stating what he did not believe, and giving them a character which he knew they did not deserve.

MR. O'SULLIVAN opposed the second reading of the Bill. A grosser fallacy had never been imposed on the House of Commons than was embodied in the statement that it was the wish of the Irish people that this Bill should be passed. It was quite true that the measure was asked for by three classes in Ireland—namely, the extreme teetotallers, the extreme Sabbatarians, and a small section of the wealthier classes; but the working classes—at least 80 per cent of the people—were determinedly opposed to the measure, and he was certain that if the Bill were passed there would be a strong re-action. The persons who were in favour of the Bill were persons who never entered a public-house at all, but had well-stocked cellars of their own from which they could always procure the necessary refreshment. The Bill was, in point of fact, a piece of class legislation and an attempt to close public-houses to those who had no other place to resort to. There would, no doubt, be found people in Ireland who would say that because there was such a thing as hydrophobia every dog in Ireland ought to be shot; but those gentlemen who took a delight in keeping dogs would take care not to have their favourites stamped out in that way. The working classes ought, for the same reason, to be protected against the loss of their means of pleasure and comfort on Sunday. If the principle of the measure were good, why not extend it to all parts of the United Kingdom? A great deal had been said and much reliance had been placed upon the number of Petitions that had been presented in favour of the measure, and the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Birmingham and Greenwich declared that these Petitions expressed the Irish idea. They were never more mistaken in their lives. There was no greater delusion than to suppose that Petitions were an expression of the Irish idea, and the time would come when those hon. Members who represented Irish constituencies would feel the re-action against the measure by the loss of the Irish vote. He had himself taken the trouble to analyze one of those Petitions which came from a district in his own county, and with which he was well acquainted. He found that it contained the signatures of a number of devout Sabbatarians, of school-girls, and of gentlemen who never went into a public-house in their lives. Were those, he asked, the people who were to dictate to the people of Ireland what they were to do on a question of this kind? This was class legislation and nothing else. He had discussed the subject with several intelligent tradesmen in his locality, and the general opinion might be thus stated—that bad, undoubtedly bad, as the English Government was, they did not believe that it would pass such a coercive measure as the Sunday Liquor Bill. One respectable tradesman addressed him something in this fashion—“ You have known me many years, did you ever see me drunk in your life ? ”—Never.—“ Then, I will tell you a fact; there is scarcely a Sunday in my life when I do not come into town to meet my fellow-tradesmen in a public-house to take a drink, or two, or three with them, to have a chat and a smoke, and then to go quietly home. I never go near the public-house at any other time, and I would think it the greatest cruelty if this little bit of enjoyment were taken from us on Sundays. The result would be that you would drive us into shebeens, where we would get stuff that would sicken us, and the chances are that we would stop away from our work on Monday to go and take what we considered better stuff, so that both time and money would be lost to us.” He (Mr. O’Sullivan) believed that the closing of public-houses on Sunday would only have the effect of setting aside another day, or, it might be, days, for drink, so that they would lose more time and money. He was prepared to say, without fear of contradiction, that if the Government were forced into the false position of entirely stopping Sunday drinking there would be riots in large towns which the Government would find it extremely difficult to put down. A short time ago the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) said they tried everything to elicit public opinion on the subject, and asked if the Government desired to wait for an expression of opinion in Ireland until it took the form of raising barricades?—and he (Mr. O’Sullivan) wished to know if that was what they desired now? Did the hon. Member ever try to hold a meeting in favour of this Bill in either Cork or Limerick? If he went down there and told the people that he appeared among them at the bidding of the high priest of Good Templarism, whose disciple he was, and that they were forbidden to drink from Saturday night to Monday morning, not all his popularity would save him from several showers of rotten eggs and flour-bags. The hon. Member proceeded to quote the opinions of Dr. Dorrian, Roman Catholic Bishop of Down and Connor, The Cork Examiner, The North British Daily Mail, Mr. Payne, a magistrate of 32 years’ standing in the South of Ireland, The Irish Times, and The Dublin Freeman against Sunday closing of public-houses. The Freeman’s Journal said—

"We think the Government has adopted a wise course in declining to give immediate effect in the shape of a Bill to Professor Smyth's successful Resolution on Sunday closing in Ireland. A little more time for calm consideration is most desirable, and we still cherish the hope that it will be turned to useful account by the friends of temperance as contra-distinguished from the advocates of teetotalism and Sabbatarianism. . . . We contend that one glass of drink taken secretly, or in such a way as to make a man ashamed of himself for having taken it, is more demoralizing and more likely to make him a drunkard than half a dozen taken openly. . . . We welcome the action of the Ministry, and commend their courage and good sense in not taking precipitate action on a question full of difficulty and full of danger."

And The Irish Times had this passage—

"We go as far as the most thorough philanthropist—as the most ardent votary of total abstinence—in deploring excessive drinking, and in the desire for such adequate legislation as will deal satisfactorily with what is undoubtedly a national evil. But we do not think that the application of coercive measures, based upon what is after all in some degree a declaration of public feeling artificially obtained, will meet the serious exigencies of the case. Political and social experience in Ireland shows one thing beyond question, and that is, that attempts to restrict the popular liberty of action within spheres where the public have, or deem they have, a legal right, has invariably been attended with more or less disastrous failure. As was well observed during the Parliamentary debate, it by no means follows that, because the population of certain districts in Ireland agreed voluntarily to Sunday closing, the practice would be equally popular if it were imposed by Act of Parliament."

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was quite irregular in quoting newspaper articles referring to a debate in that House.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he was not quoting the report of a debate, but referring to a commentary called forth by discussions in that House. However, he at once bowed to the ruling of the Speaker, and would dispense with a number of other authorities which he held in his hand giving the opinions of the leading men and journals in Ireland upon this question. In the county of Limerick, which he represented, there were over 150,000 inhabitants, and it was a singular fact that he had not been asked by a single individual to support the Bill of the hon. Member for Derry, excepting by a magistrate, whom he would back to drink as much as any two Members of that House. He was satisfied that if that gentleman was told that a law was about being passed to prevent him from drinking from Saturday night until Monday morning, he would look upon it as the greatest possible species of tyranny. Yet he had a well-stocked cellar, and knew well it was only the working men who would suffer under this Bill. Many writers said all men were mad on some subject or other, and on this subject he thought there were two classes in Ireland who were not far removed from that position—namely, those who abused drink by taking too much and depriving themselves of reason first and life afterwards, and those who took none at all, though they much required it. The Government should treat both these extreme classes as harmless lunatics. He opposed the Bill because it was a form of coercive legislation, and not at all in accordance with the wishes of the people; and if the Bill passed on the erroneous supposition that it was an Irish idea, he predicted that a large number of Petitions would be presented against it next Session. There would have been more up to the present time, but the people of Ireland had no faith in Petitions to that House. They believed that no redress was to be got from the House of Commons for the grievances of Ireland, and they looked upon the present Bill as a mild coercive measure against their liberties. He believed himself that the Government would never consent to the total closing of public-houses on Sundays in Ireland, and he opposed the measure because he regarded it as a restriction of the rights and liberties of the people of Ireland.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down amounted to this—that although the people of Ireland had no faith whatever in that House, or in the effect of any Petitions presented to it, yet in direct contradiction to that statement the hon. Member declared that if the House passed the Bill before them the people of Ireland would hereafter change their minds, and there would be much more numerous Petitions against the Bill. That, in the first place, was simply a prophecy; and in the second place, while it was remarkable that the people of Ireland, having no grievance, should have presented Petitions in favour of the Bill, the hon. Member told them—what was still more remarkable—that the people of Ireland having no confidence in Parliament, and attaching no value to Petitions, would notwithstanding, at a future date, present much more numerous Petitions against the Bill. He did not think that statements of this nature would interpose any considerable difficulty in the way of the progress of the Bill, and therefore he did not propose to enter into the details of a measure which had already been so fully and largely discussed on a former occasion. He was not aware whether it was the intention of those who were opposed to the Bill to ask for the judgment of the House upon it again, and he had simply risen to express his great satisfaction with the nature of the declaration made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) on the part of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman had certainly performed his part on many former occasions with great gallantry, courage, and decision. Those who were opposed to the Bill could not for a moment question either the good faith or the courage and resolution with which the right hon. Gentleman had always stated his objections to any measure before the House—there could be no possible suspicion of him or of his proceedings; but the House would be convinced that when a Government, having taken its own course in a perfectly manly manner in the resistance to a Bill, accepted the judgment of the House as being in conjunction with the manifestations in Ireland, it afforded sufficient ground for them to abandon their position. He knew that the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman was made in good faith, and there could not be a doubt that it was the intention of the Government to recognize the decision of the House and the wishes of the people of Ireland in their substance. At the same time he fully understood that the right hon. Gentleman, with the apprehensions he had expressed on former occasions, and with the responsibility that rested upon him with regard to the execution of the law and the maintenance of order in Ireland, might desire to introduce into the Bill some provisions which might have the effect of softening and regulating what was undoubtedly an important transition. While recognizing the general feeling of the people of Ireland, he fully admitted that it was an important transition, and taking the interest in the measure he did on many grounds, he wished to express a hope that his hon. Friend (Mr. R. Smyth) who had conducted the Bill with great ability, would, on his part, show a sincere desire to meet the advances of Her Majesty's Government. He (Mr. Gladstone) felt quite certain that his hon. Friend would not allow any attachment to the absolute rigour of a doctrine to lead him to insist on the instant and universal operation of the Bill, provided that the proposal made to him by the Government should be of a reasonable character and substantially in accordance with the construction that he felt justified in putting on the announcement made by the Government. He therefore very sincerely hoped that they were arriving at the time when they might consider the Bill removed from the stage of Party contention, and might address themselves to those other subjects which were unfortunately too numerous, and which still solicited the attention of the House. Everyone must be of opinion that something must be done to bring this controversy to a close. It was a controversy by no means unattended with soreness—soreness in Ireland on a conflict of interests, though the opposing party might be—as he thought they were—a small minority of the entire people; but he thought it must be felt that the important political principle involved in the Bill consisted in matters of very considerable importance, and he could not doubt that that motive must have weighed on the mind of the right hon. Gentleman opposite and of Her Majesty's Government. Perhaps he might be permitted for one moment to allude to what took place on a previous night in an argumentative sense. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, in resisting the proposal made by a portion of the Irish Members, went over a great number of subjects with the view of showing that there had been no undue resistance to the clearly expressed desire of the people of Ireland on matters peculiarly Irish. But there was a significant omission in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He might now feel that even on political grounds it might be desirable to take out of the mouths of those who might wish to show an obstinate disregard and disrespect on the part of Parliament to the will, interest, and judgment of Ireland in matters properly Irish, any plea such as he must say had been to a certain extent afforded, and would, by the continued resistance of Parliament, be much more conclusively afforded, to the effect that they did not give regard to the wishes of the people of Ireland in a matter in which, by our legislation for Scotland, they had shown that they considered to be one that might be fairly regarded as of local and not of Imperial interest. He held most strongly the conviction that, apart even from the mere moral and social objects they had in view, the question was very important indeed, whether in those subjects which they conceived to be of a local character—he meant local as opposed to Imperial—they were to give the same fair play to the people of Ireland, and the same regard to their well-understood wishes, which they would give to the people of England or the people of Scotland. That was the principle which he held to lie at the root of all sound policy and sound procedure in this House; and in truth he should, he owned, even despair of maintaining permanently in a satisfactory manner the connection between the two countries on its present footing unless they sincerely adopted and acted upon that principle. On every ground, therefore, he could not but express a fervent hope that they were now arriving, through the happy announcement of the right hon. Gentleman, at the close of that Parliamentary contest, and he felt sure that as the right hon. Gentleman had been manly and outspoken in the statement of his objections to the Bill, so he would be frankly conciliatory in the endeavour to arrive at an understanding with his hon. Friend the Member for Derry. He had the same confidence in the reciprocal conduct of his hon. Friend, and, therefore, in the happy result which would cause, he believed, great national satisfaction throughout Ireland.

MR. HERMON said he had also to express his satisfaction at the statement made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He had, in order to arrive at what were the wishes and feelings of the Irish people on the matter, addressed himself to several hon. Members—those who had given more than usual attention to the matter—and he was bound to say that the result of his inquiry convinced him that there was a deep-felt expectation on the part of the Irish people that this measure should become law; and therefore it was that he gave it his support. But he hoped the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Smyth) would not be too anxious to pass the Bill as it stood, for in going into the details they might find it necessary to introduce some changes so as to guard against creating such a state of things as took place in this country some years ago, when restrictive legislation was followed by riots, and had to be repealed. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) had referred to the feeling of the Irish people, and had stated that it was antagonistic to the measure; but either the hon. Gentleman himself was wrong, or else a very large number of the Irish Members were wrong, who had assured them that the Irish people took a very deep interest in it. That, indeed, was corroborated by the hon. Member himself, when he stated that whenever he returned home he would run the risk of being maltreated by the people, because of the expression of his opinion in opposition to the Bill.

MR. O'SULLIVAN explained. He did not say that he ran the risk of being ill-treated, but that the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) might expect such treatment for advocating the Bill.

MR. HERMON said, he had no doubt the hon. Member for Louth had but spoken his own convictions when he supported the Bill, and he had no reason to be afraid to show himself in any part of Ireland, because of the free expression of his opinions. There seemed to be a general feeling in favour of reading the Bill a second time; and what he would suggest was that it should be made a tentative measure by limiting its operation to a period of two or three years. By that means they would be able to ascertain whether or not it met the wishes of the Irish people. If it did, they could easily retain it on the Statute Book by passing a Continuance Bill.

MR. STORER said, he could not sit still and give a silent vote on this Bill. He might be asked why he interfered in the matter when it was the wish of the Irish people that it should pass? That was an argument which had not any force with him, for the measure was not only an Irish, but also an English one. They all knew that there was a large and influential body of persons who favoured the closing of public-houses in the interests of temperance. If this Bill passed, their zeal would be so increased that he felt convinced they would be satisfied with nothing less than the total abolition of public-houses, and this measure would then become the groundwork for similar legislation in England. If it really were the opinion of the Irish people that the public-houses should be closed in Ireland all the day on Sundays, it seemed to him a very Irish way of proceeding to ask Parliament to prohibit it. They had the whole thing in their own hands, and could secure all they desired by coming to the resolution not to resort to the public-houses on Sunday. There was nothing to prevent them keeping out of those houses on Sundays. There might be some argument in favour of restricting the hours during which drink might be supplied on Sundays; but there was not any plea whatever to justify the total closing of them on that day. The Bill was nothing else than an attempt on the part of the upper and middle classes to interfere with the personal freedom of the working classes by preventing them from obtaining the refreshment they could only obtain at the public-houses. He could scarcely imagine a state of circumstances in which it could realize the advantages to which its advocates looked forward. In Scotland, where such a law had been for some time in force, the shebeen houses were in full play and private drinking on the increase. He was perfectly sure that should this Bill become law, they would witness the same state of things in Ireland—and that was not by any means desirable. The Irish were not a drunken people, and he asked if the 99 sober persons should be deprived of the right they possessed of obtaining what refreshment they required, simply because one person was found to abuse that right?

MR. ANDERSON said, he had not intended to interpose in this debate, and would not have taken up the time of the House but for a statement made by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The hon. Member was entirely misinformed when he said that the result of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act had been to increase the number of shebeen houses in Scotland. That was an entire fallacy. They might exist in some numbers in the larger towns, but that they had increased all over the country was a misstatement. He would assert, on the other hand, that the closing of public-houses in Scotland on Sunday had worked to the entire satisfaction of the inhabitants—and not only to their satisfaction, but to the satisfaction of the keepers of the public-houses themselves, who considered that their trade had benefited in respectability, and that their families had also benefited immensely by the day of rest. He was confident that the people of Scotland would never consent to the re-opening of public-houses on Sunday.

MR. KIRK opposed the second reading. No one, he said, regretted more than he did the extent to which intemperance prevailed not merely in Ireland, but in these countries generally—it was certainly a state of things which called for improvement, and he would go as far as the most earnest teetotaler to secure that improvement. But he was bound to say that in his opinion this Bill if it were passed would be attended by results quite the reverse of those which were expected from it by its promoters. It was his opinion that one of the consequences of the Bill becoming law would be that Ireland would bristle with shebeen-houses, and thus an impetus would be given to secret drinking, which would soon generate a cancerous growth of vice and demoralization. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) denied that the operation of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act had been attended by any such results in Scotland; but he would refer the hon. Gentleman to an article in The Scotsman, written by one who had an intimate knowledge of the working of that Act. That article stated that, so far from there having been a decrease in the number of shebeen-houses consequent upon the Sunday Closing Act, those establishments had considerably increased; that the Scotch people drank at present as much per head as they had been in the habit of drinking before the passing of that measure; and that, too, notwithstanding the fact that the taxation upon intoxicating drinks was now double what it used to be. He could furnish numerous extracts from the Scotch newspapers to the same intent. It was clear then that up to the present time coercive legislation—a legislation which was hateful to the Irish in whatever guise it came—had failed to stamp out drunkenness in Scotland. That being so, they might rely upon it such a law would equally prove a failure in Ireland. In that country the public-houses were now open from 2 P.M. till 7 P.M. on Sundays, and yet notwithstanding that that was the case they had a great deal of illicit drinking, and that chiefly early in the morning. It could not be doubted that the total closing of licensed houses would add to that evil. He knew that such was the state of things in Drogheda, and that the police were entirely unable to cope with it. He knew, too, that the publicans were perfectly aware of the existence of these illicit drinking houses; but they would not inform against them for selling drink during the prohibited hours on Sunday, lest their own houses should be deserted on the other days of the week. Another objection he had to the Bill was that it was an attempt at class legislation. To such legislation he could be no party. The public-house was to the artizan and to the labourer what the club was to the upper classes of society. To it they resorted to hold converse with their associates, to exchange views with them, and, perhaps, to talk politics; and he did not see why they should be shut out from indulging themselves in that way on the only day on which they had an opportunity of doing so. If they were to be prevented from doing so, why, then, should they not also close the West-end clubs and place precisely the same restrictions on the enjoyments of the men of wealth and position, who would no doubt be patriotic and philanthropic enough to submit to be deprived of their wines and social enjoyments on Sunday, when they knew that they were thereby setting a good example to the general public? It might perhaps be said in answer to this that the upper classes were not addicted to intemperance; but he was sure he might appeal to the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford (Major O'Gorman), or to his own Colleague, to corroborate his statement that temperate men resorted to public-houses more for society than to indulge in the use of intoxicating drinks. They had been told that the highest dignitaries of the Law had from the Bench of justice deplored the increase of drunkenness in Ireland. He was not prepared to go so far as that, for it was his belief that the Returns on which the Judges based their comments were to a great degree fictitious. A new regulation for the remuneration of the clerks at petty sessions was now in force, and the provisions if it were such as to hold out an inducement to those officers to secure as large a number of convictions as possible; and hence it was that he regarded the Reports placed before the Judges as to some extent fictitious. The friends of temperance would, he was convinced, do more to reform the people if they used persuasion instead of coercion.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he was very anxious, before the Bill went any further, to have, if possible, a clear understanding as to the alterations proposed to be made in it. As he understood the measure, it seemed to him almost an impossibility to alter its principle, and they must not lose sight of the fact that it was upon the question of principle that they were then engaged. The principle of the Bill was to close hermetically all public-houses throughout Ireland on Sundays; and as that was the raison d'être of the measure, he must oppose it as strongly as possible. Men might say what they liked; but it was a simple attempt at class legislation; and all the Petitions, and nearly every movement in favour of the Bill, came from the upper classes, who, upon a question of this kind, were the very worst exponents of the feelings of those who would be affected. Whether it was, as they had been told in the course of this discussion, class legislation in its worst form, he would not take upon himself to pronounce; but it was an attempt, not solely by people who merely believed in Sunday closing, but teetotallers, to get in the thin end of the wedge. If this measure passed they would be able to say that the same principle ought to be extended to England; and having closed public-houses all over the Kingdom on Sundays, they would argue that the policy of total abstinence was admitted, and that Parliament was bound therefore to accept the Permissive Bill, or some other similar measure. Let them not hide the fact from themselves that what was now proposed to be done would leave hon. Members of that House the freedom of their own cellars and of their own clubs, and they would have the means of getting a glass of wine or of spirits whenever they pleased; but the man who worked all day in Limerick or Cork from week's end to week's end would on the only day on which he could go out for enjoyment be deprived thereby of the means of getting reasonable refreshment. It would be most objectionable to him to interfere with the liberty of any man or class of men; especially since if a man chose to abstain from going into a public-house on Sunday or any other day he was at perfect liberty to do so; and if some few required to be guarded against themselves, that was no reason for coercing others. What would be thought if it was proposed at the instance of one creed to shut up the churches and chapels of another?—and still the so-called principle would be the same. Let it be at once honestly stated that it was not on account of any principle, but because there were hundreds of Petitions with thousands of signatures in favour of this proposal, that Parliament was disposed to entertain it, and then let them inquire whose were the signatures, and how their support was obtained. He would infinitely rather take the Petition signed by 12,000 of the wage-class in Dublin than all the Petitions signed by all the Prelates, priests, and others who could get their drink when they liked. If those who lived behind their own park gates and palace walls knew as much as they ought to do of the domestic habits of the wage-earning classes, measures of this kind would receive little favour in Parliament. There could be no doubt that if public-houses were closed, shebeen-houses, illicit distillation, and illicit drinking would spread in spite of the ordering of Prelates and the teaching of priests, and a re-action would take place which would repress for years to come all sound legislative attempts to promote temperance. It was said that beer, which was the English beverage, would keep, but that whiskey, which was the drink of Ireland, could be got just as well on Saturday night as on Sunday. Possibly, to a certain extent, that reasoning was true; but every sensible man knew that if they were to tell an Irishman that he was not to have the opportunity of obtaining reasonable refreshment on Sunday at a public-house, the chances were that he would not only take the bottle home on the Saturday night certainly, but would take care to have it fuller than he would do if he could get more next day. The consequence of that would be that almost every private house would be turned more or less into a drinking shop during the Sunday afternoon, and men would go to illicit places to get drink. He was not one who thought Irishmen were more inebriate than the people of any other country; but depend upon it they would not be coerced into abstaining from taking a legitimate amount of drink, notwithstanding all that priests, Prelates, Popes, or anybody else might say to the contrary. Let them not deceive themselves and imagine because some considered it desirable to stop drinking that coercive measures could do anything but bring about a reaction which would compel them to retrace their steps. So far as the principle went of closing all public-houses in Ireland on Sunday, he insisted that there was no necessity whatever for the measure, and he hoped and trusted the House would never be beguiled by the upper ten thousand into legislating in such a manner for the class who alone would be affected. This Bill would receive, both in principle and detail, the most determined opposition he could give it, because he was certain that if once the thin end of the wedge was got in in Ireland, an attempt would be made to close public-houses in England, which were the poor man's clubs, while the upper classes remained free to get whatever drink they wished.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he should support the Bill. In Scotland the measure decried by the hon. Member (Mr. Storer) had been in existence for 23 years, and had, on the whole worked satisfactorily, and no single Member in that House or any constituency had raised a voice against it. He denied that this was class legislation—the measure was demanded by the representatives of all classes in Ireland. All the highest judicial functionaries in Ireland pointed to such a law as this to stop intemperance and crime. The clergy, both Protestants and Roman Catholics, the Town Councils, and society generally in Ireland—including the working classes—all urged the Government to legislate in this direction. It could not then be said that this was class legislation. He believed it would prove as beneficial in Ireland as it had proved in Scotland, and the more so because the Irish were not habitual drinkers. He would rather that moral suasion were used to remedy the evil complained of, but that having failed it was high time to legislate on the subject.

MR. MACARTNEY supported the Bill. The advocates of the measure should thank Her Majesty's Government for the announcement they had made of their intention to support it; and he hoped the clauses they proposed to introduce would provide for its gradual, not too sudden, adoption.

MR. GOULDING urged the House to pass this measure, and to try the experiment. He was certain that if the Bill became law it would be beneficial to Ireland in the prevention of a great deal of crime.

MR. MURPHY said, the House would do well to remember that in the year 1868 a Committee of the House of Commons came to the unanimous conclusion—founded not upon the evidence of philanthropists, but on that of responsible officials who knew the habits and the temptations of the people—that it would be impossible to pass such a law and to carry out such a measure. There was no man more anxious than he to put down intemperance; but he could not submit to the imputation made by the promoters of the Bill that the working classes of Ireland, for whose benefit it was supposed to be introduced, were—or rather that the bulk of the Irish nation were—drunkards. There was no raison d'être for this Bill, however, except by assuming that the Legislature were bound to step in and take charge of the people, who were incapable of taking care of themselves, who could not restrain their passions and their impulses, and who ought to be held up to the world as a nation that should be treated rather like children than like men. Since the time when this subject was first ventilated he had never once swerved in the opinion he had held with regard to it. He had never opposed it blindly, however, and he had never been opposed to a reasonable modification of the hours. He had, in fact, advocated the very hours which were adopted in the Bill of 1872. In connection with the present Bill much had been said about the assumed state of public opinion in Ireland. Among other Members who had touched upon the point, he heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich base his reason for supporting the Bill on the assumption that the people of Ireland called for it, and that it would be wrong to deny them what they asked for by this Bill, which was one of a purely social character. If he (Mr. Murphy) thought so, he declared he would be the first to assist their views; but it was because he believed the contrary to be the case—because he knew it to be so—he opposed them. There was no proof whatever that the Irish people asked for this measure—at all events, those classes for whose convenience public-houses existed. It was said that the feeling of the Irish people on the question was shown by the numerous Petitions that had been presented in favour of the measure, while scarcely any had been presented against it. Why, what was the case? No later than six weeks ago he himself presented a Petition from Cork signed by 16,500 working men against the Bill, and another with 3,000 or 4,000 signatures from the localities around Cork, also against the Bill; and he asked the supporters of the Bill whether, in the face of that evidence, they would stand up and say that no expression of public opinion adverse to it had come from Ireland? And again, within the last few months they had had a most influential meeting at Cork, convened in pursuance of a requisition signed by 150 of the most respectable residents, including magistrates, deputy-lieutenants, merchants, shopkeepers, and others, praying the Mayor of Cork to call a public meeting for the discussion of this very measure. The Mayor called the meeting, which was advertised in all the Cork papers for 10 days before it was held. It took place in the Court-house, which was filled from floor to ceiling. A thorough discussion of the subject ensued, and a resolution was then proposed by the High Sheriff alleging against the measure the reasons adduced by its opponents—namely, that it was altogether unjust, that it was impolitic, and that if it were passed into law it could not be practically brought into operation. At that meeting there were supporters of the Bill—some eight or ten gentlemen, who were members of the United Kingdom Alliance, or Permissive Bill Alliance, or Sunday Closing Association—they appeared to be all the same—and they opposed the objects of the meeting; but the nature of their opposition was such that the Mayor, who presided, refused to put their amendment, as being inapplicable. With the exception of those eight or ten gentlemen, who came specially to oppose the meeting, its opinion was unanimous, and that opinion was embodied in the Petition sent up from Cork. Then, how could it be said that there was no opposition to the Bill? What he said was this—that the excellent organization of the Sunday Closing Association—which he believed to be merely a branch of the United Kingdom Alliance, which had large funds at its disposal, and whose ramifications were so extensive that there was no district in Ireland in which its agents were not to be found—that organization, he said, had been used with remarkable energy, and backed up by the clergy of all denominations. He was by no means surprised at the success they appeared to have met with, and that it had been to a very great extent successful seemed to be the case from their having been able to impress the House of Commons with the idea that the people of Ireland were in favour of this Bill. But if the House blindly accepted the idea that the people of Ireland approved of the measure, they would find it would be so far from working out the desired remedy for any evil now existing in that country that it would only intensify it, open the way for an unnatural agitation—perhaps to be conducted by parties interested in getting up a disturbance, who would be sure to endeavour to make the people believe that they were the victims of class legislation. An hon. Member had expressed the hope that the Government would not allow itself to be influenced by the representations of persons acting on behalf of the central organization in Ireland. He hoped so to; and he could not sit down without adverting to the influences that had been used, and to the pressure that had been brought to bear upon Members of that House by persons who supported the Bill; and he also desired to show how, without their knowledge or consent, the signatures of constituents of several hon. Members had been used to represent Petitions sent up in support of the Bill as being the result of the spontaneous action of the public, instead of that of the private representatives of the agents of the organization; those Petitions being really transmitted to the Members through the agency of the United Kingdom Alliance or of the Sunday Closing Organization, or by whatever name they ought to be called. Now, he said that was not a legitimate practice—and he protested against the action of that well-organized society in getting Petitions forwarded through hon. Members of that House and representing them as the result of the spontaneous action of the public, when in fact they were no such thing. Then it was said this was all pure philanthropy—all for the good of the poor working classes of Ireland, who gave themselves over to drink—that it was for their good, temporally and eternally, that those good philanthropists had formed themselves into an association to promote morals and Christian example. That might be so, but all he could say was that that Society was not above dealing with matters, and using its funds, for very practical purposes. They could show their great over-righteousness, but they could also descend to very practical means of carrying their measures, and making their Members understand what they might gain by aiding them, and what they might lose if they could not quite agree with the measures of the Irish Sunday Closing Association. The House would understand that it was avowed under the hand of an official of that Society that they had funds at their command, and that they used them for the purpose of influencing elections in the various towns; that negotiations had been carried on by the consent of the Association; and that its agents, with the funds of the Association applied for the purpose, had come down to the town, and had treated with individuals in it for the promotion of the ends which the Association had in view. He had a right to mention that, because he held in his hand a letter from the Society in question avowing it. He would not read the whole letter, but he would read an extract from it. It said—

“The Secretary of the Association came expressly from Dublin in reference to the matter, and after several interviews a special meeting of the local Committee rejected his offer—doing this after they were informed from head-quarters that money would be forthcoming if, in their judgment, it was required, and could be properly expended.”

The writer added—

“Murder will out, and you and the people of Cork may judge of the matter for yourselves.”

This letter was signed, "Scott Anderson, 8, George's-street, June 24th, 1876." All this agitation, and the Bill itself, was, he maintained, nothing but the outcome of a well-organized and well-managed Association, and he denied that it emanated from the spontaneous movement of the working classes of Ireland. He did not suppose that anything he could say would affect a division of the House upon the question, if a division should be taken upon it, or he would most strongly urge the House not to pass such a Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when he accepted the Bill, said he would propose modifications in Committee. Now he (Mr. Murphy) could not understand what modifications could be introduced into the Bill that would not conflict with its principle—for its principle was that all public-houses should be closed in Ireland on Sundays. If the right hon. Gentleman was about to say that the Bill would be utterly impracticable in Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and other large places, and that therefore he proposed to except them from the operation of the Bill, he could understand the proposition—but it was exemption, not modification. A great number of Members had voted for the measure in the present Session who did not vote for it two years ago, and now the right hon. Gentleman had taken the course of announcing that he would not oppose the Bill. He did not know what precise meaning was to be attached to that statement; but he confessed that, with that statement before him, if the Bill was carried to a division, he could not see that any other course was open to him than to vote against it.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he was very anxious that the grounds of the vote he intended to give on the Motion before the House should not be misunderstood, and therefore he would, with the permission of the House, explain the reasons why he should give that vote. Now, he wished, in the first instance, to state that the Gentlemen who supported this Bill had not a monopoly of the desire to put down intemperance, nor were they the only persons who were alive to the calamities resulting from it; nor could any one be more anxious than himself that they should be put an end to by any means that legislation could supply. But this was a question in which the majority were not the governing body, and he was wonderfully startled when he heard so great an authority as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich say that because a majority of the people of Ireland were of one opinion on the matter, he therefore supported the Bill. This was not a question on which the majority should govern. This was a sumptuary law, and they knew how, at the commencement of civilization, sumptuary laws had always been adopted by semi-barbarous people, and how as nations advanced in civilization they came to the conclusion that individuals were not to be interfered with in matters that did not actually concern the nation. A Society was formed for the purpose of protecting each individual against oppression or coercion, whether from abroad or from home; and for that purpose each individual gave up some part of his personal liberty. But that Government was the best that supplied the greatest amount of security at the least expense of personal liberty, and he was there that day to say that the personal liberty of the individual as regarded his mode of drinking or his mode of eating was not a matter to be decided by legislation. That was what surprised him from so great an authority as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who could not see that it was not the province of legislation to interfere in such matters, and he said they ought not to. What was the real state of the case? It was simply this—A small number of the whole people of Ireland were inclined to intemperance—a very small number—and because that small number could not control themselves they—the Legislature and the Government—were asked to step in and say that every individual in that country should be coerced because they could govern themselves. That was the real state of the question, and people should not be deceived by the nature of the appeals made to them. Did anybody suppose that all those Petitions were got up in the real belief that much good was to be done by them? Not at all. Men had crotchets, men had passions, men had interests, and crotchets, passions, and interests had led to this measure. This measure was not proposed upon good grounds, and he was inclined to believe that the Government had done exceedingly unwisely in yielding to the pressure put upon them by a sudden

Mr. Murphy

Vote of the House of Commons. If the House of Commons had been led to think over the circumstances as they ought, they would come to the conclusion, and would rightly come to it, that this was no question for legislation, but that it ought to be left to the various influences which society afforded for bringing people round to morality and good conduct—to the clergy, the magistracy, the school-master, to everybody, in fact, that helped to form the opinion of mankind. We ought to leave the settlement of this question to them, and not ask the Legislature to pass a Bill like the one before the House.

MR. O'LEARY said, that this Bill, if it should become law, would increase Sunday drinking. The result would be this—licensed houses were kept open late on Saturday night, and the persons who frequented them would take home whiskey for consumption on Sunday if the houses were to be closed on that day. The consequence would be that, after taking their usual quantity of drink on Saturday nights, they would not go home perfectly sober—or at least they would have taken sufficient to whet their appetite for more—and when they got home they would take a little of that bought for Sunday; this would induce them to take a little more; and the chances were that they would not go to bed till early in the morning, when all the whiskey had been consumed. Next morning they would not be able to attend mass; and if a man did not attend mass for several Sundays he was considered almost a lost man. The respectable portion of the community would not go into a beer-house on the Sunday—he waited patiently until 2 o'clock; but if this Bill were carried they would have no alternative. He had personally consulted a large number of clergymen and others in Dublin upon this question, and it was the general opinion that this Bill was a mistake, and that to prevent Sunday drinking the great thing would be to deal with the beer-houses. The keeper of a public-house, having embarked several thousands in his property, would not permit drunkenness and risk losing his licence—his interest and aim were to keep his house respectable. Now, the question was between drinking in public-houses and drinking at home. If the respectable tradesman or artizan were driven to drink at home, as he would be if this Bill passed, the children would be taught to drink also;—the young man of 21 must have his glass of whiskey as strong as his father's, and all because it was passing round the table. In Scotland, the land of Sunday closing, enormous quantities of whiskey were put by on Saturday nights for consumption on Sundays, and by 9 or 10 o'clock on Sunday mornings there was a large amount of drunkenness. Only a few weeks ago a shocking catastrophe occurred in Glasgow, when two little children were killed by whiskey on Sunday morning. Their parents got so drunk through drinking their Saturday night supply for Sunday that the children thought it a good opportunity to imitate their virtuous parents, and they drank themselves to death. Besides these two, there were other cases on the same day from drunkenness. One woman fell into the canal and was drowned, another fell out of a window, and there were altogether six deaths in this land of Sunday closing as the result of Sunday drinking. Lest it might be thought that he was exaggerating what took place in Scotland, he would quote from The North British Mail of June 6th—and this was the reply he gave to the Irish Members; because the English Members would not entertain this question were it not that some of the Irish Members had spoken so strongly about it. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy) had detailed the different means which had been adopted to induce them to support this measure against their private convictions. They were told that shebeens could be put down immediately. But what was the case in Scotland? He would read what took place at the Greenock Police Court. It was headed—"Alarming Increase of Shebeens," and went on to say, "A labourer named John O'Neill"—by-the-by, that was an Irish name—and perhaps it was an argument in his favour, for if, in the face of the canny Scotch, the Irishman could evade the law, what would he not do at home?—

"John O'Neill was charged with having on Sunday last trafficked in excisable liquors in his house, and he pleaded not guilty. It came out in the course of the trial that for some time past there has been an increase, which was described as 'most alarming,' in the number of shebeens in town; that localities such as the Vennel abound with places where the illicit traffic is carried on; that accused lived in a close into which men in a sober state were seen to enter, and from which they afterwards emerged intoxicated; and that 'scouts' in the interest of the traffickers were on the look-out for the police, and did duty so well in giving timely intimation of their neighbourhood or approach that it was an exceedingly difficult matter to surprise the guilty parties, or to obtain evidence which would lead to conviction. The house of accused was suspected to be a shebeen; and at the early hour of half-past 6 on Sunday morning a policeman, who was off duty and dressed in plain clothes, was instructed to go to the house, accompanied by a companion, not a policeman, and to ask for liquor. The policeman and his companion got admittance, and obtained two supplies of whiskey, for which 8d. in each case was paid, the price being at the rate charged for the best whiskey. The liquor was supplied by the wife of accused, and he himself was present at the time. While the policeman was under examination in the witness-box, the bailie asked the fiscal if it was a right or proper thing that the members of the police force should be employed on such errands as going into shebeens and getting drink for the purpose afterwards of establishing a charge? The fiscal replied that it was almost impossible otherwise to secure evidence of shebeening. Accused, on being asked by the bailie what he had to say for himself, stated that on Saturday evening he had been down the town drinking, and that he had laid in a supply for home consumption on Sunday, but that on Sunday morning, when the two men called, he supposed that his wife had sold some of the whiskey, because he had less need of it than she had of money."

That was the state of things existing in the land of Sunday closing, and it represented what would be the effect of Sunday closing in Ireland. He would now read an extract from The Scotsman. Speaking about Mr. Bright's speech, in which he told the Irish agitators to blame the Government for the refusal of their demand by Parliament, that paper said—

"The insincerity of the demand, and the hopelessness of giving it real effect, were it ostensibly granted, are made plain by looking at the circumstances of Ireland compared with those of the other two kingdoms, in both of which similar experiments have been made. Presbyterian Scotland makes professions, and to some extent has habits, regarding Sunday incomparably more strict than any other Christian country, and it is not surprising to find that there is here a considerable amount of outward observance of the law against the public consumption of liquor on Sunday"— in other words, that hypocrisy was rampant—

"but what, after all, have been the results on the balance even here? There is not only a great deal of private and illicit drinking on Sunday, but whatever diminution has taken place on that day, must have gone to increase the drinking on other days, for, on the whole, we drink as much as before the law was made, and that, too, in spite of the price of wine we drink having been doubled by additional taxation."

The consumption in Scotland, therefore, was absolutely increasing, and we had from Scotland's own mouth that Sunday drinking and Sunday drunkenness were really matters of fact, notwithstanding the Sunday closing. But there was something beyond that to which he would refer. Ingenious Hibernians on the other side of the Channel sometimes looked for aid from this side; but when they looked for a certain class of aid it was a tolerably good proof that they had a shaky cause. What had the advocates of Sunday closing in Ireland done? They had brought over to Ireland a lady—"Mother Stewart," as she was called—to lecture about Sunday closing, and from what she said he presumed she was a lady of good sense. She said—and she had as large a gathering as Moody and Sankey had—"she did not believe in what they were doing in Scotland. She hoped that in Ireland they would get the Bill without the loopholes there were in Scotland. She was in Dundee last Sabbath week. She was at a prayer meeting. On her return she met thousands—bona fide travellers—rolling across the bridge drunk in the middle of the day." This was a matter of absolute fact. It was not his statement. He did not say that thousands were rolling over the bridge drunk, for the simple reason that he did not think a man who was drunk could roll over it. But the lady stated that as a matter of fact. She thought the Scotch law must be made more stringent before it would work. So much for Mother Stewart. Was that the sort of law, then, they were going to have applied to Ireland? He hoped, for the sake of his country, it would never be said that thousands of persons were drunk and rolling over the rickety bridges in the middle of the Sunday; and yet that was what it was said Sunday closing had done for Scotland. It would be incomparably better to let every man get any drink he wanted openly and without deception or trickery than have such a system as that going on. Look at the districts in Ireland where voluntary Sunday closing had been adopted, and what did they find there? Why, only last week the Judge of Assize in Tipperary, speaking in the county where Sunday closing was held up as a model to the rest of Ireland, told the grand jury that arrests for drunkenness there were enormously on the increase; and in the diocese of Ferns, also under the voluntary closing system, they were told that rowdyism and crime abounded; and if these were characteristic of any district it was always said that they flowed from, and were the natural outcome of, drunkenness. At the Enniscorthy petty sessions the other day several parties were convicted of disorderly conduct and assaults, and he saw from a report in The Irish Times that Mr. Cookman, the presiding magistrate, in alluding to the state of Enniscorthy, said that—“If the town was not to be altogether given up to the rowdies, something must be done to put a stop to those disgraceful acts by more stringent measures or the increase of the police force.”

At the previous petty sessions one of the justices presiding said that the state of Enniscorthy was so bad that the farmers could not bring in their corn without being assaulted by the roughs of the town. What was the cause of this? Why, Sunday closing was at the root of it all. This state of things arose from drink taken secretly on the Sunday, by which the people were demoralized—and yet that was the system which was to be extended to the whole of Ireland. It was said that drunkenness on Sundays was so greatly on the increase that this Bill must be passed at once. Let them see what was the necessity for it. Taking the official Reports published in Thom's Irish Almanac, it would be found that crime had greatly decreased in Ireland of late years. Dividing the 30 years from 1845 to 1874 into decennial periods, he found that in the first 10 years, from 1845 to 1854, the convictions at assizes and quarter sessions averaged per year 12,808. In the second decennial period, from 1855 to 1864, the convictions averaged 3,595 a-year. The third decennial period showed a further improvement, the convictions having fallen to an average of 2,575 per annum. The worst class of crimes had declined in still greater proportions, the averages being 22·7 in the first, 5·4 in the second, and 3 per cent in the third decade. Imprisonment for petty offences summarily dealt with had also fallen off from an average of 45,050 in the first 10 years to 21,589 in the second, and 19,594 in the third decade; while in the last year for which the Returns were given there was a still further reduction to 18,628. The imprisonments for drunkenness had also fallen off from an average of 15,543 in the first decade to 7,806 in 1874. How in the face of these official statistics it could be contended that Ireland needed a Draconian code to put down intemperance and crime passed his comprehension. He thought the Bill a very bad return for the improved morality of the Irish people, and he called upon the House to reject it. He had occupied the House a considerable time, and he was extremely grateful for the kindness shown to him. There was, however, one other question to which he would refer, and that was the bond fide traveller question. Of course the bond fide traveller would be protected under this Bill. The consequence would be that, say between Dublin and Kingstown, there would be a general migration every Sunday; friends in Kingstown would visit friends in Dublin on one Sunday, and a return visit would be paid the next, and before long bond fide travellers' clubs would be established. The result would be that, as Mother Stewart said of Dundee, thousands of drunken persons would be rolling about the streets, and matters would really be worse than they were at present. Let him say one word in reference to the Petitions in favour of this Bill. It was stated that 1,000 of these Petitions had been signed in England; but in Ireland they did not want Petitions signed in England to tell them they must adopt Sunday closing. That House had no right to take cognisance of Petitions got up in England in support of Sunday closing in Ireland—they might pay more attention to them if they were for Sunday closing in England. It was a remarkable fact that in none of the places where Petitions had been got up against nuns and nunneries had there been a single Petition in favour of Irish Sunday closing. The House might make what they could of that, but it was an actual fact. When a deputation of artisans waited upon him on this question he asked them whether there was not a great deal of Saturday night drinking, and whether it would not be advisable to shorten the hour of closing on Saturdays. The deputation, representing about 24,000 artizans, said it would decidedly, and they thought 8 o'clock would be a good time to close. He asked if at any time 18,000 or 20,000 men would sign a Petition in favour of early closing on Saturday, and they said they would, but that it was unjust and unfair to close altogether on Sunday. He hoped the House would reject the Bill, which he thought was not only uncalled-for but unjust.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he was placed in a peculiar position with regard to this Bill, as many of his constituents were in favour of its principle. Notwithstanding that, however, he must say that, in his opinion, neither men nor women could be made moral, sober, or religious by Act of Parliament. He believed, with the hon. Member for Limerick County (Mr. O'Sullivan), that if this Bill passed there would be great disturbances in many districts in Ireland, because the people would not be likely to submit quietly to be deprived of that which they had hitherto enjoyed. He trusted, therefore, that this Bill would not be carried; and he was the more anxious that it should not pass because it was a Bill that would press hardly on the poor, and not in any degree interfere with the comfort and enjoyment of the rich. He would support an Amendment for closing public-houses early on Saturday, as much more drinking took place on that day than on Sunday.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he wished to explain for the first time why he intended to vote for this Bill. It was because the preponderance of opinion in Ireland of all classes and creeds was in favour of Sunday closing. The figures quoted by the hon. Member for Drogheda (Mr. O'Leary) referred to a period of famine, when petty larcenies and every description of crime prevailed to a large extent and increased the convictions. He believed that drunkenness in Ireland was not on the increase; but on the decrease, and the Judges on circuit made a great mistake in speaking of the increase of drunkenness. They were probably led into this error by the Returns of the County Inspectors. Formerly, up to 1874, a man taken before a magistrate for drunkenness was fined 6*d.* and dismissed, and no record was kept; but by the Act of 1874, a summons was required, and so every case was recorded.

Mr. O'Leary

On the other side, Mr. Baron Downes Trim congratulated the Grand Jury on the great decrease of drunkenness, and the learned Judge at Cork said that a district in Ireland was freer from crime than the West Riding of York. To show that drunkenness in Ireland was not increasing he would take the last Return with reference to the number of gallons of spirits drunk in a year in the Three Kingdoms. In England the number of gallons was 16,742,000, in Scotland it was 6,872,470, and in Ireland 6,490,000; so that there was more drinking in Scotland than in Ireland by 381,000 gallons, although the population of Ireland was nearly 2,000,000 more than that of Scotland. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Drogheda that the greatest amount of drinking took place on Saturday evenings, and he should certainly prefer to see a Bill brought in to close at 7 o'clock on Saturday evenings than that the public-houses should be closed entirely on Sundays. He thought the houses should be opened at least two hours on Sunday afternoons, as it would be very hard to deprive persons who went out for enjoyment in the country from getting a reasonable amount of refreshment. He would support the second reading of the Bill; but if an Amendment for early closing on Saturdays were proposed, he did not say that it would not receive his support.

MR. O'CLERY considered the argument that Sunday closing would produce disorder was utterly groundless. Twenty years ago the county of Wexford, which he had the honour to represent, undertook voluntarily to close all public-houses on Sundays, and he could assure the House that it was now more anxious that Sunday closing should be continued than it was in the first year. So far from violence and disorder being the natural outcome of that system, he could fearlessly assert that there was no county in Ireland which could show a better record of good order or respect for law in every sense than Wexford. The clergy of all denominations were in favour of this measure, and it might fairly be assumed that they were better judges of what was provocative of violence and disorder and more to be relied upon than the haphazard assertions of newspapers and magistrates with regard to the town of Enniscorthy.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he took a very deep interest in this question, and had urged upon the Prime Minister, as one of a deputation last year, the importance of the Bill being carried in deference to what might be called the almost universal wish of the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman did not assent to the measure as one for total closing on Sundays, and refused to accept the measure in that shape. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) afterwards suggested to the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the objections to the Bill might be met by allowing the public-houses to be open from 1 to 3 o'clock in the afternoon, which would permit those who required it to obtain all necessary refreshment, and prevent those who were inclined to indulge in evening drinking from doing so, and thus to a large extent, if not wholly, get rid of the evil at which the Bill was aimed. He found, however, that that proposal did not receive the approval of those who had charge of the measure, and therefore he decided on giving his unhesitating and entire support to the Bill as it stood. He had heard with much gratification the declaration of the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the Government would not oppose the Bill, and he trusted that if a division took place many of its Members would be found in the Lobby with those Members who supported it. It would be unwise and unseemly on his part to detain the House at that late period of the debate by any remarks on the general question. He would only say that after the lengthened discussion which had taken place, and after listening attentively to the speeches of those hon. Members who had opposed the Bill, his sentiments and convictions on the subject were not in the least shaken, and he should give his vote in favour of the expediency of passing this Bill as a response to the voice of the people of Ireland. Much had been said about the operation of a similar Act in Scotland, and upon that point widely different statements had been made. All he would say was that in legislating for Ireland they had different circumstances, and if they were convinced that in that country the measure would be beneficial, they ought to pass it without reference to the consequences which might have been experienced elsewhere. All the working men in Ireland to whom he had spoken on the subject had expressed themselves strongly as to the many evils which attached to the opening of public-houses for drinking on Sundays, and in their interest he hoped the House would agree to the Bill.

MR. YEAMAN said, as one of the Members for Dundee he could only say, in reply to the statement of the hon. Member for Drogheda (Mr. O'Leary), that he thought "Mother Stewart" was rather inaccurate in her facts, inasmuch as there was no "bridge" at Dundee. A railway bridge was in course of construction, which was expected to be completed in a year and a-half from this time; and there were two ferry-boats, which sailed every half-hour or hour, carrying large numbers of passengers: and he had never heard of such general intoxication about the streets as that alleged. As to the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland, under which public-houses were all shut on Sunday, he had had experience during a great many years—not less than nine or ten years—as a member of the General Licensing Board of Dundee, which had a population of 140,000 people, and he had never known any one complain of the operation of that Act. Everybody was pleased with it, and he believed that if it were attempted to open again the public-houses on Sunday in Dundee the publicans themselves would be the first to throw opposition in the way of that being done. He could also testify to the fact that since the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act drunkenness had greatly decreased in Scotland. He was not going to speak of what the effect of such a law might be in the large English manufacturing towns, or in the large towns in Ireland; but from all he could learn, and judging from the unanimity which prevailed amongst the representatives from Ireland in that House, and amongst all classes in that country on the subject, he thought that this was a Bill which ought to be passed. He was very glad, therefore, to find that the Government had waived their opposition, and were willing to allow this Bill to proceed.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I have already addressed the House on this subject so lately and so fully that I do not now wish to address it at any length. I have thought over the Bill very carefully since the Resolution was passed on which it is founded, and the more I look into it I must say that I am not more friendly to it than I was before. I have spoken to very many people upon the subject, and I have not heard a single person say he was in favour of it. Reference has been made to the closing of public-houses in Scotland on Sundays. Whatever may have been the result there I would point out that there is a great difference between the two countries; and also that you cannot apply to the rural districts that which may possibly do for the towns. There are many Irish villages in which you will find only one or two public-houses, and I will venture to say that in most cases from Monday morning to Saturday they are left totally unused. The farmers and the peasants are engaged daily with their horses in ploughing the land and carrying on other farming work; they have no time to go to public-houses at night, and they do not do it. They put off their visits there till Sunday. [A laugh.] Well, that is the truth. In every village there is either a Roman Catholic church or a Protestant chapel, and the people go to these villages for the purposes of devotion. There is not a more religious people in the world than the Irish, and neither men nor women will absent themselves from church on Sundays. After their devotions they do not think it any sin to go to the public-house to meet their friends and neighbours and have a little refreshment—consisting generally of a glass of beer or porter. After that they go home without being in the slightest degree intoxicated. I know that from my own experience. I could swear to it, if necessary, upon oath. Hundreds, I might say thousands, thus meet for refreshment and neighbourly intercourse on the only day that is open to them. In the locality with which I am connected there is a little watering place—Tramore—about seven miles from Waterford. It is connected with Waterford by a railway, and the managers of the railway put on two pleasure excursion trains specially on Sundays to Tramore. By these trains hundreds, I may say thousands, every Sunday leave Waterford and other places in the neighbourhood to enjoy the open air and pleasant change, and am I to be told that when they arrive at Tramore they are to have no refreshment? It might be said that these persons were bond fide travellers, and would therefore be entitled to be served with refreshments. But what was to be done with the persons who served them? Why, if this wretched and abominable Bill passed it would turn everything topsy turvey. Instead of the people of Tramore entertaining their visitors, their visitors would have to entertain them. I never heard of such a thing before. When you are visited you must entertain your visitors, but all that is to be changed by this miserable Bill. But let us see how it will work in a different way. Last year about this time the weather was very wet. I had a great quantity of hay out, and I was apprehensive that I should lose it all through the rotting of the grass on the field. One Sunday came in bright and sunshiny. I went up to the field about 2 o'clock to have a look at the hay, and there to my surprise I found a lot of people turning my hay, making the most of the fine day, and before 8 o'clock it was all dried and turned up into tidy haycocks. My hay was saved by this timely help; but those people would not take any money reward. Was I to allow them to work from 2 to 8 o'clock without some acknowledgment? No. I sent to the nearest public-house for three barrels of porter, and very soon afterwards the contents disappeared, for the people were perspiring as freely as possible, so that the porter ran out of them as fast as it went in. Is there a man in this House who will get up and say that if he had been in my place he would not have done the same? If so, I can only say that I would have a very low opinion of him. Yet the provisions of this delightful Bill would have prevented my doing it. If this Bill passed, and your hay was in danger of rotting, and if the people who would not accept money could not have a little refreshment after saving it, they would say, "No thank you. Good evening to you." I cannot understand this Bill. You may drink as much as you like from Monday morning to Saturday night in public-houses, but it does not abolish drinking in private houses on Sundays; but on Saturday a man may buy as much as he pleases for Sunday. This was done in Scotland and assuredly would be done in Ireland. The effect would be to encourage the consumption of drink in people's own houses, and that with very undesirable results. At present only the head of the family enters a public-house on Sundays—the wife, if she does so, soon leaves; but if the houses are closed the drink will be carried home, and wife and children will thus acquire a liking for it, which, but for this wretched Bill, they never would have had. Another consequence is likely to follow, the increase of houses for the illicit sale of liquors; and so many of the most important social interests of the country are to be sacrificed to the crotchets of the men who bring forward such a measure as this. If English Members vote for it, they may rest assured that a similar Bill will be introduced for England—and I should like to see their treatment of it! Practically, however, this is a coercion Bill, brought forward by Irish Members to coerce their own countrymen. Irish Members—patriots who come from Ireland to denounce coercion which permits the seizure of arms not held by licence—have gone to the Government and asked for the abolition of those restrictions. The Government has told them they have very greatly reduced the amount of coercion, and hope in a short time to be able to do away with it altogether. Oh, say the patriots, if you do that we shall bring in our coercion Bill, imposing pains and penalties on a great mass of our own honest, orderly, and industrious fellow-countrymen, and we shall expect you to help us to pass it. As to the prevention of drinking, you must not think that there will not be plenty of opportunities of drinking if this Bill is passed—the people will get liquor on a Sunday from beer-houses of an illicit description. The mode of giving licences may be improved in favour of Sunday travellers. In my neighbourhood magistrates will not grant seven-days licences, but only six-days licences. I verily believe that the six-days licences sell more liquor than the holders of seven-days licences, because they distribute their liquor for Sunday consumption through houses which the police cannot enter. The natural consequence of the Bill will be that illicit drink-shops will be opened, the police will have to be employed to arrest persons frequenting them and the keepers, and the magistrates will have to punish the offenders, and a very disagreeable duty indeed it will be to the magistrates. I beseech English Members not to vote for this Bill, which if passed will, from East to West, from North to South, afflict Ireland with a canker of lawlessness, drunkenness, and debauchery.

MR. CALLAN opposed the Bill. He thought that what was required was a further limitation of hours and not a total closing on Sundays. As to the operation of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland, a Committee of that House referring to the scenes which took place on Sunday at Glasgow Green and at Dundee, stated that scenes of the greatest disorder occurred at those places—and this, too, in a country where Sunday drinking was prohibited. He had himself been in Glasgow on a Sunday, and the scenes of demoralization which he witnessed on the Green of the city were of the most disgraceful character, and fully justified the evidence given before the Committee of the House. If such was the effect of the closing of public-houses in Scotland, he should be sorry to see a principle of legislation adopted with respect to Ireland that might have the effect of leading to such results. Referring to the Petitions which had been presented in favour of the Sunday closing in Ireland, he observed that many of them were from the Wesleyan Body. Now, these very persons were the same petitioners who prayed the House to do away with convents and monasteries in England. It was not, therefore, very likely that the arguments of such petitioners could find much favour with the people of Ireland; and he might add that the Members representing the northern counties of Ireland who supported the measure were also the supporters of the proposal to close monastic institutions in this country. The Dublin Royal Society had also petitioned in favour of the Bill; but he could not help remembering the Society had a large grant from the Government; they had an excellent house, a fine library, and other accommodation, all of which was open on Sundays, and he certainly thought it was inconsistent on their part to support such a Bill as this. He hoped that his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry would give up his Bill for the present, or send it to a Select Committee, to consider the whole question involved in it, and that next year a new Bill should be introduced, in which permission given for public-houses populous part of the country, and the whole of the surrounding district which was not enumerated among the inhabitants contributed to the keeping up of the public-houses. The matter was therefore one for the judgment of the local authorities. The most objectionable portion of the Bill was that which put an end to grocers' licences. The effect of that would be seriously to increase the present monopoly of those grocers having licences—it would make their monopoly more valuable than it was at present. He did not see that there was any great evil in a householder sending to a grocer's shop for what drink was required for the family, for some drink might be required for medicinal purposes, and it would be a great hardship to compel a family to send a servant or one of the children to a public-house to obtain a small amount of alcohol. It was proposed to restrict the sale of drink in grocers' shops to a quart bottle; and he (Mr. Anderson) thought it should be restricted to a bottle of some kind, but that a quart bottle was out of the question. He thought there ought to be no selling from the tap in grocers' shops. The clause dealing with that point was the only tolerable clause in the Bill. There was another clause putting a stop to table beer licences, but that provision was contained in a Bill which passed in the course of the present Session, and therefore it was unnecessary. There was therefore only one clause which was good, and that was unnecessary. Another clause had a certain amount of good in it, but not enough to induce him to vote for the second reading of the Bill. The other clauses were entirely wrong, and he must therefore vote against the second reading.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE thought the provisions of the Bill were not such as any reasonable man could object to, though he did not think the House would adopt all of them. It would, in his opinion, be exceedingly difficult to fix a rule as to the number of public-houses in proportion to the population, because the needs of different localities very greatly varied. He himself once brought in a Bill based on the same lines as the present; but the figures he adduced might be refuted by dexterous manipulation so that he could not stand on that ground any longer. With regard to grocers' licences, there was a unanimous opinion on the part of the county magistrates and licensing committees of quarter sessions in England that a great evil had accrued to the community in consequence of the grocers' licences. In these days we could not interfere with any vested interests, but a stop ought at all events to be put to an increase in the number of these licences. With reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) he might remark that to multiply the number of grocers' licences would increase the strength of the monopoly. He thought some of the clauses good, and hoped the House would give the Bill a second reading.

MR. MARTEN rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. In the first place, he objected to the Preamble, and proposed to show that the principle on which it was founded was one which this House ought not to adopt without much further consideration. In the second place, it was not expected that the Bill would pass in the present Session, and he objected to a solemn declaration of a principle which it was not intended to carry into action. In the next place, the Bill did not embody any final or conclusive proposal, but only professed to be a temporary measure. Again, if the Bill related exclusively to Scotland, he should have felt great diffidence in making observations respecting it, especially if the Scotch Members were generally agreed on the principle. But in reality the Preamble was of a general character. It bound the House to contemplate further legislation, and to accept the principle of this particular Bill until some further legislation should be introduced which would deal with the law as to the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors. If there were some particular Amendment to be introduced which the House was satisfied was an expedient thing to be carried on its own merits, without regard to further legislation, then let a Bill founded on a preamble reciting the grievance or particular point of law to be amended be introduced into the House. But they ought not at that time, on a subject which created the greatest difficulty throughout the country, to pass a Bill founded expressly not on the idea of making the present proposal of a final character, but of encouraging it. Therefore he objected to the principle on which the Bill was founded, according to the recital of the Preamble. Besides, the Bill would introduce into our law a new principle which was open to the greatest possible objection—in fact, it was only another form of the Permissive Bill, for by two clauses of this Bill the popular vote was introduced. There was to be an application approved of by a majority of the persons rated towards the relief of the poor within 500 yards of the House which was to be licensed; and a similar approval had to be expressed in the case of a transfer of a licence. What was this but the principle of the Permissive Bill? The House had already repeatedly refused to recognize the principle of the Permissive Bill, which this measure involved, and he protested against the introduction of the principle in one part of the United Kingdom in a measure of a fragmentary character such as this, when Parliament had declined to apply such a principle to other parts of the country. With regard to that portion of the Bill which provided that persons living within 500 yards of a particular point should have a right to stop a particular trade in that locality, he could not see that any sufficient ground had been stated for such a proposal. Why should the immediate neighbourhood be invested with that power?—a power practically of saying whether this or that trade should be carried on in a particular locality. Why should one trade be subjected to such a restriction any more than other trades? There were many other trades which were equally or more obnoxious. There were slaughter-houses, chemical works, and other works or trades which were extremely obnoxious to many persons living in their neighbourhood; and why should not the same restriction apply to these? He denied entirely that the neighbours were the persons who ought to decide a question of this nature. The proposal with regard to investing immediate neighbours with such a power was founded on an entirely false principle. Then with respect to the proposal to limit the number of public-houses to any particular figure, that was founded on the idea that the more public-houses we had the greater would be the extent of drunkenness. He believed that the was exactly the reverse, and that number of public-houses tended rather to decrease drunkenness. When there was a number of small public-houses there was this probability—that in going to the one which was in his immediate neighbourhood, a man would in a measure be under the eye of his neighbours and acquaintances, and under the eye of his own family; whereas if a system of centralization were carried out, we should have huge gin palaces set up, where he would probably go and spend a much longer time and indulge in more drink. He therefore objected to this proposal to establish huge gin palaces in place of what might be looked upon as small clubs. With regard to the argument as to the number of public-houses increasing the amount of drunkenness, he had obtained statistics which showed, he maintained, that the effect was rather the reverse. In the case of Cambridgeshire, the number of public-houses was in the proportion of 1 to 110 of the population, and yet that county stood nearly at the head of the list in respect of sobriety. In Huntingdonshire, the number of public-houses was in the proportion of 1 to 104 of the population, and yet the number of cases of drunkenness there was only at the rate of 1 in every 749 of the population. On the other hand, the number of public-houses in Durham was 1 to 211 of the population, yet Durham stood nearly at the head of the list in respect of drunkenness. It was shown, therefore, conclusively that the number of public-houses tended rather to the decrease of drunkenness than otherwise. That being so, he denied that the principle upon which Clause 3 of the Bill rested was one which could be sustained. With respect to grocers' licences—a subject about which there had been a good deal of agitation in the country—all would agree as to the desirability of checking drunkenness as far as possible, but we differed as to the means of attaining that object, and he did not approve of this proposal regarding grocers' licences as one of those means. The existence of grocers' licences was at the present moment the one good thing which secured to us the supply of moderately good liquor. He believed that the publicans sympathized with the desire to take away the grocers' licences, because it would to that extent affect their profits. The grocers were placed between two fires—the publicans on the one hand, who desired the sale of liquors in their own hands, and on the other hand those who desired to stop the sale of liquor altogether. But he trusted that the House would not assent to the proposal of either party. As to the matter of restricting the quantity which grocers might sell to a quart bottle, while he did not agree as to the quantity, he objected that any rule should be introduced on the subject for one part of the country which did not apply to another. On these grounds, and considering the Bill was based on a pernicious principle, he moved the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Alfred Marten.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. M'LAREN said, he had seldom heard a speech in that House which contained so many fallacies as did the speech delivered by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Marten). There was one thing which must have occurred to every hon. Member who had listened to that speech, and that was, that every illustration in regard to a Bill specially applicable to Scotland was drawn by the hon. and learned Gentleman from England, and England alone. Here was a Bill introduced for the purpose of remedying evils which existed in Scotland, and the only proofs which the House was asked to consider in opposition to it were drawn from Cambridgeshire and the neighbouring counties. The observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman showed clearly that he did not know very much about England in regard to the matter of public-house licences; for, with respect to the limitation of the quantity of spirits which a grocer might sell to a quart bottle, he had remarked that it would be desirable that any legislation on that matter should be uniform for the whole of the United Kingdom. Now, with that remark he (Mr. M'Laren) entirely agreed; but the fact was that it was for the purpose of securing uniform legislation for the United Kingdom that this clause was introduced into the Bill. The law in England—although the hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to be ignorant of the fact—was that no person could sell less than a quart, and therefore it was not unreasonable that Scotland should come to Parliament and ask to be put on the same footing in that respect with England. It had been urged that the principle of restricting the number of new licences to 1 in 500 of the population was a new one, and hon. Members had spoken as if such an idea had never before been broached; but it was within his (Mr. M'Laren's) own memory that the Secretary of State for the Home Department under the last Government did himself bring forward a Bill of the same nature, only of a more stringent character than the present measure. Whilst the present Bill required that there should be only 1 public-house for every 500 of the population, or for every 100 families of five persons on an average, the Bill of Lord Aberdare proposed that there should be only 1 to every 1,000 of the population, or for every 200 families of five persons each. The present Bill therefore provided for double the number of public-houses which were provided for by Lord Aberdare's Bill, the official organ of the late Government; and yet the present measure was held up to the House as if it was something new in the history of legislation. Then we were told that the diminution of public-houses would lead to the erection of huge gin shops. Why, that was the case already. If the hon. and learned Gentleman had been acquainted with the state of matters in the large towns in Scotland, he would have known that those large gin palaces already abounded there, and that there was no tendency to their being diminished in number. In dealing with this subject it ought to be kept in mind that the people of Scotland knew their own interest. They knew that by this Bill they would benefit themselves without doing injury to any other part of the country, and the records of the House showed that it was a measure in favour of which an immense number of Petitions had been presented. The feeling in Scotland was undoubtedly to a large extent in favour of it. The measure, however, had been objected to on various grounds, and amongst others that it was simply a "Permissive Bill" a little disguised; but anyone who knew Scotland, and how the measure was likely to operate, must know that such was not its nature. The Permissive Bill had been described as implying the total extinction of public-houses, but to attribute that object to this Bill, and call it by such a name, seemed to him a strange infatuation. There were many streets and squares in every large town in Scotland where the houses were all private residences, and where there was not a public-house or place of business of any kind; and it had been found that a particular party, having secured a house in one of these streets, thought it advantageous to himself to convert it into a public-house. He got a licence, and made a bargain with his tenant whereby he was enabled to receive perhaps double the rent he would otherwise do for the house as a private residence. The consequence was that whilst the house which thus obtained a licence was greatly enhanced in value, the value of the properties adjacent were greatly deteriorated. He had in his eye a case where, of two or three houses next to the one which had been thus dealt with, one was unlet for a year, whilst the second and third from it were greatly reduced in rent. The contiguous properties were, in fact, all materially injured by such public-houses. He asked hon. Members who chose to consider this Bill in a fair spirit whether if some 50 proprietors agreed to erect houses of the same class in the same street, without any provision whatever in regard to public-houses, it was right that their property should be thus injured by one of these men turning his residence into a public-house? Persons in the large towns in Scotland objected to having private residences next to public-houses, and would only lease such residences at a reduced rent. That was the explanation of the provision, that no new licence should be granted, unless the majority of the inhabitants within 500 yards of the proposed public-house were favourable to its establishment, and it was not only defensible, but it was an admirable provision, which ought to commend itself to every hon. Member of the House. In conclusion, he would not detain the House any longer, lest the measure might be talked out; and he wished only to say, that whilst he did not approve of everything which appeared in the Bill, and would be content to see it amended in some respects in Committee, he thought that the principle of the measure ought so far to be affirmed as that it should be read a second time.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON did not like to allow the discussion on the Bill to close without saying a few words expressive of his own opinions only. There were some clauses of the Bill to which he gave a hearty assent; but, on the other hand, there were certain provisions in it to which in that House he had always given opposition. The first operative clause of the Bill was the 3rd, which proposed to deal with the limitation of houses by population, and he ventured to think, and had always thought, that that was a mode of dealing with this question which was eminently unsatisfactory, and which if acted on would tend rather to set up an increased number of public-houses. Clause 4 proposed to deal with a question to which he had given his assent, though not in the way or to the extent provided for by this clause. On former occasions when the subject was under discussion, he had said it would be wise and tend very much to promote what they had all at heart—namely, the diminution of the drunkenness which existed in the country—if the sale of spirits were taken away from grocers. Whilst he was not prepared to say that the power which they had of selling wine and beer in bottles was detrimental, he did maintain that, with regard to the sale of spirits, Parliament had introduced a system which had acted prejudicially, and had increased the drinking of spirits throughout the country. So far, then, as this clause would do away with the future granting of licences for the sale of spirits to grocers throughout the country, it would have his own hearty support. With another clause which dealt also with the sale of spirits by grocers in Scotland he equally agreed, and that was the clause which limited the sale to closed vessels. He was aware that the law of Scotland allowed spirits to be sold by the glass, and he thought that such a privilege encouraged drinking. He, therefore, if grocers were to continue to sell spirits at all, wished to see their licences assimilated to the law of England in that country. With regard to another proposal which had been commented on—namely, the power of removing licences—he would remind the House that such a power was granted under the English Licensing Act to the magistrates, and he believed that the power had been most usefully exercised in reducing the number of public-houses in over-crowded districts. But he confessed that he did not agree with the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken (Mr. M'Laren) in his appreciation of the latter part of that clause, in which power was given to the ratepayers by a majority to object to the introduction of a public-house into their district. He would prefer to leave the law as it was at present, with the power that existed for insuring the owners of the property against the introduction of licensed houses into their neighbourhood if they chose to exercise it, rather than introduce the principle to which he had already objected, that any majority of the ratepayers might decide in this particular trade, and not in any other trade, as to whether it should be carried on in their district. There was only one other clause to which he need make any reference, and that he thought the House would do well to assent to—namely, the abolition of the table beer licences. If he could persuade his hon. Friend the Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple) to withdraw his Bill on the present occasion, and consider the subject carefully before another Session, he would infinitely prefer that to the House giving what he thought would be an undecided vote upon a measure which would require a great deal if not material amendment before it became law.

MR. MARK STEWART said, although he should support the second reading, he must join the hon. Baronet in asking the hon. Member to withdraw the Bill in order that it might be more thoroughly considered during the Recess, and when they might approach the subject enlightened by that debate, and to bring in a better Bill next Session. They all knew that it would be practically impossible to carry this Bill in the present Session if anything like opposition was shown to it. At the same time, he must say that the introduction of this measure had given great satisfaction to most of the people with whom he had come in contact in Scotland, and there was a very keen interest felt amongst a large number of constituencies respecting it. They did not believe that the Bill could in its present shape become law, but they saw in it the germs of legislation which was capable of doing good service. He rather shared the view of those who thought the promoters of this Bill had not fully matured this subject in their own minds, and that was an additional reason why it should not be pushed forward in the present Session. Although he was not one of those who believed that they could make people sober altogether by Act of Parliament, still there were statistics which proved that owing to a diminution of public-houses in certain districts there had been a great reduction of intemperance, and he thought that if some such scheme as the Bill embodied were laid before the House, with the authority of the Government, it would be very popular in Scotland, would attain the object of temperance reformers, and would certainly stay the agitation for the Permissive Bill. With regard to the grocers question, he conceived that there were some difficulties about that matter which had not been laid before the House at all. It was well known that in large centres, such as Edinburgh, there were grocers who were in the position of large wine merchants as well; and to withdraw the licences from such persons might be a matter of very great pecuniary hardship; but, at the same time, his experience told him that the feeling in Scotland was favourable to dealing with grocers' licences in the way proposed by the Bill. He need not tell the House that the feelings of the Presbyterian and other Churches of Scotland were in favour of the Bill; and if it were postponed until next Session and amended in some respects, it would have a better chance of being passed into law than at present.

COLONEL MURE said, that sometimes when he listened to the terrible pictures which were drawn of the evils that resulted from drink in this country, he wondered that more people did not vote for the Permissive Bill, even although he did not vote for it himself. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten) had spoken upon this measure without seeming, as far as he could make out, to have been much in Scotland, or to have obtained much information about that country. If the hon. and learned Member had been much in Scotland, he would at least have found out one thing, and that was, that the drinking habits of the people of Scotland—more particularly of those in large towns—were not only the source of most of the crime which existed in that country, but also that they were every day producing a feeling of disgust amongst the respectable inhabitants. It was those drunken inhabitants who every year not only increased taxation, but caused an immense amount of suffering amongst women and children, and brought the people face to face with the agitation in connection with the Permissive Bill. Putting aside the enormous advantage it would be if they could get rid of the crime and suffering caused by drink, he thought that it would be a great advantage in itself if, by passing any measure of this kind, they could get rid of the agitation which otherwise would arise every year in regard to the Permissive Bill. For himself, he was convinced that the drinking habits of the people of Scotland were a great deal worse than those of the people of England. ["Oh, oh!"] In the neighbourhood of Glasgow a very strong agitation arose last year in consequence of the enormous number of licences that had been granted; and in connection with this very Bill he had had repeated representations made to him of the gross abuses attributed to the Justices in granting so many licences in that vicinity. It was unquestionably the case that if they had fewer public-houses in a place in proportion to the population they would make the exercise of police supervision much easier. He believed, moreover, that where they had a vast number of small public-houses in a district, the effect was to reduce the quality of the liquor sold. He was very glad to find that his hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) at least agreed with some parts of the Bill; and he believed that if they were to go to a division and were beaten, his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate would feel bound after the expressions that had fallen from the hon. Gentleman to bring in a Bill next Session.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I would remind my hon. Friend that I said I spoke my own views entirely.

COLONEL MURE said, he was glad, at all events, to have one Member of the Government who recognized the evils that existed in Scotland, and was anxious to do something to mitigate them. With regard to the power of removal of licences, all they wanted was to have that power made exactly the same as it existed in England. But there was one remark which fell from the hon. Baronet which he should like to allude to for one moment. He said that the ratepayers at the present time had it in their power to reduce the number of licences. That was perfectly true—the ratepayers in burghs in Scotland had the power, if they were only to exercise it, of reducing the number of public-houses. At present the bailies were elected by the ratepayers, and the magistrates were chosen from amongst the bailies; but every time that the election of the bailies took place in Scotland what happened? The liquor question was introduced, and how did the majority vote? they voted in the interest of the licensed victuallers. And as long as that condition of things existed, he was convinced that if the House were to pass the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) to-morrow the effect would be in a great number of places exactly the contrary to what he expected.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE was glad that an hon. Member for a Scotch constituency had had the courage to tell the truth. In spite of the Forbes-Mackenzie Acts and other Acts passed with reference to Scotland, drinking in that country was greater now than it was previous to their being passed. He was himself opposed to all this kind of legislation, as he did not believe that they could improve the social habits of the people by Act of Parliament. With regard to this particular Bill, he objected to it in toto.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he rose for the purpose of asking the Lord Advocate what the mind of the Government was on this measure. They had heard a speech from the hon. Member for Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), but the hon. Gentleman disclaimed having spoken at all in any Governmental or authoritative way, and it would be only respectful to those whose names were on the back of the Bill, as well as to a strong party in Scotland who were supporting it, if some sort of announcement were made from the front bench as to the course which the Government proposed to take.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the question involved in the Bill had not been considered maturely by the Government. He could only say that they gave their cordial support to the Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Glasgow regulating the granting of licences. That Bill had passed into an Act, but there had been no time yet to ascertain what would be the effect of it. He believed that it would effect a very considerable improvement in matters connected with public-houses in Scotland, and the Government gave their support to the Bill on that understanding. The present Bill contained several propositions, which had been supported by most of the hon. Gentlemen who had addressed the House. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) who took a great interest in this question, had expressed his opinion rather against the clauses which were contained in the first portion of the Bill as to determining the number of licences which should be granted with reference to population. He (the Lord Advocate) did not know any person who was better entitled to express an opinion on the matter than his hon. Friend, because, as he said himself, he had originally entertained a different opinion, but he came, after due consideration, to the conclusion that no good result would ensue from these clauses. The question was obviously one which required great consideration with reference to the interests of England and Ireland, it might be, as well as of Scotland. With reference to the way in which the Bill dealt with grocers' licences, he thought that the grocers were placed in a very peculiar position at present, for they were opposed to two rival interests—that was to say, those who were proposing to get rid of their licences in the interest of temperance or teetotalism, and those who were trying to get rid of their licences for the purpose of enlarging the public-house interest. He thought, upon the whole, that the measure had not received that amount of consideration which it ought to receive, and the safe course would be for the hon. Gentleman who had moved the second reading to consent to the withdrawal of the Bill to enable further time to be given for its consideration. If the hon. Member did not take that course, he must express his own individual opinion that the Bill should be read a second time on that day two months.

MR. DALRYMPLE intimated his intention to take a division on the Motion for the second reading.

MR. ORR EWING rose, and was addressing the House, when—

The Lord Advocate

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock the Debate stood journeyed till To-morrow.

METROPOLIS GAS (SURREY SIDE) BILL

Bill read a second time, and committed Select Committee of Five Members, Three nominated by the House, and Two to be nominated by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions presented against the Bill be referred to the Select Committee of Five Members, provided such Petitions are presented one clear day before the meeting of the Committee; and that such of the Petitioners as to be heard, by themselves, their Counsel Agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against the said Petitions:—That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records:—That Three be the quorum.—Charles Adderley.)

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT—

EXTRA PAY.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to a paragraph headed "Inland Revenue," in the "Civilian" newspaper of the date of the 26th of June 1876, where it is stated that two clerks were allowed to leave the Inland Revenue Office, one for eight months and the other for something less, to serve in the Board of Trade Department or with the Privy Council; whether it be correct, as it is there stated, that during the whole of the time they were with the Board of Trade or the Privy Council they were in receipt of twelve shillings per day, besides their ordinary pay in the Inland Revenue Department; and, if it be customary when an officer may be required in one Department from another, that he or they receive pay for both offices, as if he or they did the work of both?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have made inquiries into the case, and I believe that the transaction referred to took place about 10 years ago. In 1866 there was a great and sudden outbreak of cattle plague, and, the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council being under-manned, an application was made to the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue for some assistance. He lent the services of two gentlemen, one of whom, Mr. Wingrove, who has been dead, I believe, for four years, was employed for eight months. His services were very valuable, giving a great deal of time to the work, and often, I believe, working into the night; and at the expiration of the eight months he was rewarded with £240, which was considered a proper remuneration for the amount of work he had done, taking into consideration, of course, the fact that he was an officer in the public service. As to the other gentleman, who was said to have served for "something less" than eight months, he did, in fact, serve for a fortnight, and he received for such service £5.

MR. MACDONALD said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the latter part of the Question, which he should therefore repeat to-morrow—whether when officers were transferred from one Department to another it was usual to pay them as if they were doing the work of both?

INLAND REVENUE—ARMORIAL BEARINGS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been directed to the report of a decision recently given in the Vice Chancellor's Court at Oxford, upon the complaint of an Inland Revenue officer, under which two undergraduates (not paying armorial duty) were fined £5 each for the offence of wearing rowing caps decorated with their college crest; and, whether, if the report prove true, such an administration of our fiscal law may not advantageously be restrained?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I believe that a fine was inflicted upon two gentlemen under these circumstances, and this fine, originally £5, was reduced to 30s., the tax being 21s. There is a great deal of difficulty in determining what is and what is not properly chargeable as armorial bearings, and it is held that the fact of their being placed upon the cap does not make them less liable to duty than if they were upon a ring or elsewhere. These matters, however, have in a great measure to be dealt with on discretion, and I am not at all sure that the wearing of College arms in the cap was contemplated when the tax was imposed.

NAVY—ROYAL MARINE LIGHT INFANTRY.—QUESTION.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD (for Mr. GORST) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether a Circular has been addressed to about 700 qualified candidates for the Army Entrance Examination now in progress, inviting them to exchange their chance of success in that examination for a Commission in the Royal Marine Light Infantry; whether the inducements to volunteer for the Marines held out by this Circular are—an immediate appointment, exemption from any probationary course of study, and the postponement of the obligation to pass the Special Army Examination until promotion to the rank of Captain, a period of more than twenty years; how many of the Candidates for Commissions in the Army have accepted this offer; and, whether the expedient has been prompted by the difficulty of obtaining Officers for the Royal Marines?

MR. HUNT: The hon. and learned Member for Chatham is quite mistaken so far as the first part of his Question is concerned, as no such Circular has been issued by the Admiralty. But they have notified that they offer a certain number of Marine Infantry commissions, in order of merit, to candidates who having been successful in the competition for the announced number of Army vacancies, prefer a commission in the Marines to one in the Line, or who, not having been so successful, are nevertheless, in the opinion of the Civil Service Commissioners, fully qualified for commissions in the Army. The inducement of an immediate appointment and exemption from any probationary course of study is equally held out to officers who are appointed to regiments in India and to West India regiments. Officers joining the Marine Infantry are, however afterwards required to go through what is termed "a garrison course" of study and instruction, and the usual examinations before promotion to the rank of captain. The number of candidates for commissions in the Army who have accepted the offer cannot be ascertained until after the examination is over. At the Army examination last January, when the same course was adapted, 18 candidates stated their preference for the Marines over the Line. Of these, four passed with a sufficient number of marks to have received an Army commission, but two, being over age for the Marines, were not appointed. Fifteen commissions were given altogether to candidates obtained in this way. The present arrangement has been adopted in place of the old system of nomination, as offering a wider and better field from which officers may be obtained, the abolition of Purchase in the Army having diminished the number of applicants for Marine commissions.

POST OFFICE—MAILS TO THE UNITED STATES.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the Postmaster General, If arrangements have been made for conveying the Mails between this Country and North America; and, if he can state to the House what is the nature of them?

Mr. Macdonald

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, no arrangements had yet been made for conveying the mails between this country and the United States after the present contracts had expired. It was not intended, as he thought the right hon. Gentleman knew, to enter into any new contracts, but to send the mails by the most efficient vessels sailing to New York. The existing contracts did not terminate until the end of the year—six months hence.

METROPOLIS—THAMES EMBANKMENT —HIGH TIDES.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE asked the honourable and gallant Member for Truro, If steps have been or are about to be taken by the Metropolitan Board of Works to prevent a recurrence of the serious losses occasioned to the inhabitants of the borough of Southwark by the periodical inundation of the River Thames?

SIR JAMES HOGG: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I beg to state that the Metropolitan Board of Works some months ago prepared a Bill to submit to Parliament, with a view, as far as practicable, to prevent inundations of the Thames. The Bill had to be much considered with regard to the general legislation of the country, as well as to the rights and obligations of owners of properties, and extremely opposite views were taken as to the mode of dealing with the question. These difficulties have caused such delay that it would be hopeless to attempt to proceed with any Bill in the present Session; but the Board will still continue to give attention to the subject, and I trust that some effectual means may be found of remedying the evils complained of.

INDIA—THE KIRWEE BOOTY.

QUESTION.

THE LORD MAYOR (Mr. Alderman COTTON) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he would explain to the House why the Return (recently presented to Parliament, No. 213,) of property owned by the Ex-Chiefs of Kirwee is limited in title and contents to the undisputed and admittedly captured property, instead of supplying a full inventory, in compliance with the express terms of the Order of the House of Commons dated 24th July 1874, of the proceeds of all movable property of those Princes acquired by the local Government; why several items which are included in the earlier inventories of the Viceroy of India, consisting of debts, Nos. 181 and 182, due by the East India Company (Parliamentary Return, No. 298, of Session 1869, page 15), and payments by private debtors and proceeds of jewels (ibid. pages 48 and 49) are omitted in the account of the enemy's assets; when this Return, which was acknowledged by the Under Secretary of State for India to be incomplete, will be made complete so as to satisfy the whole requirements of the Parliamentary Order; and, whether there is any objection to produce Copies of all Correspondence subsequently to the 1st July 1875 to the present date on the subject of the Kirwee Booty, now on record at the India Office, and not included in any other Parliamentary Return?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The Return alluded to gives all the information required by the Order of the House of the 24th of June, 1871, and if my right hon. Friend will read from pages 48 to 52 of the Return he will there find reasons stated why the items enumerated by him are not comprised by the terms of the present Return. I never stated this Return to be incomplete. In March, 1875, in reply to a Question, I said we had not then received information necessary to fulfil the Order of this Return. In May, 1876, the Return was laid upon the Table of the House; and, taken with other previous Returns, it gives the fullest and most complete information concerning the whole of the property owned by the ex-Chiefs of Kirwee. I have no objection to give any Correspondence not published between the Secretary of State and the prize agents.

PRISONS BILL — ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to his statement to a deputation that, in the event of the Prisons Bill being passed, the appointment of Chaplains cannot be left to the visiting justices or the magistrates, Whether he has received any communication as to the conduct of Roman Catholic chaplains in Government or other prisons affecting the discipline thereof and subscription to the rules prescribed for and accepted by Presbyterian or Anglican chaplains; and, if so, whether he will lay the same upon the Table of the House?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I thought the best way to obtain information on the subject of the hon. Gentleman's Question would be to send a copy of it to Colonel Du Cane, Director of Convict Prisons, and his answer is that no such communication, to his knowledge, has been received with regard to metropolitan prisons. With respect to county and borough prisons, I thought the best way would be to send the hon. Member's Question to the able head of the Prisons department at the Home Office, and he says—

"A search through the register would be attended with so much difficulty and loss of time that it has not been attempted; but, to the best of my knowledge, no such communication relative to the conduct of Roman Catholic prison chaplains, as the hon. Member refers to, has been received at the Home Office."

POST OFFICE—HOUSE OF COMMONS. QUESTION.

SIR HENRY PEEK asked the Postmaster General, Whether, in view of the fact that a large proportion of Members' correspondence is on the public service in connection with their constituencies, he will consider whether the penny extra payable on letters handed in between 7 and 7.30 p.m. to go from the House of Commons Post Office by the same night's mails might not be discontinued; and, whether he can inform the House how much the extra pence amount to per Session?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The extra penny payable on letters between 7 and 7.30 p.m. is not intended for revenue purposes, but to secure the posting of letters in proper time for transmission by the mails. If there were no such extra charge the great bulk of the letters would be posted close upon half-past 7, and then it would be hardly possible to despatch the mails from St. Martin's-le-Grand in proper time. As to the last part of the Question, no account was taken of the number of extra-pence letters.

Mr. Whalley

EDUCATION—GOVERNMENT INSPECTORS AND SECONDARY SCHOOLS. QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Education Department permits Government Inspectors of Schools to undertake for fees the examination of secondary schools, public or private, unconnected with their districts?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The Department does not object to a Government Inspector of Schools undertaking for fees the examination of secondary schools, public or private, unconnected with his district, provided that such examinations are conducted by the Inspector in his private capacity, and do not interfere with or impede his official duties.

ARMY (INDIA)—ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to increased pay of Roman Catholic Chaplains in the Indian Army, Whether it is not the fact that many of them are not English, and cannot even speak English; whether the Duke of Argyll has pointed out the broad distinction between the position of the Clergy of the Churches of England and Scotland and of the Priests of the Church of Rome in India, the former being bound to obey the orders of the Government, and the latter only the orders of their spiritual superiors; and, whether any provision has been made in conceding an increase in pay of £8,570 a-year for insuring discipline and loyalty on the part of Roman Catholic Chaplains?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I cannot state with absolute certainty whether all the chaplains employed in the Indian Army are Englishmen or not. My impression is that a certain number of them are not, and that some of them speak English badly, or not at all. The quotation from the letter of the Duke of Argyll is correct. The increase to these chaplains' pay was made in consequence of their satisfactory conduct in the past, and the Indian Government have no reason for believing that they will behave differently in the future.

LOCAL TAXATION—QUEENBOROUGH.
QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the President of the Local Government Board, To explain the cause of the omission from the returns of local taxation of the accounts of Queenborough, and, now that the Queenborough Harbour Bill has passed, whether the arrear accounts will be called for; and, whether steps will be taken to enforce the rendering of the accounts in the future, and to subject the transactions relating to the rates, taxes, and expenses of Queenborough, including the additions under the new Harbour Bill, to a proper audit?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Queenborough is one of the old chartered corporations which did not come under the Municipal Reform Act. It was not required to keep annual accounts of local taxation. Under the Harbour Bill powers are given to levy certain dues and tolls, of which it will be necessary to render an annual account, as well as of the building fund. The Local Government Board has no power to call for statements of arrear accounts.

NAVY—CAPTAIN SULLIVAN.
QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he has made inquiry into the statement of Captain Sullivan that Mr. Penny was in private communication with a Lord of the Admiralty on the subject of the dispute with his Captain; if a communication on such a subject is not irregular sent otherwise than through his commanding officer, and if these letters were received previous to the decision being given; if it be true that Captain Sullivan's removal from his ship has entailed, in addition to other punishment, a loss of increased half-pay, as stated in "Broad Arrow" of 8th July; and, whether anything will now be done in deference to the large minority which supported the Motion of the honourable Member for Poole on Tuesday last? The hon. Member said he would not ask the right hon. Gentleman to commit himself on the last branch of the Question without consideration.

MR. HUNT: I have made inquiry, and find that two letters were addressed to Admiral Hornby by Mr. Penny. I saw them to-day for the first time, in consequence of the Question of the hon. Gentleman. The first was dated February 11, 1875, about five months before the Court of Inquiry. It had reference to the troubles prevailing on board the London, and contained, only very much shorter, pretty much the same statements as those in the official letter from Mr. Penny. It would have been better if Mr. Penny had not written that letter under the circumstances. But private letters are constantly passing between officers on service and members of the Board of Admiralty, and it is very desirable that that should be so. Therefore, it is difficult to draw exactly the line where letters should be written and where they should not. The other letter was written subsequently to his receiving notice that he was to be superseded. Admiral Hornby tells me that if the hon. Member wishes to see the two letters he will be most happy to show them to him if he will call at the Admiralty. With regard to the third part of the Question, if Captain Sullivan had remained his full time in command of the London he would, at the expiration of that time, have been entitled to a higher half-pay than that to which he is now entitled.

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the propriety of charging the revenues of India with either the whole or a part of the cost of erecting and maintaining a museum in London has been considered by the Secretary of State for India in Council; and, if any decision has been arrived at, whether there would be any objection to produce it, with the opinions (if any) recorded by Members of Council?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The question of erecting or maintaining a Museum in London from the revenues of India has not been by itself considered. Two years ago the want of space at the India Office forced us to consider how we could best house the Library and Museum, and the action of the Indian Council upon the matter is recorded; and if the hon. Gentleman considers it worth publication, I have no objection to give it, together with the opinions of Members of Council.

CHURCH BODIES (GIBRALTAR)—THE ORDINANCES.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Governor of Gibraltar has been instructed to withdraw the Ordinances for creating Anglican and Roman Catholic Church Bodies in that Colony, in accordance with the pledge given at the early part of the Session; and whether, if so, he will lay the Despatch giving him such instruction on the Table of the House?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, it would not be possible to produce the Despatch to which reference was made, for this reason—that no such Despatch had been written. Personal communications, however, had taken place between the Secretary of State and Lord Napier of Magdala, and it was fully understood that the ordinance to which reference was made would not be persevered with.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

[BILL 155.]

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 11th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 6 (Existing local authorities to have like powers with school boards of enforcing by bye-law attendance of children).

MR. MUNDELLA moved, in page 2, line 21, to leave out "if it is a borough the council," and insert "the local authority."

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY pointed out that the words "local authority" were already used to describe the authority which should put the Act in force. He had an Amendment on the Paper by which it was proposed, in urban districts other than boroughs, to give the power to the urban authority.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY then moved, in page 2, line 21, after "council," to insert "and if it is an urban district other than a borough, the urban authority."

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the Government had given much consideration to the question, which was not so simple as it seemed, except where the areas of civil parishes were conterminous with the areas of urban sanitary authorities; but if the matter were allowed to stand over until the Report, he would introduce a clause or an Amendment which would substantially carry out what appeared to be the general wish of the Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. KNOWLES said, he would refrain from repeating the considerations he had already urged as to the necessity of getting children to school everywhere; but to carry out the view he had put Amendments on the Paper, the effect of which would be to make it obligatory upon, instead of optional with, the local authorities to enforce compulsion. He moved, in page 2, line 21, after "council," to leave out "may, if they think fit," and insert "shall." The hon. Member was particular to press on the Committee that, while his object was to make it imperative on Town Councils and Local Boards to enforce compulsion, Guardians would still require to be set in motion by requisition, as proposed by the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 21, to leave out the words "may, if they think fit."—(Mr. Knowles.)

VISCOUNT SANDON remarked that this was a large change to propose, because it made it obligatory upon the Town Councils and Boards of Guardians to make compulsory bye-laws.

MR. KNOWLES: Only when they are requested to do so. The words "on the requisition of the parish" would remain in the clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped that the Committee would consider the exact wording of the clause with regard to Town Councils before they dealt with the parishes.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member for Wigan could not at present propose to insert the word "shall," and his Amendment, therefore, was to leave out the words "if they think fit."

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed that the Amendment raised three questions—first, whether it was obligatory on the Town Councils to have bye-laws; secondly, whether it was obligatory upon the Guardians to have bye-laws on the requisition of the parish; and, thirdly, whether it was obligatory on the Guardians to have bye-laws without the requisition of the parish, and therefore it was better to consider the Amendment on the separate grounds to which he had referred.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, it was the intention and wish of the Government to follow exactly the procedure and arrangements of the Act of 1870. If the Town Councils asked for compulsory bye-laws they might have them, but they were not obliged to have them. The Government wished to follow the same analogy with regard to parishes which could only have a school board by a popular vote. Thus, if either Town Councils or Boards of Guardians wished to have compulsory bye-laws, they might have them, but need not have them unless they so desired. It was the intention of the Government to adhere to that arrangement, and to leave it to the local authorities to decide whether they would or would not have compulsory bye-laws.

MR. A. BROWN hoped that the Amendment would be adopted.

MR. ONSLOW hoped that the Government would abide by the clause, because if the Amendment were adopted we should have universal school boards all over the country.

MR. HAMOND said, that while he had last Session moved the rejection of Mr. Dixon's Bill for compulsory school boards and compulsory attendance of children at school because he thought Parliament had no right to inflict on the ratepayers the establishment of school boards where there was no deficiency of school accommodation, yet he was quite willing to support a fair scheme by which the attendance of children at school should be secured in a greater ratio than had been secured under the Act of 1870. There was school accommodation for 3,146,000 children, whereas sufficient was required for 4,500,000. Again, the register contained the names of 2,744,000, with an average attendance of 1,837,000 children, which was very unsatisfactory. He was quite in favour of some power being given to the local authorities where no school boards existed. By a previous clause it had been enacted that no children between the ages of 5 and 10 should go to work. What was to become of these children if their parents neglected to send them to school? He considered it most important that some compulsory powers should be given to the local authorities to insist on the children being educated, and therefore he had much pleasure in supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wigan.

MR. FAWCETT thought it a significant circumstance that this Amendment should have been moved by an hon. Member on the Conservative side and supported by two Members of the same Party. The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) had endeavoured to obscure the question by introducing the bugbear of universal school boards; but the Amendment would have the effect of preventing such a system from coming into operation. The only argument of any weight which had been used against the Amendment was that it went further than the Education Act of 1870, which only established permissive compulsion; but the country had made progress on that question since 1870, and if they were not now to advance beyond the provision of that Act, why was the present Bill brought in at all? The Amendment under discussion was rendered all the more necessary by the Amendment which the Vice President of the Council had accepted the other day on the suggestion of the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) relating to half-time. If stringent precautions were adopted against children between the ages of 5 and 10 being sent to work, it was most essential, in the interests of children, that equally effectual security should be taken for getting them between those same ages into the schools, otherwise they might be neither learning nor working, but only running about the streets. No man possessed more practical knowledge on the subject than the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Knowles), who came to that House fresh from his labours on the Factory Commission; and it was therefore to be hoped that hon. Gentlemen opposite would pay some deference to his opinion.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he had always frankly acknowledged that there was much to be urged by hon. Gentlemen opposite in favour of a system of universal bye-laws, but he had also said that neither he nor the Government could support them, but took a totally different view. This matter was fully argued out on the proposition of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), the question then before the House being whether the recommendations of the Factory Commissioners for the establishment of universal bye-laws should be carried out or not. The hon. Member for Wigan made an able speech on that occasion, and voted against the Government. [Mr. Knowles: I did not vote.] He was glad the hon. Member had shown his fidelity to his Party. ["Oh, oh!"] He thought there was nothing to be ashamed of. At all events the question was decided by a very large majority, and he objected to re-opening it. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Hamond) said that under this Bill children would be kept away from work till the age of 10, but it contained no provision which required their attendance at school. The hon. Member had overlooked Clause 7. If the local authority did their duty, and if the Education Department did their duty—which he hoped would not be disputed—no child of the age of 5 years or upwards could be habitually absent from an elementary school.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, this Amendment was not exactly the same as that of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella). He (Lord Frederick Cavendish) supported it on the ground that if universal bye-laws were not established great injustice and inequality would be the result in various parts of the country. Thus, where school boards existed and bye-laws were in force, an employer of labour could obtain the labour of children under the half-time system. In a neighbouring parish where there were no bye-laws, children could not be employed half-time. Was it just that such a difference should exist in two neighbouring parishes with reference to the labour of children?

MR. RITCHIE said, he had read the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors, and found that a large majority of them were agreed that direct compulsion was necessary. It would be a bad thing to have compulsion in one district and not in another. He thought that direct and indirect compulsion might work well together. The noble Lord said that if he accepted the Amendment it would leave the law in a curious state; but would it not be easy to insert a clause assimilating the Town Council to the local authorities?

MR. MUNDELLA hoped the noble Lord would see his way to the acceptance of this Amendment, which differed from that proposed by himself. The Amendment which he moved was that the whole of the recommendation of the Commissioners should be adopted. If the employers of labour on the other side of the House did not support the Amendment, he believed the time would come when they would regret it. The Bill as it stood was permissive for education, prohibitory for employment, and by-and-by it would be found that, owing to the negligence of their parents, thousands of children who ought to begin work would not possess the necessary certificates, and the farmers and millowners who employed them would be fined for doing so. He maintained that this would fall harder upon the farmers than upon anybody else. Why should Parliament go the roundabout way of requiring the local authorities to put these principles into force? It was the constituencies legislating for Parliament, instead of Parliament legislating for the constituencies. The supporters of the Amendment had a large majority of the clergy with them in this matter; whilst one half of the noble Lord's own party were ready to vote against him.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was rather an "old-fashioned person," but he remembered when hon. Members opposite had a deep respect for parental authority, and when it was unusual for them to deprecate an appeal to the opinion of the constituencies. All this was changed. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) wanted the Committee to pass an absolute law to shield him from his constituents, lest he should be reproached for favouring an arbitrary law. He (Mr. Newdegate) rejoiced that the noble Lord proposed to leave the discretion in the hands of the local authorities. He himself was not in favour of forcing children into schools of which the parents disapproved.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK regarded the Amendment as merely an embodiment of the principles of the clause of which the noble Lord had given Notice. It was useless to pass the Bill at all unless some steps were taken to render it effective. If one district left its children uneducated, the whole country would be the sufferers.

MR. BIRLEY said, he did not think the Amendment was of any material importance, since by the subsequent clauses they provided for the compulsory education of children between 5 and 10. He would remind the Committee that the House, by a very large majority, had decided in favour of indirect as opposed to direct compulsion.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the basis of the arguments adduced in support of the Amendment was that the whole country was unanimously in favour of direct compulsion. If that were so, the local authorities who might be taken to reflect the public opinion of their districts would have ample power under this Bill to enforce compulsion. All that the Bill said was that the local authorities should not be compelled to enforce compulsion in places where it was neither required nor desired. It was in accordance with the spirit of English law to leave much to local self-government, and he protested against this attempt to force the country to adopt one uniform cast-iron mould in the education of its children. The noble Viscount who had charge of the Bill had intimated that he would propose a clause that it was the duty of every parent to send his children to school, and undoubtedly it was; and if he failed to do so, there were pains and penalties to punish him: but he considered the duty should not be delegated to Town Councils to compel parents to do so. If the penalties failed to compel the parent to send his child to school, then the State should say—"We will take the child and send him to an industrial school." On the whole, he preferred the proposal of the noble Lord to the Amendment which had been moved, because the only logical conclusion that could follow upon the adoption of the Amendment was the sweeping away altogether of direct compulsion.

COLONEL RUGGLES-BRISE hoped that the noble Viscount would accede to the Amendment, and thought it unnecessary that any wish should be expressed by the ratepayers on the subject. With regard to Poor Law Guardians, they were elected annually, and if they failed to do their duty, it was in the power of the ratepayers not to re-elect them.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed, that he thought every hon. Member who had considered the question would take the same view as the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken. He (Mr. Forster) believed it would be found by all who had had to deal with the practical work of education—no matter whatever might have been their abstract opinions as to compulsion up to the present time—that if the Bill was to pass, as the noble Lord desired it to pass, that it would turn out vastly more convenient and more to the comfort of the local authorities that this matter should be settled by Parliament—that Parliament should lay down the rule that there should be in every district bye-laws in regard to compulsory attendance. Those were matters deserving the consideration of the Committee. He did not know that local authorities would be the best to commit the power to. Undoubtedly it was true that there might be a feeling in the country in favour of bye-laws; but there were districts in the country where the inhabitants might not be in favour of bye-laws. As the Bill stood at that moment, no child above 10 years of age could work unless in some employment under the Factory Act. He thought too much might be exacted unless they had bye-laws, and that the Bill might operate very unfairly. He could not help thinking that if his noble Friend had, in framing the Bill, put himself in communication with those hon. Members on both sides of the House who had given much attention to the subject of education, he would have derived much advantage from their opinions. He considered it would be far better if the noble Lord had so framed the Bill that children would be eligible for employment. He wished it to be borne in mind that in 1870 the Government did not establish, and did not intend to establish, the principle of permissive compulsion. What they did was to establish experimental compulsion. They had tried the experiment, and it had answered. With regard to Scotland, they had not experimental but absolute compulsion. He found that before the Act was passed the average attendance at the schools was 40,000, and that the increased average attendance since the passing of the Act was 80,000. In some large towns throughout the country they had school boards, but in Preston they had not. With regard to the average attendance of children in the National Schools in Preston, it was under 5,000, while there appeared on the roll 14,000. Now that difference was because the Preston National Schools had no bye-laws. If the passing of these bye-laws depended upon some merely temporary feeling on the part of the Guardians or other local authorities, and the enforcement was left to capricious and fitful temper, the whole thing would become a sham, and it would be still more unfair to parishes in which school boards existed and were in earnest in doing the work they were appointed to do. The only way to avoid this would be to require the enactment of bye-laws everywhere: but the noble Lord might say that that was provided for by Clause 7, and need not be introduced into this clause. He thought the noble Lord would put too much strain on Clause 7. His (Mr. W. E. Forster's) objection to that provision was that it would lay down a hard-and-fast line as applicable to the entire country. He hoped that the Amendment would be accepted by the Government as the best substitute for that direct compulsion which was so needful.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the question before the Committee was whether the principle of universal compulsion should be adopted. While admitting that there was a great deal to be said on both sides, he could not but think that the adoption of universal bye-laws would be a mistake. The Government started from this position—they did not think that the principle of direct compulsion would be a good thing in itself. No doubt a great evil was to be met, but to say to every poor man that his children were, under all circumstances, to attend school every day would be a bad and undesirable thing. The presumption adopted was that if the prudent, thoughtful, industrious parent knew that the temptation of his children's earnings under 10 years of age was removed from him, they would recognize their duty, and the consequence would be an avoidance of the evil of putting the whole of the working classes of the country under the bonds of direct compulsion.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. KNOWLES said, before they divided he was anxious to explain the simple meaning of his Amendment. Wherever he had gone as a Commissioner he had found among all classes a feeling that, though direct compulsion might be undesirable, there must in some shape be compulsion, and the object of his Amendment was to compel Town Councils and Board of Guardians to adopt bye-laws when they were requested to do so by the ratepayers, whom they represented.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 206; Noes 165: Majority 41.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved the omission of the words "on the requisition of the parish," as he considered that the Guardians ought to be allowed to make compulsory bye-laws, if they should think fit, in the same manner as the Town Councils would be entitled to do.

MR. A. MILLS thought that each district should be left to exercise its own freedom in framing compulsory bye-laws. If hon. Members knew how difficult it was to carry out compulsory rules they would not be so eager to enforce them. He should oppose the Amendment.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that if these words were not omitted the local authorities would be prevented from framing bye-laws.

Amendment negatived.

MR. MUNDELLA moved, in page 2, line 23, to leave out "but not otherwise," which would allow the Guardians to frame bye-laws without first receiving a requisition from the inhabitants of the district.

Amendment proposed, in page 2 line 23, to leave out the words "but not otherwise."—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the Guardians should be allowed to make bye-laws without receiving a requisition.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the Government must adhere to the words, as they desired that the community, or people of any school district, should have the power of saying whether there should be compulsion or not.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH supported a system of compulsory bye-laws as best calculated to carry out the objects of the Bill.

MR. J. G. TALBOT could not understand why, when a parish was doing its duty, it should not be let alone.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND contended that the majority of the Boards of Guardians should be able to decide whether there should be compulsion or not in all the parishes which they represented, or in some parishes there would be compulsion and in some not.

MR. HAMOND was sorry that the noble Lord had refused to leave out these words, as by so doing he would be following the lines of the Act of 1870.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that Town Councils were elected by the inhabitants of the towns while the Guardians were elected by the ratepayers of parishes spread over a large area.

MR. GREGORY pointed out that the inhabitants of a school district ought to have the power of saying whether there should be compulsion or not.

MR. EVANS remarked that Town Councils were elected by wards, which was similar to Guardians being elected by parishes.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, the Bill contained compulsory clauses, and he should therefore support the Amendment.

MR. MUNDELLA pointed out that the more compulsory bye-laws were needed the less likelihood was there of a requisition for them being forthcoming from the parish. This would especially be the case in some of the "God-forsaken" parishes in the agricultural and mining districts.

MR. HAYTER said, he could not understand why the elected authorities should have to refer back to the electors one of the most important questions on which it was their duty to decide.

VISCOUNT SANDON repeated that his opposition to the Amendment was because it was based upon the principle of direct compulsion, which in this particular case he did not consider necessary.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 125; Noes 86: Majority 39.

MR. SANDFORD moved, in page 2, line 26, at end of clause, to add—

"Provided that any bye-law made under this section shall not apply to any child whose parent has delivered to the clerk of the local authority an objection in writing signed by such parent, and objecting to the compulsory attendance at school of such child."

According to the Bill, as it stood, the children of Nonconformists and Roman Catholics would be compelled to attend the schools. He should be told that there was the Conscience Clause, under which there was to be no direct religious teaching; but could they not raise religious questions by historical and other subjects? How would a member of the Church of England like his child to be for eight years under the tuition of a Nonconformist teacher? And how, then, could they expect a Nonconformist or a Roman Catholic to submit his child to a system of religious instruction, with which he totally disagreed? He believed that if the Bill passed in its present form it would raise a storm of religious fervour, which would agitate the whole country from one end to another, and it was for that reason he offered his Amendment in a spirit of conciliation.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he had no doubt the hon. Gentleman was perfectly consistent in proposing his Amendment, but he must oppose it, because, if adopted, it would entirely neutralize the operations of the bye-laws; for they would have parents—careless and neglectful parents—starting up in all directions to take advantage of the proposed exemption.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK supported the Amendment, and said, he hoped it would be pressed.

Amendment negatived.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that under the Bill, the Nonconformist agricultural labourer would have no alternative but to send his children to a Church school, and there would be no end of religious strife. To meet that objection he moved, in page 2, after line 26, to add—

"Provided, That no bye-law made under this section shall compel any child to attend at any school with regard to which an objection, on grounds of conscience, made in writing and signed by the parent of such child, has been lodged with the clerk of the local authorities."

Elementary Education Act, 1870,' shall compel any child to attend at any school, whether board school or otherwise, with regard to which an objection, on grounds of conscience, made in writing and signed by the parent of such child, has been lodged with the secretary of the School Board or the clerk of the local authorities,'—(Sir Henry Harslock,)—be added at the end of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 128: Majority 103.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Provision as to order of court for attendance at school of child continuously and habitually neglected by parent or habitually wandering and consorting with criminals or disorderly persons).

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, in page 2, line 30, to leave out "continuously and," which had reference to the neglect of the parent. He retained the word "habitually," which immediately followed, because it was deemed very important to make the clause strong in its application to the parent who habitually neglected to provide elementary instruction for a child above the age of five years, who under the Act would be prohibited from being taken into employment—such instruction as would enable the child to obtain a certificate.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. A. BROWN moved the omission of the word "habitually," to which the noble Lord the Vice President had just referred; because if it were retained it would open the door to greater latitude than ought to be allowed.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE considered that the clause as it now stood would only give the magistrate the power to convict in cases where there ought to be a conviction, and on that ground he should vote against the Amendment.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK considered the clause might be so modified as not to be objectionable, and yet sufficiently stringent.

VISCOUNT SANDON affirmed that the Government attached the greatest possible importance to the retention of the words, and refused to again take up the time of the Committee in arguing the question at length.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought the retention of "habitually" would cause very great difficulty to the magistrates in carrying the clause into effect.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that in all these cases considerable licence must be allowed to the magistrates, and cited as an analogous case the use of the word "grossly" in the Scotch Education Act.

MR. W. E. FORSTER pointed out that in the Scotch Act the meaning of the word "grossly" was clearly defined. He asked the noble Lord fairly to consider the point which had been raised before a future stage of the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he could not hold out any hope that the Government would re-consider the question of retaining this word.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE was in favour of leaving the word in the clause, as otherwise an offence would be created where no real offence had been committed.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK was of opinion that the word ought to be struck out.

MR. GORST observed, that the word "habitually" was not now in Acts of Parliament. What amount of neglect constituted habitual neglect would require to be decided by the magistrate.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY supported the Amendment, on the ground that children should be sent to school before the neglect became habitual.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped that his hon. Friend would not divide the Committee on the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. BIRLEY (for MR. HARDCASTLE) moved, in sub-section 2, page 2, line 37, after "authority," to leave out—

"After due warning to the parents of such child to complain to a court of summary jurisdiction, and such court may."

VISCOUNT SANDON objected to the Amendment, on the ground that the matter might be left to the discretion of the magistrate.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BRISTOWE moved, in page 2, line 39, to leave out "may, if it think fit," and insert, "shall, if satisfied of the truth of such complaint." The Amendment would, in his opinion, be a very important one, and would operate satisfactorily at petty sessions.

VISCOUNT SANDON thought the Amendment unobjectionable, and agreed to it.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BRISTOWE moved, in page 2, line 40, to leave out "in such regular manner as is specified in the order." He explained that many difficulties might arise as the clause appeared in the Bill, as the Court of Summary Jurisdiction would have power to direct in what method the child should attend school.

VISCOUNT SANDON agreed that the Amendment would be an improvement to the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, in page 3, line 2, after "expedient," to add—

"Such order shall contain the provision in the Elementary Education Act, section seven, sub-section one, that the child is not required to attend any religious observance or any instruction in religious subjects, or to attend school on any day exclusively set apart for religious observances by the religious body to which his parent belongs."

MR. J. G. HUBBARD hoped the Amendment would not be pressed; it would add a new difficulty to those already existing.

MR. GORST said, the Amendment was quite unnecessary. The whole question was covered by the Conscience Clause.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, the Amendment was not required for the protection of Nonconformist children, but of those neglected children of the Church of England whom it was proposed to catch by the drag-net of this Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, in dealing with these, who were admittedly the lowest and the most degraded of the population, they must be very careful that they did not do anything to put the State apparently in hostility to religious education. It was an Amendment the Government could never accept. They had undertaken that any infringement of the Conscience Clause should be looked after by the local authority; but they could not do this, which really would look to these poor people as if the State was in antagonism to religious education. He thought that hon. Members opposite, who must be in favour of religious education of some kind, would hardly support the Amendment.

that Parliament a

sible, to let people know exactly what they ought to do.

MR. W. H. SMITH reminded the right hon. Gentleman that this was a case in which they were dealing with children, with reference to whom opportunities of education were habitually neglected.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 116; Noes 189: Majority 73.

MR. J. COWEN moved, in page 3, after line 3, to insert—

"Provided, That no member of the local authority shall sit in the court of summary jurisdiction at the hearing of such complaint."

He said that he thought it would be very improper that a member of the body which had control over school matters should sit as a justice to hear a complaint under the Education Act.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the Law Officers informed him that the rule at Common Law was that this should not be done, therefore no enactment upon the subject was wanted.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, in reference to the exemptions in the clause, asked what was to be done with the children living on canal boats between the ages of 3 and 14, and he suggested that the reason that there was not within two miles, &c., from the residence of such child any public elementary school open which the child could attend, should not apply to children living on canal objects. His object in mentioning it was to direct the attention of the noble Lord to their condition.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he would consider the suggestion, and see if anything could be done on the Report.

MR. WAIT moved, in page 3, line 9, to leave out from "necessary," to end of Clause, and insert "or a necessity that shall appear to the court absolutely unavoidable." If the clause were left unaltered, parents would have additional opportunities of evading the obligation of sending their children to school.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought that "necessary domestic employment" ought not to be accepted as an excuse for the non-attendance of a child at school, and he trusted, therefore, that those words would be struck out of the clause.

MR. BRISTOWE said, it would be very inconvenient to allow excuses different from those contained in the Act of 1870.

MR. RODWELL was in favour of maintaining the clause as it stood, because everybody acquainted with cottage life must know that there were many cases where children were engaged in "necessary domestic employment," although they would not come within the scope of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Gloucester.

MR. MACDONALD hoped the noble Lord would consent to the Amendment.

MR. MARK STEWART objected to the insertion of the words, as they would encourage parents to invent all kinds of excuses to evade the child's attendance at school.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEYGATE moved, in page 3, line 9, to leave out from "necessary domestic" to end, and insert—"or any other cause which in the opinion of the local authority is sufficient."

MR. BULWER considered that great care should be exercised in the wording of the clause.

VISCOUNT SANDON thought there was no doubt that it would be running a risk if the words "necessary domestic employment" were retained in the clause. He thought it would be better to cut out those words. If the Amendment were withdrawn, he should be glad if the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich (Mr. Bulwer) would confer with him on the amended wording of the clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Heygate) would not persist in his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER expressed his thanks to the Government for the change they had made in this clause, and hoped it would be a great step in the progress of education.

On Question, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. CLARE READ asked the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council, whether it was the fact that if a justice was a member of the School Attendance Committee, he could not be a member of the Court before which the child was brought? If that were so, it would be very detrimental in the country, because it would almost invariably happen that the best and most frequent attendants at the Bench were those justices who would be members of the School Attendance Committee.

VISCOUNT SANDON would like further to consult the legal Advisers of the Government on that point; but he understood that the Common Law was what the hon. Member had described it to be.

Clause agreed to.

VISCOUNT SANDON proposed to postpone Clauses 8, 9, and 10, in accordance with a statement which he had made a few days ago. The clause as to industrial schools he hoped would be in the hands of Members to-morrow, and he thought it was highly desirable to consider that clause in connection with these three clauses.

Clauses 8, 9, and 10 postponed.

Clause 11 (Exception to prohibition of employment of children).

MR. CLARE READ moved, in page 4, line 32, to leave out sub-section 3, and insert—

"The local authority may, if it thinks fit, issue a notice declaring the restrictions of this Act on the employment of children to be suspended, for the necessary operations of husbandry and the in-gathering of crops, for the period to be named in such notice, and during such period such restrictions shall not (save as to any proceedings commenced before the date of the notice) be of any force within the jurisdiction of such local authority; Provided, That the period or periods so named by any such local authority shall not exceed in the whole eight weeks between the first day of January and the thirty-first day of December in any year.

"The local authority shall cause a copy of every notice so issued to be sent to the overseer of every parish within its jurisdiction, and the overseers shall affix the same to the door of the principal church in the parish, and the local authority may further advertise any such notice in such manner (if any) as it may think fit."

VISCOUNT SANDON thought the period of eight weeks too long; but the Government would assent to the Amendment if his hon. Friend would alter the maximum period to six weeks. Upon the Report he would try to introduce words which would enable Boards of Guardians to make this period elastic.

adapting it to the time of hop-picking, or harvest in their various districts.

MR. W. E. FORSTER put it to the noble Lord whether children under 10 might be employed in hop-picking.

VISCOUNT SANDON intended that the clause should set free all children for six weeks in the year.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Children under 10 as well?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Oh, certainly. There would be no danger in that.

MR. MUNDELLA wished to point out that in every other industry in the country except agriculture no child was to be employed under 10, and then he must be a half-timer until he was 13. Even then, if he did not come up to a certain Standard he must be half-timer until he was 14.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the difference between town and country was that in the latter six weeks were to be allowed for industrial operations. When the House remembered that the farmers had to deal with harvest, the uncertainty of the weather, and perishable crops, some allowance must be made or farming operations would come to an end. He proposed to make an alteration in the Amendment so as to substitute six weeks for eight, and otherwise to make it fit in with the rest of the Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, in accepting the noble Lord's suggestion, said, it was very desirable that the children should assist their parents in hop-picking. Generally speaking, it was better to localize employment so as to keep it in the hands of the respectable peasantry, or else the farmers would be obliged to rely upon a very different class from St. Giles's.

MR. MORLEY said, that managers of schools in the hop districts thought it quite necessary to limit the time children were employed in hop-picking.

MR. GREGORY said, that Colleges were closed and homes abandoned for the period.

MR. MUNDELLA suggested that the time of absence should not exceed eight weeks including holidays.

VISCOUNT SANDON could not accept the suggestion, but must abide by the Amendment in its present form.

MR. FEASE moved to report Progress, suggesting that the Government should take time to re-consider the clause.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Pease.)

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press the Motion. The Committee had now discussed the question very fully, and, though there might be hon. Members who wished to speak, he thought a conclusion might be arrived at in a few minutes without re-opening the question to-morrow.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought that if Progress were reported the end which the Government had in view would ultimately be more easily gained.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was of opinion that the Amendment had been sufficiently debated, and he trusted the clause would be agreed to before Progress was reported, else it would be extremely inconvenient.

MR. CLARE READ said, in the harvest holidays the children were of very little use, for the farmers did not want them then, and the Amendment would only give the farmers the opportunity of employing the children about two weeks in the year.

MR. HAMOND said, they were debating this clause as if the object of the Bill were to provide labour for the farmers at the cheapest rate, and not to carry education to the rural districts.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 67: Noes 224: Majority 157.

MR. A. BROWN moved that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—Mr. Alexander Brown.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Motion, if carried, would put an end to the Bill. He thought the question under consideration had been brought to a point which would admit of a decision.

MR. W. E. FORSTER believed the clause should not be disposed of so easily. Gentleman supposed: ~~mistaken~~ he hoped be pressed.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 46 ;
Noes 219 : Majority 173.

MR. RYLANDS moved that Progress be reported.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

PRISONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for amending the Law relating to Prisons in Scotland, said: The prisons in Scotland are at present administered under the Prisons (Scotland) Administration Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 105.) They are divided into two classes, the first consisting of the general prison at Perth, and the second of the local prisons throughout the country. The general prison at Perth is administered by the prison managers for Scotland, four in number—namely, the Sheriff of Perth-shire, the Crown Agent for Scotland, the Inspector of Prisons for Scotland, appointed under 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 38, and the manager and secretary. The prison is administered under rules made by the Secretary of State, in terms of the Act of 1860. The Act itself also contains few detailed provisions on the subject. The Perth prison consists of a prison proper, or penal department, and an establishment for the criminal lunatics of Scotland, or lunatic department. The penal department is constituted for the reception of (1) prisoners sentenced to nine months' imprisonment and upwards, and (2) convicts under sentence of transportation or of penal servitude. Male convicts under sentence of penal servitude are at present detained in this prison only for the period of probation—nine months—unless on the occasion of an unexpected pressure upon the accommodation available in the convict prisons in England. The buildings of the general prison were originally erected in the beginning of the present century as a dépôt for French prisoners.
Large additions have been made to them from time to time, and a hospital is in course of erection. The number of cells is 743 in the penal department, and 58 in the lunatic department; but as that does not afford sufficient accommodation for all the prisoners appropriate for the general prison, the managers have contracted with the County Board of Ayrshire for the maintenance in the prison of Ayr of a certain number of female convicts during their period of probation —namely, 12 months—and with the County Board of Renfrewshire for the maintenance in the prison of Paisley of a certain number of male convicts during their period of probation. The net annual cost per prisoner in 1875, after the deduction of the profits of prisoners' labour was £20 11s. 5d.; the average cost for the five years 1871-5 was £20 12s. In 1874 the prisoners' net earnings amounted to £3 6s., and in 1875 to £5 12s. 2d. per head, the variation in other years being equally great; but the average of the five years 1871-5 was £3 13s. 1d. Then as to the local prisons, they are administered by the County Boards elected annually in certain proportions set forth in the schedule to the Act of 1860 by the Commissioners of Supply of each county, and the magistrates of the larger towns within it. The County Boards are bound to provide sufficient accommodation for the prisoners within the district, and if they fail to do so the obligation may be enforced in a Court of Law. They are also bound to appoint and pay the necessary staff of prison officers, and to provide for the maintenance and removal of the prisoners under their jurisdiction.

The prison officers hold their appointments at the pleasure of the Board, but the Secretary of State has also the power of dismissing any of them. The Secretary of State may order the discontinuance of any local prison, or may limit its use to certain classes of prisoners, the others being provided for elsewhere by the Board. No new prisons can be opened without his consent. The details of prison management are regulated by rules made by the Secretary of State in pursuance of the Act of 1860. These rules are binding on the County Boards, and their observance is the condition on which the grant of the Government is made towards the cost of maintenance of convicted prisoners. Certain latitude has hitherto been allowed in enforcing new rules, and at present several of the rules have been suspended by the County Boards subject to the determination of the Secretary of State. Pending early legislation, the Secretary of State has delayed disposing of the suspensions; but if legislation is postponed, they must be disposed of. The prison assessments, amounting in 1875 to £46,000, and on the average of the five years ending 1875 to £41,000, are divided between the counties and the burghs in proportion to their respective rentals, and are paid in counties wholly by the owners, and in the burghs one-half by owners and one-half by occupiers. The number of local prisons in Scotland has been gradually reduced since 1840, when, including all places of detention, it exceeded 200, and it now stands at 56, in addition to seven places at which police cells have been legalized by the Secretary of State as places in which convicted prisoners may be detained for periods not exceeding three days. In 1874 there were five prisons, of which the average daily population was less than one. Of these, one has since been closed. There were eight with an average population of one. Of these, three have since been closed. There were 36 prisons in all whose population did not exceed 10; there were 16 between 10 and 50; two between 50 and 100; and three between 100 and 200. Above 200 there were two—namely, Glasgow with 739, and Edinburgh with 323. The waste of money involved is very great, and opportunities for using prison discipline and employing the prisoners in remunerative labour proportionately small. It is probable that an entire re-arrangement of the Scotch local prisons will be necessary, and the whole prison population of Scotland, which for the five years ending 1875 was on the average only 2,902—that is to say, 2,035 in the local prisons, 752 in the general prison at Perth, and 115 convicts in Ayr and Paisley—may be advantageously accommodated in a greatly reduced number of prisons placed at convenient points over the country. These prisons, it is obvious, will be much smaller than those contemplated for England; but the scattered nature of the population in Scotland renders this unavoidable. To obviate, as far as practicable, the inconvenience which will result from the reduction of the number of prisons, it is proposed to extend the operation of the provisions now in force for legalizing police cells as places of detention by legalizing them for prisoners before trial and even for short periods after sentence, extending perhaps up to 10 or 14 days. These police cells would continue under the charge of the local police authorities; but the cost of maintaining and removing the prisoners would be repaid by the Government. The net annual cost of a prisoner in a local prison after deduction of the profit of prisoners' labour was in 1875, £20 18s. 6d., and the average for the five years ending 1875 was £21 15s. In 1875, the prisoner's net earnings amounted to £1 16s. 11d. in the local prisons, as against £5 12s. 6d. in the general prison. The average of these earnings for the five years ending 1875 was £1 13s. 10d. in the local prisons, against £4 13s. 1d. in the general prison. The Bill which it is now proposed to introduce is on the same general lines in most respects as the English Bill; but it differs from it in this respect—that it proposes to put the general prison at Perth, and the transferred local prisons, under the management of the same persons, subject, of course, to the Secretary of State. For this purpose it proposes to re-constitute the present prison managers in the manner set forth in the Bill. The management of the existing managers has been very satisfactory, and I gladly take the opportunity of specially referring to the able services of Dr. Hill Burton, the stipendiary manager. The Bill contains ample provisions for the transference of the local prisons, for their subsequent maintenance by the Government, for the continuance of the present prison officials, and the adjustment between the Government on the one hand, and the counties and burghs now represented on the Local Prison Boards on the other, of all questions as to obligations and assets of the local prisons. As by far the greater number of the clauses in the Act of 1860 and the various amending Acts are repealed by this measure, it has been thought the better course to repeal those Acts altogether, and to re-enact in the present Bill such of their clauses as it is desirable to keep in force. This renders the Scotch Bill somewhat longer than the English Bill. But it will be productive of very great convenience to ^d with prison management ⁱⁿ Scotland. I beg to introduce the Bill.

Bill for amending the Law relating to Prisons in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE and Mr. Secretary CROSS.

COMMONS BILL—(No. 139.)

(The Lord President.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

PART I.—LAW AS TO THE REGULATION AND INCLOSURE OF COMMONS.

Applications in relation to commons.

Clauses 1 to 7, inclusive, agreed to.

Suburban Commons.

Clause 8 (Sanitary authorities to be represented in the case of commons in the neighbourhood of towns.)

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBER-LAND, after explaining that the last section of the clause stated that “The population of any town for the purposes of this Act shall be reckoned upon the last published census for the time being, and distances shall be measured in a direct line from the outer boundary of the town to the nearest point of the suburban common,” moved an Amendment to substitute “four” miles for “six” as the limit of distance, and to leave out (“outer boundary of the town”) and insert—

(“Town hall, or if there shall be no town hall, then from the cathedral or church if there shall be only one church, or if there be more churches than one, then from the principal market place of such town.”)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he understood the object of the noble Duke in proposing the Amendment was that there should be some definite point laid down in the Bill from which the measurement should be taken, so as to remove uncertainty.
 He agreed that that was desirable; but he was not altogether satisfied with the words suggested by the noble Duke, which might possibly be improved. If the noble Duke would now withdraw the Amendment he would consider the matter before the Report.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY remarked that the Metropolitan Commons Act was much more stringent than that clause, because it did not allow any common within 15 miles from the centre of London to be inclosed. He did not know why other towns were to be treated on a different principle. The Bill had been announced as a compromise on this question; but if the advantages conferred by the Bill were to be taken away little by little, the Government might be able to carry their measure, but it would not be accepted as a compromise, and the whole question would be re-opened.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET observed that the case of the Metropolis in respect of commons was altogether exceptional.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR pointed out that the one question before the Committee was whether they should have a constantly shifting boundary or one fixed central point in a town from which to measure the six miles.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that if the boundary of the borough was to be deemed the boundary of the town, it was only reasonable that there should be some better definition of the boundary than that given in the Bill. Some municipal boroughs had their boundaries quite in the country. For instance, a small river in his deer park was the boundary of a small borough several miles distant. He would himself be quite satisfied by the Act, but he should be some better definition of what was to be deemed the "boundary" of a town; and it would be well there should be a different distance fixed for a large town of 500,000, from what there should be for a small of 5,000 inhabitants.

THE EARL OF MORLEY suggested that this proposal was well worthy consideration.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND said, that after what had been said, he would leave the matter to the consideration of the Government.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he desired to propose an Amendment to put a stop to an evil which had been long prevalent. It constantly happened that when a common adjoined a town persons were tempted to inclose small pieces from time to time without any right whatever. As no person was entitled to resist such encroachments but the commoners themselves, and the process was exceedingly expensive, practically no one interfered. He might point out a notable instance in Epping Forest, where thousands of acres had been inclosed, during many years, without any right whatever; and but for the accident that the City of London had acquired rights as commoners, and had the spirit and the funds to interfere, that beautiful district would have been lost to the public. He thought it but reasonable that some authority—the urban authority—should be empowered to come forward to protect the rights of the public. He therefore proposed to insert in the clause after the 7th subsection the words—

"In the case of a suburban common it shall be lawful for any urban sanitary authority which would be entitled under this Act to receive notice of an application for an inclosure to apply, if it shall think fit, to the county court within whose jurisdiction such common is situate for an order or injunction under the provisions of Section 30 of this Act."

This Amendment would not interfere with rights of lords and commoners to inclose their commons by agreement among themselves, but it would give the urban sanitary authority the right to interfere to prevent inclosures which were simply illegal.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he could not consent to the Amendment, which would set up a new right of property. The Government, in introducing this Bill, stated its principle was to preserve all existing rights of property, and did not seek to confer any right on the public which they did not enjoy at the present moment. The Amendment, moreover, would enable an urban authority to contest the right of a private individual at the expense of public funds, and that, he thought, would be undesirable and unjust.

THE EARL OF MORLEY supported the Amendment, which he thought desirable, in order to prevent the encroachment by individuals on public rights. It seemed to him to lie within the scope of the Bill, and would only slightly add to the power which the Bill conferred on urban authorities.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Amendment was foreign to the principle of the Bill. Whilst he fully recognized the high honour that was due to the Corporation of London for what they had done in connection with Epping Forest, he could not sanction the general principle that private rights should be contested by means of public funds.

On Question? resolved in the negative.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND moved, at end of clause, to insert—

"When part only of a common is situate within the aforesaid distance from a town, such part shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be a common separate and distinct from the part situated without and beyond such distance."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Procedure.

Clauses 9 to 18, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 19 (Allotments for recreation and gardens.)

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND moved to omit the clause.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND asked what the clause really meant.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, the clause was not in the Bill as originally introduced, but had been inserted in the passage of the Bill through the other House. He would look into the matter before the bringing up of the Report.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 20 (Gravel digging) agreed to.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET moved, after Clause 20, to insert new clause—

“After the passing of this Act in all commons where rights of turbary exist it shall not be lawful for any person to skim or pare off the surface soil of such common, whether the peat in such common be exhausted or not.”

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he could not accept the Amendment of the noble Duke. The fundamental principle of the Bill was the preservation as far as possible of existing rights, and, therefore, if persons had a right to pare a common that right must not be interfered with.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH also opposed the Amendment on the ground that the right of turbary was one of the most ancient rights known to the law.

On Question, whether to insert? resolved in the negative.

PART II.—AMENDMENT OF THE INCLOSURE ACTS.

Field Gardens and Recreation Grounds.

Clause 21 (Expenses of clearing, draining, and fencing field gardens.)

THE EARL OF POWIS said, the clause enacted that the valuer should cause every allotment made for a field garden to be cleared, drained, fenced, levelled, and otherwise made fit for immediate use and occupation; and the expenses incurred by the valuer under this section should be paid as part of the general expenses of the inclosure. This introduced quite a new principle, and he moved that it be struck out. The fencing would be done as part of the inclosure under the existing law. The preparing of the ground should be done by the local authority, in whom the garden would be vested, and who would repay themselves out of the rents.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH was in favour of the provision, which he thought only carried out the principle of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, it was very difficult to understand the meaning of the clause. No valuer, he thought, would be able to apportion the expenses of the valuation.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Government were of opinion that drainage should be part of the general scheme in regard to any inclosure, and the clause would keep everything under one system. He should therefore oppose the omission of the clause.

On Question, whether to omit? resolved in the negative.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 22 to 29, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 30 (Jurisdiction of County Court in respect of illegal inclosures.)

LORD ABERDARE asked whether the jurisdiction to be given to the County Courts in respect of illegal inclosures would extend to preventing those who sunk pits for coals or other minerals from tipping the waste, or spoil, or rubbish on any common lands?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the only answer which he could give was, that if such rights existed now in respect of spoil and so forth, the County Court Judges would have no power to interfere; but if such rights did not exist they would have jurisdiction.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 31 and 32 agreed to.

General Amendments.

Clauses 33 and 34 agreed to.

PART III.—MISCELLANEOUS. DEFINITIONS.

Clauses 35 to 38 agreed to, with Amendments.

Report of the Amendments to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 176.)

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

(Nos. 99, 160.)

(The Lord President.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order.)

Clause 4 (Sending unseaworthy ships to sea a misdemeanour.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET moved to leave out the first paragraph of the clause, and substitute the following:—

“Every person, including the managing owner, who sends, or attempts to send, or is party to sending or attempting to send, a British ship to sea in such unseaworthy state that the life of any person is thereby endangered, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour if it shall be proved that he did not use all reasonable means to ensure her being sent to sea in a seaworthy state, or that her going to sea in such unseaworthy state was under the circumstances reasonable and justifiable."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he had hoped that the Government had succeeded in removing all objections to the clause as it stood by the Amendment which he proposed to move—that it should apply to all persons and not merely to the managing owner. He could not accept the Amendment of the noble Duke.

Amendment negatived.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON moved to leave out the words—"and the managing owner of any British ship so sent to sea from any port in the United Kingdom." The omission of these words made it clear that "every person" who sent, or was party to sending, a ship to sea in such unseaworthy condition as to endanger the life of any person was guilty of a misdemeanour.

Motion agreed to; words struck out; Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 24 (Penalty for carrying deck loads of timber in winter.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in connection with the Proviso that a master or owner should not be liable to any penalty under this section, moved the following additional exception:—

"If he proves that the ship sailed from the port at which the wood goods were loaded as deck cargo at such time before the sixteenth day of April as allowed a reasonable interval according to the ordinary duration of the voyage for the ship to arrive after that day at the said port in the United Kingdom, and by reason of an exceptionally favourable voyage arrived before that day."

Motion agreed to; words added.

Proviso, that nothing in this section "shall affect any foreign ship coming into any port of the United Kingdom under stress of weather, &c.," amended by leaving out the words "foreign ship coming," and inserting in lieu thereof, "not bound to any port in the Kingdom which comes."

Further Amendments made; Bill to be read 3^d on Friday next; and to be printed, as amended. (No. 177.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

GIBRALTAR—ALIENS.—QUESTION.

QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the Correspondence that has passed between Mr. F. Solly Flood and the Governors or Deputy Governors of Gibraltar, and between Mr. F. Solly Flood and the Colonial Office, since the 1st day of July 1858, with reference to the subject of Aliens in Gibraltar?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, that a considerable amount of Correspondence had been already published on this subject, and in the course of time, it would probably be necessary to produce other Papers; but, in the meantime, it would hardly be convenient that isolated portions of the Correspondence referred to by the hon. Member should be produced. In case of further Correspondence being produced he would be happy to take into consideration the object which the hon. Gentleman had in view.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

[BILL 155.] COMMITTEE.

[Progress 13th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 11 (Exception to prohibition of employment of children.)

Question again proposed, "That the words 'in the hay harvest, corn harvest, or hop picking' stand part of the Clause."

MR. RYLANDS said, that in moving to report Progress on the previous evening, he had been actuated by a desire that the Committee should have a full opportunity of discussing the very important clause at which they had arrived, and the very important Amendment which had been moved on it. It appeared to him that the 11th clause embraced one of the cardinal principles of the Bill. It was not merely that they were simply to consider the six or eight weeks during which it was proposed by the clause to allow the local authority to sanction the withdrawal of the child from school; but there was a far more important principle underlying the clause — namely, whether agricultural children under a certain age should be employed in agriculture at all. That, he thought, was the principle which they ought to discuss in connection with the clause, and it certainly did seem to him that in reference to a matter of such vital importance, affecting one of the main principles of the Bill, it would have been most unfortunate if the discussion had been cut short by the late hour at which they had arrived, and if the Committee had been hurried into a division which would scarcely record their mature judgment. It therefore did appear to him that his hon. Friend the Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) had acted with wisdom and discretion in moving, at half-past 12 o'clock in the morning, when they were about to discuss a matter of such great importance, that the question should be adjourned. He regretted the manifestations which had been made by hon. Gentlemen opposite, at a later period of the Sitting, when his hon. Friend rose at about half-past 1 in the morning, to justify the course which he had taken. He (Mr. Rylands) could not help thinking that the principle of the Bill did not carry out the intentions of the noble Lord the Minister of Education. The noble Lord, in the very able and admirable speech in which he introduced the measure, specially insisted, in very strong terms, upon the necessity of having uniformity as to the conditions under which young people throughout the country should be employed. He gathered from the speech of the noble Lord that he saw serious objections to there being one law with regard to the employment of children in one branch of industry, and another law in regard to their employment in other branches of industry; and he understood the noble Lord to urge the great importance of having, as far as possible, uniformity as to the employment of children. It would appear that uniformity was the policy which had been carried out by the Legislature. In one period after another they had witnessed the introduction of measures relating to the employment of children, and all of them had tended in the direction of uniformity. They therefore had a right to say that this uniformity in the policy of the Legislature in former enactments, ought not to be departed from when they were devising means for the education of large masses of the community. There were two great reasons why they should adopt the policy of restricting the labours of young children. The first was, that in the employment of young children there had occurred instances of material injury to health; and in addition to that there was the feeling which was becoming more and more manifested in the Legislature, that the children of this country ought to be educated. They had also recognized that in regard to the parents of many of the children there had not been the disposition to prevent their children being hurried into employments at an early and unsuitable age. The result was that the Houses of the Legislature had not hesitated to interfere with the principle of freedom of contract; and they had said to the employers and the parents that they would not allow them to contract for the labour of their children, because they felt there were interests of the State which ought to over-ride that freedom of contract. They therefore said to the parents—"You are bound to give your children a sufficient education, and there is nothing in the advantage which you would derive from their wages which would justify you in keeping them from school." In regard to these two reasons for keeping children of a tender age from employment, both of them operated quite as strongly in regard to agriculture as they did in regard to trade, and what he advocated now was simply this,—that the policy which the Legislature had adopted in regard to the children engaged in manufacturing industries should be adopted equally in regard to children of a tender age employed in agriculture. He had said that there were two great reasons why this policy should continue to be carried out, and one reason was the scandals which had arisen in consequence of the employment and want of education of young children. He believed that the scandals in regard to the employment of young children in agricultural pursuits were quite as great as those which had arisen from their employment in the manufacturing industries. It was not long since the Report of a Royal Commission was laid upon the Table of the House as to the employment of children in agriculture. Had hon. Members forgotten the accounts contained in that Blue Book? He had not had time to refer to them particularly, but he recollected reading the Report of the Commission, and knew that he felt horrified at the details which were given by the Commissioners as to the results of their inquiries into the conditions of the labour of the young children. If hon. Members would take the trouble to turn to that book they would find the most harrowing details in regard to cases in which little children, only fit to be at their mother's knee, had been sent out under all conditions to earn a paltry pittance in the agricultural field. He believed that the scandals were as great in regard to the employment of children in agriculture as in connection with the mills. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen might doubt that statement, but he had reason to believe that it was true. He did not wish it to be supposed that he wished to justify anything which had occurred in regard to the manufacturing industries. He believed that the legislation in regard to them had been a wise legislation, and as a manufacturer himself he was delighted that the Legislature had interfered to prevent the employment of young children. When the Mines Bill was before the House three or four years ago, and when a question was raised as to the prohibition of the employment of children in mines under 10 years of age, he voted against any exceptions being made, and in favour of the law being absolute that children under 10 years of age under no circumstances should be employed in mines. Therefore he asked now for the same rule to be applied to children employed in agriculture. Hon. Members opposite would no doubt be disposed to say that the argument would hardly apply, seeing that labour in the mines was unhealthy, while labour in agriculture was not detrimental to health. He could well understand when hon. Members went down to the country in such delightful weather as we had yesterday, their coming back and feeling that all the world was sunshine, with everything to make the people happy. He did not suppose that children employed in the fields in such weather would take much harm. But, unfortunately, in the variable climate of this country, serious changes in the weather were constantly occurring, and they frequently found not only warm days, but cold and wet days with bitter east winds. In the present Bill permitting the employment of young children in agriculture, there were no exceptions dependent upon the weather and the changes in the climate, but they proposed to do as had already been done in far too many cases—namely, to send children of six and eight years of age, thinly clad, in damp wet weather, and with cold east winds to follow an out-door employment. Do not let hon. Members think, therefore, that this was under every circumstance a healthy employment. He believed that the lives of hundreds of children had been shortened in consequence of the inclemency of the weather to which they were subjected. He was quite aware that in respect of certain processes of manufacture some were more healthy than others. In some, children might be employed without the slightest detriment to their health, but the Legislature knew perfectly well that it would not do to allow exceptions to creep in. When he spoke just now as to the state of the weather in the summer time, he ought to have pointed out that that was not the only period to which the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk was confined. On the contrary, it contemplated the employment of children at all times of the year when the necessity of husbandry required it. The words of the Amendment were clear and distinct—that the local authority, which in most cases would consist of farmers and the employers of these children, might, by giving notice, allow the employment of the children in the necessary operations of husbandry at any period of the year from the 1st of January until the 31st of December. He was not sufficiently acquainted with agriculture to state the periods in which the different operations of husbandry were conducted; but he knew that if they were necessary in all times of the year, the local authority, under a pressure for labour, would have power to authorize the employment of young children. He thought that ought to be avoided as much as possible, and that children under 10 years of age should be kept at school and not permitted to labour. He looked upon that as an absolute State necessity. It was an absolute necessity to have these children educated, and that was the reason why they were engaged in discussing the present measure. It did appear to him that it was only fair and reasonable that the children brought up in the agricultural districts should be so educated that they would be able to go into the large towns to compete on fair terms with those who were brought up under the educational system provided in urban localities. Under these circumstances, he felt bound to oppose the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk. Why should Parliament be called upon to declare that the agriculturists should be treated in a different manner from other employers in England? He looked upon farming as a manufacture. They had the capital, the employment of labour, and the industry. Therefore, he thought that the farmers ought to be treated in precisely the same manner as other employers of labour were treated. He was aware that for years past the farmers had been accustomed to look to the Legislature for exceptional treatment. He confessed that he regarded such a policy as a very pernicious policy. He did not think they ought to encourage it for one moment, and when his hon. Friends opposite said the farmers could not get through the harvest without juvenile labour, he thought they were raising an alarm which was altogether without foundation. He reminded the Committee that there had not been a single restriction imposed upon labour in the manufacturing districts which had not been met by the same cry of alarm. The manufacturers had always said, just as his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk was saying now in regard to farming operations, that if the Legislature placed restrictions upon their industries, it would have a very serious and injurious effect upon them. He believed the experience of the country proved that the Legislature had not seriously interfered with these industries or with the manufacturing prosperity of the country. If it did to some extent for the moment interfere with the money-getting of the country, then, he contended, that there was something far higher than money-getting. They were bound to see that the children were properly educated and trained in order that they might make good and useful members of society. He thought the Government would deserve support if they absolutely refused that any children under 10 years of age should be employed in any part of the country in any industrial occupation. Under these circumstances, he hoped the Amendment of his hon. Friend would be resisted, and that it would be effectually defeated.

MR. RODWELL contended that in the interests of the public, the employers of labour, the parents, and the children themselves, the Amendment ought to have the support of the Committee. It was impossible to reduce the operations of agriculture to that regularity which was observed in the factory and the workshop; and the rules affecting farmers should have a certain amount of elasticity. Did the hon. Member when he spoke of uniformity, think it the same thing to employ children in industrial occupations in the country ~~wh~~ ^{—old breathe fresh, pure} ~~an~~ ^{to the soul and} ~~ch~~ ^{the factory and} ~~tl~~ ^{the Commis-} sioners on the Factory question, there were only a few slight references to anything connected with agriculture, but the Commissioners distinctly recommended that in the agricultural districts the children should be set free from attendance at school during the busy season, in order that they might take part in agricultural work, provided full attendance at school was secured during the other periods of the year. There were various operations in husbandry, such as weeding and the in-gathering of potatoes, when juvenile labour was more important than during what was strictly known as the time of harvest. In his (Mr. Rodwell's) own district, in Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely, a very great quantity of seed was grown, and children were much employed to keep the beds clean from weeds in the early part of the year. In the late autumn also they were employed in gathering potatoes. In many parts children in harvest time went gleaning, and did not go to work at all. He considered that the Amendment of his hon. Friend was a reasonable one, and sufficient to meet the necessities of the case. It agreed with the Report, for the Commissioners recommended that it should be left to the local authority to fix the times when attendance at school should be insisted on, only taking care that in no case should the period of absence from school exceed six months in the year. It was the fashion to taunt those on the Conservative side with a desire to obstruct education. He denied the imputation, and asserted that there were no greater friends to education than those connected with the landed interest of the country. He should give his unflinching and unhesitating support to the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. FAWCETT said, that that was the first Amendment touching the education of children engaged in agriculture; but although the Bill was a great advance in some respects, he feared that if the Amendment were adopted the children employed in agriculture would be worse off under the Bill than they were at the present time. ["No, no!"] The recommendations of the Factory Commissioners to which the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire had so triumphantly referred were irrelevant to the question before the House; they did not apply to the question whether children of 6 years of age should be permitted to be employed under any conditions, but to the employment of children, between the ages of 10 and 14. He believed the effect of the Amendment would be to injure the children employed in agriculture. ["No, no!"] It would be injurious to a child of the age of 5½ or 6 years to employ it even in summer weather, but the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire thought young children could be advantageously employed in weeding. Now, what was weeding? [Laughter.] If any hon. Members thought that a subject for laughter and scorn let them read the Report of the Factory Commission, and when they read the harrowing details of children of 6 and 7 being sent out early in the morning to weed in the wet fields, he thought their laughter and their scorn would turn to something very different. There was nothing in the Report of the Agricultural Commission to justify the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk. The Agricultural Children Act, bad as it was, gave some security that children should have an education of some kind, but under the Bill that Act would be repealed, and nothing would be left in its place. His second objection was that not only would the Amendment, if carried, injure these children educationally, but it would have the effect of acting disastrously on the efficiency of the school by their irregular attendance; and his third objection was that no official evidence could be produced to show that the Amendment was required in favour of the agricultural interest. The Report of the Agricultural Commission showed that in no county was agriculture in such a thriving condition as in Northumberland. In no county were labourers better off, the farmers more prosperous, and the landlords more satisfied. In that county children were not sent to work before 12 years of age, and seldom before 13 or 14 years. The friends of education would never rest satisfied until legislation was based upon a principle that would ensure education to those employed in agriculture as well as to those employed in manufactures or any other branch of industry. Their contention was that no branch of industry should enjoy a monopoly of ignorance.

and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex had proposed two alternatives, one being eight years limit of age, and the other nine weeks duration of employment. Being very anxious to get the matter settled, he (Mr. Forster) said he could not agree to the eight years' proposal, because he thought it would be a bad precedent for the Home Secretary, but he added that he was prepared to accept the nine weeks proposal.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'or is otherwise necessary for the in-gathering of crops' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question proposed,

The local authority may, if it thinks fit, issue a notice declaring the restrictions of this Act on the employment of children to be suspended, for the necessary operations of husbandry and the in-gathering of crops, for the period to be named in such notice, and during such period such restrictions shall not (save as to any proceedings commenced before the date of the notice) be of any force within the jurisdiction of such local authority: Provided, That the period or periods so named by such local authority shall not exceed in the whole six weeks between the first day of January and the thirty-first day of December in any year.

The local authority shall cause a copy of every notice so issued to be sent to the overseer of every parish within its jurisdiction, and the overseers shall affix the same to the door of the principal church in the parish, and the local authority may further advertise any such notice in such manner (if any) as it may think fit, be there inserted."

MR. CLARE READ proposed to amend his Amendment by inserting after "employment of children," in line 4 of the Amendment, the words "above the age of eight years."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word "children," in line 4, to insert the words "above the age of eight years."—Mr. Clare Read.)

MR. MUNTZ asked whether he could propose to insert "ten" instead of "eight" in the Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN replied that it was not the practice to amend an Amendment upon an Amendment, and therefore it would be necessary for the hon. Member to wait until the Report of the Bill.

MR. DODSON said, that if the hon. Member for Birmingham wished to insert "ten" instead of "eight," all that would have to be done was to negative the insertion of "eight." The hon. Gentleman could then move to insert "ten."

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 194; Noes 101: Majority 93.

On Motion of Sir CHARLES W. DILKE Sub-section amended by the introduction of words requiring that the notices for the purposes of the sub-section be affixed by the overseers to the door of every church and chapel in the parish.

On Motion of Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH, Sub-section further amended by words requiring a copy of the notice to be sent to the Education Department.

Question put,

"That the words 'within the notice of the local authority hereinafter next mentioned (that is to say):

The local authority may, if it thinks fit, issue a notice declaring the restrictions of this Act on the employment of children above the age of eight years to be suspended, for the necessary operations of husbandry and the in-gathering of crops, for the period to be named in such notice, and during such period such restrictions shall not (save as to any proceedings commenced before the date of the notice) be of any force within the jurisdiction of such local authority: Provided, That the period or periods so named by any such local authority shall not exceed in the whole six weeks between the first day of January and the thirty-first day of December in any year.

The local authority shall cause a copy of every notice so issued to be sent to the Education Department and the overseer of every parish within its jurisdiction, and the overseers shall cause such notice to be affixed to the door of all churches and chapels in the parish, and the local authority may further advertise any such notice in such manner (if any) as it may think fit, be inserted after the word 'in,' in page 4, line 22."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 255; Noes 50: Majority 205.

On Question, That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?

In reply to Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, VISCOUNT SANDHURST stated that the Bill would not prevent the employment of children who lived more than two miles from a school, as it was thought better they should be employed than that they should be kept in enforced idleness; but he hoped and believed the time was not far distant when there would be very few children who would not be within two miles of a school.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH hoped that before the Report the noble Lord would consider whether he could not adopt the limit of the Act of 1870, which was three miles.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 12 (Payment of school fees for poor parents).

MR. HOLT moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, lines 35 and 36, to leave out "not being resident in the district of a school board." The object of the Amendment was to enable Guardians to pay fees in school board districts, and thus set parents more free to send their children to denominational schools, if they desired to do so, or if those schools happened to be nearer than board schools.

VISCOUNT SANDON, in opposing the Amendment, said he would remind the Committee that the Bill did not recast the whole of our educational system, and it would be unwise to reopen the 25th clause of the Education Act, which had been agreed to after much discussion. He trusted that the hon. Member would not press his Amendment, because if these questions were opened up again it would necessitate their going on until they met again next year.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BIRLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 38, to leave out "guardians," and insert "local authority." The clause would then include corporations.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the Government attached great importance to these fees being paid only by the Guardians, the great object being to reduce such payments as much as possible. The clause followed that in the Scotch Education Act, which, it was stated, had worked very well.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. BIRLEY, Amendment made, in page 4, line 40, by leaving out the words "give the parent sufficient money to."

MR. BIRLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 41, to leave out "three pence" and insert "four pence." The salaries of teachers and other expenses of schools were on the increase, and it was desirable that the children who were paid for should be on the same footing as others.

VISCOUNT SANDON hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Question, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. A. BROWN said, he should move its rejection, because the payment by the Guardians of school fees for poor parents would tend to associate the idea of pauperism with that of education in the minds of the people.

MR. RICHARD entirely concurred in the views of the hon. Member, as the provision objected to was virtually an extension of the principle of Clause 25 of the Act of 1870, which he made an effort to repeal by the Bill he brought before the House in 1874. He objected to the ratepayers being taxed for the sake of purely denominational schools.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that no people in the world were more independent than the Scotch, or more shy of being pauperized; but in the Scotch Education Act there was a similar clause to the one now under discussion for the payment of school fees due from poor parents. This system had been in actual operation in Scotland for several years, and had worked well.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, parents could not be forced to pay if they had not the means to pay, and in such cases it was necessary that the school fees should be paid for them.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 242; Noes 49: Majority 193.

Parliamentary Grant.

Clause 13 (Special provision as to parliamentary grant to schools in poor districts), postponed.

Clause 14 (Contribution for fees of children who obtain certificates.)

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he proposed to make two or three Amendments in the clause. The first was, that the Education Department should have the power of raising the Standard and the amount of attendance from time to time. The second was, that at the end of five years the Government of the day might, if they thought fit, by the authority of the Queen in Council, go on with this system without being obliged to come to Parliament for a new Act.

Amendments agreed to.

On Motion of Mr. BIRLEY, Amendment made, in page 6, line 25, after "Parliament," by inserting—

"Such fee to include the cost of books and other requisites, and the school fees so paid to be reckoned as school pence to be met by the grant payable to the department."

On Question, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH moved its rejection in order to afford the Committee an opportunity of considering what it really involved. The Standard to be passed in order to obtain this reward was not a very high one, and he did not think that free education was the best form of reward. His own suggestion would be that in the limited number of cases in which rewards of this kind ought to be given, they should rather take the form of assistance in a higher school. The number of attendances to be required was not large, nor was the period of attendance long.

VISCOUNT SANDON thought that the clause would enable them to take a step in the right direction, and trusted that it would be retained. He proposed to increase the number of attendances to be required from 250 to 350; but he was obliged to begin with two years, because at present the registers were not kept for a longer period. The Standard could be raised by the revision of the Code. Exhibitions and scholarships worked well in the middle and upper classes; many hon. Members of the House had benefited by them; and he believed that for the working classes these rewards would be a step in the right direction.

MR. WALTER did not know how it might be in the case of large urban schools, but so far as his experience went, the children who would carry off the prizes in rural schools would be precisely those who least required them—the children of mechanics, small farmers, and others, who were comparatively well-to-do people, and who could better afford to pay higher fees than could the labouring classes. If there were any probability of these prizes being carried off by the children of the labouring classes it would be well to offer them, for they would then be analogous to scholarships at the Universities, which were generally carried off by those who were not particularly wealthy. That a mechanic had a child of remarkable quickness was not a reason why that child should receive a free education. The clause proposed an experiment from which it would be difficult to withdraw, and if there were a division he should vote with the hon. Member for Hastings.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the clause was an important one, for there was no doubt that its immediate effect would be to give a considerable stimulus to the demand for free education. He believed that its operation would withdraw large sums from the Exchequer, and that it ought not to be adopted without full consideration. If education became as efficient as they had every reason to hope and expect it soon would be, the Standard required at the age named would be the Standard that every child of that age ought to be able to pass in, and almost immediately the children of artisans and mechanics who had been in regular attendance might be expected to pass in it. If a free education were given to such children, how could it be refused to others who were just as meritorious, though not so fortunate, and whose parents would feel the burden of education more than those who were relieved of it? He did not fear facing the result of free education, but it would not be possible to stop at elementary education, and the adoption of this clause would be the taking of a step which it would be difficult to retrace.

MR. HEYGATE hoped the clause would not be pressed, because it was clearly a step in the direction of free education, to which many of them were opposed; and it would be quite enough for many hon. Members if he told them that this was the only clause of the Bill which was approved by the Birmingham League. It would assist those who were best able to pay for themselves, and it would operate chiefly in the large towns to the benefit of well-paid mechanics and artizans, at the expense of the middle classes, who felt the pressure of the rates to the greatest extent.

THE O'CONOR DON concurred in the objection that the clause would inevitably lead to free education, and that it would assist parents who were able and willing to pay fees.

MR. A. MILLS said, he did not share the apprehensions that the clause would make any large demands on the Exchequer, particularly if the Standard were raised, or that it would lead to free education, any more than scholarships at the public schools had done so, and, therefore, he should support the clause.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU supposed the intention was not so much to relieve parents of the cost of education as to promote emulation in schools. The noble Lord the Vice President said he intended ultimately to raise the Standard, and he might always, by doing so, reduce the competitors within reasonable limits.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD doubted whether the proposal would have the effect of stimulating emulation. What prizes did children of from 3 to 13 years of age principally value? Toys. Money prizes would be nugatory as to the effect upon the children, and would really give the parent a pecuniary advantage in having a child of greater natural capacity than others. That was in itself an advantage, and the assistance should rather be given to the parents of the dull children.

VISCOUNT SANDON admitted that this was a new and somewhat bold proposal. The Committee, however, would recollect that Parliament was by the Bill introducing a very strict system of compulsion, under which parents were called upon not only to send their children to school regularly, but were subjected to a very large expenditure for this purpose. Rates were rising all over the country, and it was not the parent who wished for this law, but Parliament, which went to the parent and said—"You must do this." Hitherto there had been nothing but "driving;" but now he hoped to introduce a more healthy element, and to endeavour to excite emulation among the children. From information that came to him at the Privy Council Office, he was informed that several places were trying the experiment of free education for themselves. In Liverpool there was a society which offered a free education for children who had made full attendances, and it reported that a very high standard of regular attendance had thus been attained without any "Standard test;" that the competition for this prize beneficially affected the general regularity of the attendance; and that the honour of gaining the prizes was regarded as of special value by the parents and children. Without laying too much stress upon the precedent of the Queen's Scholarships, which gave a free education to young teachers, he would remind the House of what had occurred in regard to the great endowments of the country. For many years free education had almost been the rule in our grammar schools and old foundations. The Education Commissioners, however, agreed that free education had not been valued by parents, and that the system had broken down. The result had been that free education had been got rid of by converting the funds into exhibitions. To say, therefore, that the Government were by this clause introducing the principle of free education was untenable. As to the assertion that these prizes would be appropriated by children of the mechanics in towns, it was nothing but a part of that system of self-depreciation of the country against which he had so often protested. The fact was, according to the figures at the Education Office, that the country children attended rather better than those of towns, and they passed a rather higher Standard; so that it might with much more reason be alleged that it would be the country children who would carry away the greater part of the prizes. As to the poor children not getting these prizes, he apprehended the effect would be that children of merit who had attained the age of 10 years would be able to say to their parents—"We have got this little bursary"—as it might be called—"and we hope you will let us go on attending school, because it will be of no expense to you." The Committee were putting 10 years as the limit in this Bill, but he should be sorry for the State to be understood to express any wish that the education of children should end at 10. It would be, in fact, desirable that children should go on until 13, if the parents' circumstances allowed it. He owned he attached great importance to this proposal, which had been well received by the intelligent working classes; and with regard to free education, the Government would have the power to alter the Standard, so as to avoid any inconvenience from that cause. He trusted that the Committee would affirm the clause, which would be accepted as a boon and as a mark of the wish of Parliament to elevate the working classes.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH suggested that the proposal should be limited according to the number of children in a school, so as to bring them nearer to the character of scholarships.

MR. STORER feared that the clause would ultimately lead to a great additional charge on the public revenue.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR supported the clause. The great difficulty hitherto had been to induce children to remain sufficiently long at school, by encouraging parents to believe that the Fourth was the maximum Standard, which was no inducement for children to be kept longer at school. This proposal would give them an inducement on the part of the State, after they had passed the Fourth, to go on to a higher Standard, and the effect would be to infuse the same ambition among the whole of the children at school. He denied that these were in any sense scholarships, and he did not wish to see the number limited so as to make it in the nature of scholarships, because if they did it would reproduce the evils of the competitive examinations. The benefit of the clause was that it made the Fourth Standard part of the ordinary school work, and the Education Department could carry on the impulse to the higher education by raising the Standard still higher. The mere fact of compulsion existing in this country would render it necessary that a higher education should be given than mere reading, writing, and arithmetic according to the Fourth Standard. He hoped the noble Lord would continue to press the clause.

MR. ASSHETON said, the supporters of the Bill hoped it would raise the general standard of education throughout the country; but there was a probability that this clause would have a directly contrary effect, because if it were passed the teachers throughout the country would do their best to push forward the children who were likely to get prizes, while the more stupid children would be neglected.

MR. WHITWELL supported the clause for the very reason that it would give a stimulus to teachers to push their pupils forward.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT said, he regarded the clause with considerable apprehension, because it was founded on a principle which was likely to be extended if it were once introduced. It was the principle of endowment to elementary schools, and he was not prepared to support it, and he hoped that as it was admittedly only an experiment, it would not be further persevered with at present. We ought to provide that every child should have a fair and sufficient education, but we had no right to take money out of the public funds for anything beyond this, unless it were proved to be absolutely necessary in the interests of the nation. He agreed with the hon. Member for Berkshire that these prizes would fall into the hands of the class which least needed them.

MR. MUNTZ thought the clause was a wise and beneficial one. If a large number of children should get on too well, it would be easy to raise the Standard. He hoped the Committee would not throw out a clause which was the first boon that had been offered to the working classes.

MR. FLOYER was opposed to the clause because he believed it would prevent the good working of the schools. If there were a large number of children in a school who were to receive their education free of expense, a broad line would be drawn between those who were receiving that education free of expense and those who were paying for it, and this would engender considerable dissatisfaction. He would, therefore, vote against the clause.

MR. PELL, upon reflection, did not think that the clause would help the people whom the noble Lord and the Government desired to assist. He intended to vote against it.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

THE DECLARATION OF PARIS, 1856.

RESOLUTIONS.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH, who had given Notice to move the following Resolutions:—

"1. That the object of the Declaration of Paris respecting maritime law, signed at Paris on the 16th April 1856, was, as expressed in the preamble, 'to endeavour to attain uniformity of doctrine and practice in respect to maritime law in time of war:'

"2. That it is, moreover, obvious that the whole value of any such declaration, as changing the ancient and immemorial practice of the Law of Nations on the subject, must necessarily depend on the general assent of all the maritime states to the new doctrines:

"3. That the fact of important maritime powers, such as Spain and the United States, having declined to accede to the Declaration of Paris, deprives that document of any value as between the governments that have signed it:

"4. That the consequence of some powers adhering to the new rules whilst others retained intact their natural rights in time of war would be to place the former at a great and obvious disadvantage in the event of hostilities with the latter:

"5. That Great Britain being an essentially naval power this House cannot contemplate such an anomalous and unsatisfactory condition of international obligations without grave misgivings:

"6. That independently of other considerations the failure, after twenty years negotiations, to bring about general adhesion to its terms necessitates the withdrawal of this country from what was necessarily and on the face of it a conditional and provisional assent to the new rules:

"7. That this House, while desiring to leave the question of opportuneness to the discretion of Her Majesty's Government, and having confidence in the repeated declarations on the subject of individual members of the present Administration, think it desirable to record an opinion that no unnecessary delay ought to take place in withdrawing from the Declaration signed at Paris on the 16th April 1856 on the subject of Maritime Belligerent Rights," said, when I put these Resolutions on the Journals of the House, it was with the anticipation and belief that the whole question involved therein would have been previously fully discussed in "another place," and enabled your Lordships and the country generally to appreciate the arguments on each side. That there are cogent and weighty arguments to be urged on the opposite side I am well aware; but as this discussion in the other House has been defeated by a manœuvre, I prefer not to take up your Lordships' time by entering at length on this important subject, and I will confine myself to exposing in a very few words some of what I may term the popular fallacies which have lately been reproduced publicly, and endeavour to show that they will not bear the test of close examination. These are—first, the Declaration is of the nature of a Treaty,

Eastern languages in Europe, and he doubted whether he should ever have acquired the little he knew of any Eastern language without having first obtained a grounding in them there. In conclusion, the noble Lord quoted the following opinion of Colonel Yule as given in his Minute of the 22nd of January last in support of the third proposition in his Notice:—

“Taking the mass of our candidates young, I should be disposed to support also the scheme which would provide for the nomination of a small, defined number of older men who had taken honours at the Universities without competition. In this way we should get a few men of maturer culture who might be valuable in various special lines of employment.”

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, his noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Alderley) wished the Arabic, Persian, and Sanskrit languages to be included in the competitive examination by which candidates for the Indian Civil Service were selected, and also to enter into the probationary course through which the candidates had to pass before proceeding to India. Now, the object of the competitive examination was not to select persons ready at once to take part in the Indian Civil Service, but to select the raw material out of which Indian Civil servants might be manufactured. The probationary course was the process of that manufacture, and those languages to which the noble Earl referred might form a part of that course. But, if they allowed those languages to be a principal element in the preliminary competitive examination, they would not attain their object—which was to get the best educated English youth of the time. Therefore he could not recommend any great change in the arrangement of subjects for the preliminary examination. But as to the subsequent probationary course, there was such an amount of authority in favour of the cultivation of Sanskrit, Arabic, and Persian that his noble Friend might rest satisfied there was no danger of their being neglected. The third part of his noble Friend's Question raised on a very small point a very large controversy—namely, as to competitive examination. Now, he (the Marquess of Salisbury) was himself no superstitious admirer of competitive examination, and if sufficient cause were shown he would not object, in certain cases, to an alternative system. But the principle of competitive examination had this advantage—that it was suited to our present social and political condition. It did not inflict a sense of injury or of inequality in those persons who might be anxious to obtain appointments in the Civil Service; while it also saved our public men from the temptation, or—what was still more important—from the suspicion of using their patronage for Party ends. For those objects—and especially for the last—competitive examination, though it might not be the best system that could be devised, was a good one; and from what he had seen of official life, he thought in these days the position of the head of a Public Office would be simply intolerable but for that system; whatever effect it might have on the candidates or the public, it was the very charter of safety to the heads of those Departments. But it nevertheless had drawbacks. For instance, it treated literary proficiency as if it were the sole qualification, or rather as if it were a sufficient guarantee, for all other qualifications requisite for the government of men—whereas there were historical examples in which men of no literary proficiency whatever had shown remarkable fitness for the government of men and the administration of kingdoms. But, whatever those drawbacks might be, they had the satisfaction of knowing that in the opinion of the highest Indian authorities they had not been serious. Moreover, the suggestion of his noble Friend that they should take men who had won University honours would not meet the difficulty of the case. If there was any other way of getting at the qualities they required besides literary proficiency to fit men for high position, he should be glad to know it. For himself he had given up the search in despair. In their present political condition he did not think any principle of selection which savoured of nomination would work satisfactorily. He was now only speaking of the Indian Civil Service, with which he was acquainted.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he quite agreed with the noble Marquess as to the two reasons he had given in favour of competitive examination. He could not conceive of a more complete answer to the objections which had been taken to that system than was furnished by the Blue Book on that subject. The evidence contained in those Papers was most conclusive that not only did the principle of competitive examination enable them to avoid the difficulty of selection on which the noble Marquess had laid great stress, but also to hit upon a method which, upon the whole, gave them the best material for their purpose. With regard to any advantages to be held out to young men undergoing a probationary training for the Indian Civil Service at the Universities, he hoped that the University of London would not be excluded from the benefits of such an arrangement. Young men trained at King's College and University College, London, would not only have the advantages of University discipline and instruction, but could follow the practice of the Courts much better in London than in a University town.

In reply to Lord WAVENEY,

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, said, that in the regulations which had been made in reference to the teaching of the languages in question, there had been no desire to make any special provision which should be more favourable to Oxford or Cambridge than to any other University, but simply that an advantage should be given to the University which made provision for such teaching. The University of London had a concrete form, various Colleges being combined with it. There was nothing in the regulations which limited them to Oxford and Cambridge, and it might be desirable to bring the University of London within them.

WILD FOWL PRESERVATION BILL.

(The Lord Henniker.)

(NO. 134.) THIRD READING.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

LORD COLVILLE of CULROSS, who said he had placed an Amendment on the Paper, pointed out that grouse and blackcock shooting commenced on August 20th and ended on December 10, and yet all through the months from December to May blackcock was offered for sale at a shop in the Strand. He might be told that the birds came from Norway; but that was no reason why the law should be evaded, and thus be an inducement to persons to resort to poaching in this country. He would not move his Amendment because he did not desire to obstruct the passing of the Bill, though it was in an imperfect form.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he also had an Amendment on the Paper, but for the same reason would not move it. He hoped next Session a Bill amending the law would be brought forward.

LORD HENNIKER said, he must thank the noble Earl (Earl Granville) and the noble Lord (Lord Colville) for not impeding the progress of the Bill by inserting Amendments, and so, perhaps, defeating it for this Session, not only in the interest of sport, but in the interest of the consumer. He must state, in justice to the large dealers, that they were in favour of the Bill. He thought the thanks of the House were due to the noble Lord for calling attention to the fact that black game and other birds were sold out of season in London, but that hardly came within the scope of the Bill. Surely, the law was sufficiently stringent now to prevent these illegal sales. If, too, these birds came from Norway, he must remind the noble Lord that the game laws in Norway were far more stringent than our own. He had every hope the Bill would work well. It was drawn on the same lines as the Sea-birds Protection Act, and that had worked well. However, he would certainly take the suggestions made by the noble Earl and the noble Lord, and if it did not work well, he would endeavour to deal more completely with the question another year.

Bill passed.

BANKERS BOOKS EVIDENCE BILL.

(The Lord Aberdare.)

(NO. 159.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD ABERDARE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to facilitate the proof of transactions, according to bankers' ledgers and account books in legal proceedings. The Bill accordingly provided, first, that entries in such books should be admissible in all legal proceedings as prima facie evidence, on affidavit by a partner or manager that such entries had been made in the usual course of business; secondly, copies of such entries might be admissible on affidavit by a person who had examined them, that such copies were correct—in which case the originals need not be produced; and thirdly, on application of any of the parties the Court might order that such party be at liberty to inspect and take copies of any such entries relating to the matters in question.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had no objection to the principle of the Bill; but before it was finally passed, it would be necessary to have an accurate definition of what was a “banker,” within the meaning of the Bill; otherwise the books of private firms might be brought within its operation.

Motion agreed to; Bill read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord President.)

(No. 150.) COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

EARL FORTESCUE expressed his regret that owing to indisposition he had been unable to be present on the second reading. He now wished to express his general approval of the Bill, and his hope that Her Majesty's Government, encouraged by the success which had attended their efforts to codify the sanitary legislation of the country, would persevere until they had reduced to order and system the chaotic mass of Poor Law legislation which had accumulated since the passing of the new Poor Law in 1834. He would remind their Lordships that in the discussion on the second reading, the question was raised by several noble Lords as to the expediency of making Unions coterminous with counties. A Return when presented to Parliament in 1869, showed that out of 760 Unions in England, 590 were wholly in counties, and 170 were as to their great bulk in the counties—that was to say, not comprising more than a few parishes which were in two or more counties. The question of having Unions coterminous with counties would be a very difficult one to deal with. He thought the powers proposed to be conferred on the Boards of Guardians by the clauses comprehended under the division of “Poor Law Amendments” were so many steps in the right direction.

Lord Aberdare

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 32, inclusive, agreed to, with Amendments.

EARL FORTESCUE moved, after Clause 32, to insert a new clause, having for its object the granting of medical relief, in urgent cases of accident or disease, on loan—that was to say, where the circumstances of the family or individual were not fully known at the time, the Guardians should pay for the medical relief, and obtain payment when the person or family relieved could afford to discharge the debt. Now, if a relieving officer gave an order for medical relief, and the Guardians did not afterwards sanction it, the medical practitioner could sue the relieving officer for the debt, and that became a matter of great hardship. The course which he now proposed would prevent many persons from becoming pauperized.

Moved, after Clause 32 to insert new clause—

“Where medical relief is granted on loan, the guardians may declare that the same is so granted, and they may recover from the person to whom such relief is granted the reasonable cost of the same as if it were money relief granted on loan.”

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that he could not accept the clause, as he thought the present law enabled the Guardians to do all that was necessary.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought that many persons now obtained medical relief, who were perfectly well able to pay for the advice and medicine given.

After some discussion, in which Lord HENNIKER, Lord WINMARLEIGH, and Lord EGERTON of TATTON took part,

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON was understood to say that though he would not promise that any alteration in the clause could be made, yet he would before the Report consider the question again, and see whether anything could be done.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

EARL FORTESCUE moved to insert another new clause—

“All medical or other relief given or ordered by the relieving officer or overseers in cases of emergency during the interval between the meetings of the board of guardians shall be deemed to have been given on loan and be recoverable accordingly, unless either disallowed or allowed as relief by the board of guardians at their first or subsequent meeting.'

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he objected to the clause on the same ground as he had objected to the previous one—namely, that the Guardians had now full power to do everything which the Amendment would enable them to do.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

Remaining Clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Thursday next, and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 181.)

ARMY—VETERINARY DEPARTMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it has been decided whether the appointment of Principal Veterinary Surgeon in the Army is to be held for life, or only for a limited period like other Staff appointments in the Cavalry, which are held for five years; and, when he will be prepared to produce the new warrant relative to the Veterinary Surgeons which has been so long delayed?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that it had been decided that the Principal Veterinary Surgeon should be appointed for seven years, the same as the Director General of the Army Medical department.

THE RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY.

QUESTIONS.

MR. MACDONALD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been drawn to the following paragraph in the Report of the Select Committee on the Railway Passenger Duty, which states:—

"Your Committee regret that for so long a period no steps were taken to obtain an authoritative legal decision on a point so critical and important, especially as by this omission a considerable sum has been lost to the Public Revenue;"

whether the sum there mentioned amounts to several millions sterling; whether it was with the authority of the Treasury that the Board of Inland Revenue did not collect the money that became due as Railway Passenger duty by the judgment of the House of Lords; whether the Commissioners of Inland Revenue did not overstep their duty when they took upon themselves to remit and rebate taxes legally due; and, if any steps have been taken by the Government to ensure that there will be no remission of taxes without the consent of Parliament?

MR. MACDONALD also asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it be the intention of the Government to take any action this Session on the recommendations contained in the Report of the Select Committee on the Railway Passenger Duty which has been presented to the House; and, if not, if the present mode of assessment of the Duty is to be continued, or if the Duty is to be assessed in accordance with the judgment of the House of Lords; and, whether the inspection and audit of the accounts of the Railway Companies of Great Britain, as carried on for the last seven years by an accountant of the Inland Revenue Department, as stated in the evidence of Mr. Rickman before the Select Committee, is still being carried on by that office; if not, what is being done in the matter?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the paragraph in the Report of the Select Committee on the Railway Passenger Duty, from which a passage was quoted in the Question of the hon. Member. The paragraph as it appeared in the Report of the Committee was fuller than that introduced by the hon. Member into his Question, for it ran thus—

“Especially as by this omission either a considerable sum had been lost to the public revenue, or Parliament had been deprived of an earlier opportunity of dealing with the subject.”

He observed that these words were adopted not unanimously, but no doubt by a considerable majority of the Committee. He had not yet had the opportunity of seeing the evidence on which the paragraph was founded, and he apprehended it would be impossible for him to give a positive answer or to discuss the question until they saw the evidence. With regard to the second Question, he was unable to say whether any public money could properly be said to have been lost at all. Certainly he was unable to say, if any sum had been lost, that it amounted to several millions sterling. He believed the fact shortly was this—some 30 years ago an exception was granted from railway duty to railway passenger trains fulfilling certain conditions. There was no idea for many years that those conditions were not fulfilled by trains failing to stop at every station. From the year 1844 to 1867 the tax was remitted on a number of trains only. If the tax had been exacted from all trains, no doubt the duty would have amounted to a considerable sum; but he was informed that the amount which might under any circumstances have been received would not in any case have amounted to the sum the hon. Member seemed to suppose. He asked—

, Mr. Macdonald

“Whether it was with the authority of the Treasury that the Board of Inland Revenue did not collect the money that became due as Railway Passenger Duty by the judgment of the House of Lords?”

The Board of Inland Revenue were advised that they had no power to collect that duty; at all events, they never asked the authority of the Treasury on the subject. Certainly, whatever might be the legal point in question, it would be inequitable to call on shareholders of the present day to pay money that might possibly have been demanded from shareholders some years before. With regard to the intentions of the Government, they waited till they saw the evidence and had time to consider it; but as to the question whether the present mode of assessing the duty was to be continued or a mode in accordance with the judgment of the House of Lords, he had to say that the present mode of assessment was not inconsistent with the judgment of the House of Lords. He was unable to give any answer to the latter part of the hon. Member's last Question. He did not know what evidence Mr. Rickman had given.

TURKEY — ALLEGED ATROCITIES IN BULGARIA.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true that the British Consul at Adrianople has made reports, either to Sir Henry Elliot or to the Foreign Office, confirming the accounts published in the “Daily News” of the atrocities committed by the Turks in Bulgaria; and, whether it is not a fact that our Ambassador at Constantinople some time ago remonstrated with the Turkish Government in regard to these outrages?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman had asked the Question when he gave Notice of it, it would have been my duty to say that the Consul at Adrianople had made no reports confirmatory of the statements in The Daily News, and, consequently, that the Ambassador at Constantinople could have made no remonstrances on the subject. But since Notice was given of the Question we have received intimations of an interesting kind relating to the matter. I promised the House, on a former occasion, when the Government were in possession of authentic information on the subject, and when we had received answers from Sir Henry Elliot, after repeated inquiries, I would state the result to the House, and I am prepared to do so to-day; but I think, perhaps, it would be more convenient to allow the course of Questions to be proceeded with now, and on moving the Order of the Day I may be permitted to make a statement.

BRUSSELS—INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION—SICK AND WOUNDED SOLDIERS.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to take advantage of the opportunity now afforded by the exhibition at Brussels by Austria, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, and Switzerland, of the latest inventions and appliances for aiding and transporting sick and wounded soldiers in time of war, and send two or more Commissioners to inspect and report to the War Office upon that important International collection?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that already Professor Longmore had been selected for the purpose, and he intended to associate with him a member of the Hospital Staff.

EGYPT—IMPRISONMENT OF GENERAL KIRKHAM.—QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that a British subject named Kirkham was some time ago detained by the Egyptian authorities at Massowah on his way from Abyssinia to England; whether he is still imprisoned without trial; whether there is any prospect of his release; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table any Correspondence which has taken place on the subject? He might add, that since he came down to the House he had heard it reported that General Kirkham died recently.

MR. BOURKE: Sir, in the beginning of June it came to the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government that the British subject alluded to in the Question of the hon. Member was imprisoned at Massowah. He is better known under the name of General Kirkham, late Commander-in-Chief of the Abyssinian Army, and was taken prisoner by the Egyptians last spring, being at that time engaged in hostilities against the Egyptian Army. At the time that Her Majesty's Government were first informed of his imprisonment, they were also informed that he was suffering from alleged harsh treatment by the Egyptian officials at Massowah. Under those circumstances Her Majesty's Government brought these facts to the notice of the Egyptian Government, and on the 6th of June Cherif Pasha assured our Consular authority in Egypt that there was no foundation whatever for the statement that General Kirkham had been treated with any harshness; that he was supplied with everything that was necessary for his comfort, and allowed to take exercise in the open air, and the confinement to which he is subjected is no stricter than is necessary to prevent his communicating with his political and military allies and associates. As to the second part of the Question, being taken prisoner of war, he would, I conclude, not be subject to any trial. Whether there is any prospect of his release I am unable to say at present. If my hon. Friend would like to see the correspondence he is welcome to do so, but I do not think that any advantage would accrue to General Kirkham by its being made public. I regret to hear that Kirkham has lately died, but Her Majesty's Government are in no way to blame for it.

NAVY—H.M.S. "VANGUARD."

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he will add to the Return, "Navy (Loss of the Vanguard), No. 98, I.," ordered by the House on the 14th March, an amended Return, containing a plate illustrating the "Wing Passage Bulkhead: its purposes and uses," and other information as originally ordered, provided he is satisfied that it will not be necessary to hire a special artist and to go to great expense for copper plates?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, if the hon. and gallant Member would call on him at the Admiralty, he would see what could be done in the way of accomplishing the object desired in the Question.

UNITED STATES — INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, PHILADELPHIA—THE BRITISH COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is the fact that the representatives of some of the principal journals of Germany and Belgium at Philadelphia have refused to describe any of the British or Colonial exhibits on the ground of want of information and courtesy at the British Commission Office; and is the Government aware that dissatisfaction is felt by British and Colonial exhibitors at Philadelphia with the management of the arrangements and conduct of the office under the control of the British Commissioners; and, if so, whether it is their intention to remodel the constitution of the Commission, or take other means to remove the causes for dissatisfaction?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, in consequence of the hon. Member's Question I caused inquiries to be made at the various Government Departments concerned in the matter, and no information has reached the Privy Council, the Foreign Office, or the Colonial Office which would support the allegations made in the Question of the hon. Member.

ARMY—PATENTED INVENTIONS—SMALL ARMS.—QUESTION.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether the decision of the House of Lords of the 11th instant in the case of Dixon versus the London Small Arms Company, that the Crown is excluded from the free use of patented inventions, except within the manufactories and departments of the Crown, will not practically limit the supply of small arms to those made at the Royal Factory at Enfield; and, whether the resources of that manufactory are not utterly inadequate to the wants of the Country in case of any great emergency?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: I am advised that the decision of the House of Lords only precludes the Crown from the free use of patented inventions. But this does not prevent the Crown from obtaining arms by contract, provided the Crown pays the usual Royalties. 2. The resources of the Government Factory at Enfield are quite equal to any emergency that can be foreseen. I may remind my hon. and gallant Friend upon this question of that which I stated upon the Estimates—namely, that at the close of the financial year we shall have about 376,000 Martini-Henry rifles out of a total of 891,000 breech-loading arms.

TURKEY—CONSULAR MEMORANDUM ON HERZEGOVINA.—QUESTION.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, quoting a published despatch from Mr. Consul Holmes, which promised further observations on the grievances of Herzegovina, asked, Whether those further observations had been received?

MR. BOURKE: No, Sir; Mr. Consul Holmes has not sent any such observations as those alluded to by the hon. Member for Poole. I have no doubt that he was prevented from doing so by press of business; but in October Consul Holmes sent a Memorandum upon the affairs of Herzegovina through Sir Henry Elliot, and, if the hon. Gentleman will wait a few days, he will see that Memorandum in the Papers which will be presented to Parliament very shortly.

SEAL FISHERIES ACT, 1875 — CLOSE TIME.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether arrangements have yet been made by which the Provisions of the Act of 1875, establishing a close time for the Seal Fishery, shall be carried into effect next year?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the provisions of the Act of last year were to empower the Queen, by Order in Council, to make a close time for seal fishing when it appeared that the foreign States engaged in the same fishery did the same. Her Majesty's Government put themselves immediately in communication with the three foreign Governments concerned. The Norwegian Storting have passed a law practically similar to our own. The German and Dutch Governments have Bills prepared for the establishment of a close season, but we have not yet received information of their becoming law. The consequence is that nothing further can be done in the matter until those countries establish the needed restrictions by law.

ECCLESIASTICAL ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department a Question of which I have given him private Notice. He was understood to say the other night that the Ecclesiastical Assessments Bill would be proceeded with to-night, and I now wish to ask whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Bill this Session?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I regret very much that my answer the other night was misunderstood. What I meant to say, and what I believe I did say, was that I should be prepared to-night to state what the Government intended to do as regarded that Bill; and I may now say that, as I see no chance of the Bill passing this Session, I think it will be better to withdraw it.

LISBON TRAMWAYS COMPANY—TWY-CROSS v. GRANT.—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: I rise, Sir, under feelings of considerable difficulty to ask the House of Commons to give me a measure of their indulgence while I allude to a personal matter deeply affecting myself and my position in this House. I will try to make as short a statement as I can; and I never should have brought myself or my affairs before the House of Commons had it not been that on a very recent occasion one of the most distinguished men and one of the most distinguished Judges of the land, while summing up the evidence in a recent financial case, alluded to the conduct of a certain body of gentlemen, of whom I was one, and distinctly stated that their conduct, in his opinion, required explanation, and he hoped, if they had any explanation, it would be given, for it was needed. Sir, I hope that before I sit down what I shall be able to show to the House will be as satisfactory to the noble and learned Lord and to this House as it certainly is to my own conscience. I need not say more than that I am alluding to the now celebrated Lisbon pany at the solicitation of the Duke de Saldanha, and in consequence of my knowledge of Portugal, of Lisbon, and of the country generally. All that was told me was that I was to have as my colleagues a very distinguished body of men, including, among others, the then Chairman of the Union Bank of London and the then Chairman of the London and South Western Railway, and that our fees were to be £100 sterling per annum. I beg to say, Sir, that I knew nothing whatever of the preliminary contracts, agreements, or other arrangements which it now appears were made between the promoters of the company and the Duke de Saldanha and the contractors. I have letters in my pocket which I could produce, but I know that my word will go as far as the letters, in which every one of these gentlemen distinctly states that neither directly nor indirectly had I the slightest knowledge of any one of these agreements, contracts, &c., which have been the subject of discussion in a Court of Law; and, more than that, Sir, I can say I had never seen the contractors until I joined the Board, and I never saw Mr. Grant, the principal promoter, from the time of his leaving the House of Commons until after the prospectus was issued. Here do not let me be supposed to be throwing a stone at Mr. Grant in the time of his difficulties; I am merely stating it as a fact to show that there was no personal communication whatever between me and the promoters of the company until I formally took my seat on the Board as a director at £100 a year. The next point I will run over as quickly as I can, because I know I am trespassing upon the goodwill of the House. I have had a seat in this House 30 years, and I prize very much the esteem and goodwill of every Member of it. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, in the undoubted exercise of his right, commented, though not so strongly as other Judges have done, upon the practice of directors receiving qualification shares. I received my qualification shares—100, and of these I returned 50 when I left the Company. I assure you beyond that, that I invested my own money in 300 shares of the Company. I am not here to defend now, according to present views of the matter, the system of qualifying directors; but I do think I may fairly say that at that time—and it is five years since these transactions occurred—the practice was well known to every hon. Member of this House, that no objection was ever made to it, and it was considered to be the ordinary way of remunerating directors. I have to state, in addition, that with the exception of those 100 shares, which I did not know were furnished by the contractors—and I have a letter from the contractors, Messrs. Clark and Punchard, saying that I could not know it—that except these 100 shares I never received any money payment, shares, or remuneration whatever, direct or indirect, for my position on that Board, and I am a large loser by the non-success of the Company. Now, Sir, the next point the noble and learned Lord made—and he spoke most strongly—was contained in these words—

“How, after the engineer's report and Mr. Grant's urgent letters requesting that the money should be returned for the line, he really could not understand the conduct of the directors, and that conduct required explanation.”

I entirely agree with the Lord Chief Justice that if the directors had received Mr. Grant's urgent and, as the Lord Chief Justice called them, manly letters requesting them to discontinue the line and return the money to the shareholders, and had then gone on with the line, that their conduct would have required explanation which it would have been difficult to give. But I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. Punchard stating in the most solemn manner that these letters of Mr. Grant were never laid before the Board of Directors at all, and that I could not have known anything of the matter. More than that, these manly letters, as the Lord Chief Justice called them, which Mr. Grant wrote, were not at all written with reference to the line which the directors went on with, which they ultimately carried out, and which was worked for a year and a-half. I say this distinctly, and in so many words—that Mr. Grant's letters were never seen by the Board of Directors. They were a protest against the engineer's, Mr. Trevethick's, remarks on the Cascaes line, where the gradients were bad, and the distance round to Cintra from Lisbon was doubled. The line actually carried out was one the concession for which was obtained by the Duke de Saldanha, and which was in a straight line from Lisbon to Cintra.

Lord Henry Lennor

The directors did more than that, for, having altered the route from that laid down in the prospectus, they issued a circular to the shareholders saying what they intended to do and asking for their approval, and that request and demand were ratified by a general meeting two months afterwards at the Company's offices. Sir, I only wish to say that I make this explanation to-night as an independent Member of the House. Feeling and knowing that there was a feeling that I have been mixed up with practices with which I ought not to have been mixed up, five years ago, I felt that the most honourable, the most straightforward, and the most manly conduct that I could pursue was to place my resignation of the high office which it has been my privilege to hold for three years in the hands of the Prime Minister, and patiently to await any attacks that came from any part of this House. I will only say, in conclusion, that deeply as I regret the loss of my position at the Board of Works, I would willingly yield up that or any other post of high trust, so long as I can continue to enjoy the esteem and goodwill of this great Assembly, in which the better part of my life has been passed.

MR. DISRAELI: Before I avail myself, Sir, of the permission of the House to speak on the Order of the Day on the subject to which I have adverted, I wish to refer to the remarks made by my noble Friend. I think it due to him and to the House to say that all I know of this affair is that I received a written intimation from an hon. Gentleman who sits opposite that it was his intention to make certain charges against my noble Friend to-day. I have had no authentic statement of any charges against my noble Friend, and having confidence in his honour and conduct, I have never credited them. But I felt it was my duty, under the circumstances, to communicate to my noble Friend that I had received this intimation, and I left him to consider what course he would take. My noble Friend, with that delicacy which the House will appreciate, said these things had happened five years ago, when he was not a Member of the Government, and he wished to defend his conduct as one who was not now a Member of the Government. ^{It that it would} be a posi ^{story to him if,} as an independent and private Member, he vindicated his conduct, and therefore he tendered me his resignation. I have been present in this House to answer the Question the Notice of which was given to me privately, but that Question has not been put to me to-night. The House has heard the statement of my noble Friend, and, without misinterpreting the feeling of the House, I think it is one not unworthy of himself. I have no wish to precipitate any decision on the subject at this moment, but I could not reconcile it to my own feelings not to say these few words.

MR. TREVELYAN: So much has passed in letters not marked "private" between myself, the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, and the noble Lord who has likewise addressed the House, in a manner so creditable, I must say, to his feelings, that I would rather not leave this matter without explanation to the chance gossip of the Lobbies. Therefore, I will just say this—that the right hon. Gentleman has slightly misunderstood the letter I addressed to him. I did not say in that letter that I was prepared with any charges against the noble Lord, or that I would put the Question to the right hon. Gentleman to-day. I felt that in a matter of such extreme delicacy the main object of every one who wished to approach it as a public man should be to give the Government the power of acting first in the matter. So on Friday I wrote a private letter to the right hon. Gentleman informing him that I should to-day—not put a Question to him, but give public Notice of a Question of certainly a most open nature. The Question, which I do not happen to have in my pocket, was, so far as I recollect, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what course he proposed to pursue in consequence of the facts affecting the Chief Commissioner of Works which had been brought to light during the proceedings of the trial "Twycross v. Grant?" It was never my intention to press the noble Lord, as the right hon. Gentleman has mistakenly understood, by putting that Question without first of all a long private and then a long public Notice. Of course, after what has passed, I shall enter into the case further, but I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that it is a case susceptible of two colours. That which is put upon it by those who regard it only from a public point of view. That was the case with myself, for I never even heard of the Lisbon Tramways Company until two months ago, when I read of it in The Times, and when I determined as a public man to go to the bottom of the business. There is also the colour most naturally put upon it by the noble Lord who was concerned in it, and who, I think, yielded, I will say in some excess, in some cases to indiscretion and imprudence. I had, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman, good reason for calling the attention of the House to this matter, for the result which I expected has been that which has been brought about. I thought it was necessary to press for that result as a tribute to public morality, and, as that result has been brought about, I shall not say one additional word.

TURKEY—ALLEGED ATROCITIES IN BULGARIA.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, before I read to the House the despatches that have been received by the Government from Sir Henry Elliot since the Question of which Notice was given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), with the indulgence of the House I should wish to make, in as condensed a shape as possible, a reference to certain previous circumstances, as otherwise they will be unintelligible. I will endeavour to do that with the utmost brevity possible, and with the wish to avoid all controversial matter; but it is necessary that the House should understand what is the opinion of the Government, formed on the best information they have in their possession, as to the origin of those disturbances in Bulgaria that have led to these terrible deeds. The first information received by the Government was in a series of despatches received May 15th from Sir Henry Elliot at the outbreak of these disturbances, and was as follows:—

"On the 4th of May Sir Henry Elliot reported that an outbreak had occurred at the village of Otloukeni, not far from Philippopoli, and that it was known that revolutionary agents were working actively among the Bulgarians, and that arms and ammunition had been introduced in considerable quantities. On the 7th of May the Turkish Government at once despatched 5,000 troops to the spot, and there is little doubt that the leaders were Servians and other emissaries of the Revolutionary Committees."

That was the statement of Sir Henry Elliot; but this was the statement of M. Dupuis, our Consul at Adrianople, the nearest Consulate to the scene of disturbance, upon the matter to which the Question of the right hon. Member for Montrose referred. M. Dupuis reported—

"That the organizers of the movement were pursuing the same atrocious policy as was followed in Herzegovina by burning and ravaging all villages, whether Mussulman or Christian, if the inhabitants refused to join them."

"The Austrian Consular Agent at Philippopoli reported that five villages had been burnt by the insurgents."

"On the 9th of May, Consul Reade, Rustchuck, reports that a Circassian village—this is important to notice—near Avratalan had been burnt, and the Circassians were sure to take their revenge. On the 12th of May Consul Dupuis reports that the local authorities, as well as the Turkish Boys, were enrolling Bashi Bazouks and other volunteers, and that the burning by the insurgents of the village called Bellova seems to have been attended by horrible cruelties to the small Turkish Guard in charge of the place, who, being overpowered, were hacked to pieces by the insurgents. He also reported that he had heard from the Greek Consul that the Greeks in Philippopoli united with the Turkish Guards to maintain order and to repel any attempt on the place by the insurgents. Consul Reade also reported that the discipline of the Turkish troops was admirable."

That is the origin, so far as the Government have authentic information, of the atrocities in Bulgaria. It is necessary for various reasons, as we shall see, that the House should be acquainted with these events, because I must ask the House to consider first who were these Circassians, who, no doubt, perpetrated great atrocities, and whose conduct has been retaliated upon and revenged in the same spirit. The Circassians are described in the public journals, and I know in conversation, as irregular troops of the Turkish Government; but the fact is, they are not irregular troops of the Turkish Government, or of any other Government. They are the men, or the descendants of the men, who 20 years ago commanded the sympathy and admiration of the House of Commons. They are men who, at the Treaty of Paris, a very strong Party in the House of Commons, consisting of Members of both sides of the House, believed were extremely ill-treated by the English Government in particular. In consequence of their country being yielded up to Russia, a great proportion of the population refused to live under the Russian Government, and appealed to their Suzerain, then the Sultan, to give them lands in part of his dominions. In consequence there was a considerable migration of the population, and they were portioned out in various parts of Turkey, not only in Europe, but in Asia. These men have lived peaceably for 20 years. Their conduct has been satisfactory, and there has been no imputation on them of savage or turbulent behaviour. They have cultivated farms and built villages, and during the whole period I think there has been no complaint of these men. But we know, of course, what Eastern populations are, and the Circassians are a courageous and an armed population. Naturally, therefore, if their villages were burnt and their farms ravaged, it need not be a matter of surprise that they should take matters into their own hands and endeavour to avenge themselves. It is necessary that the House should be made aware of that. There prevailed there a guerilla warfare of local vengeance and personal passion, and there is no doubt that from that time, which was towards the end of May, scenes took place during this guerilla warfare of a description from which, with our feelings, we naturally recoil. But all this time, no doubt, our Consuls—and the House will soon have ample evidence of the fact—were in communication with the Ambassador, and the Ambassador was—I will not say remonstrating constantly with the Turkish Government, for the Turkish Government were most anxious to be guided by the advice of the British Ambassador, but he was using his influence with the Turkish Government to prevent, as much as he possibly could, these distressing scenes. The Grand Vizier said to our Ambassador that—"It is impossible to add to the stringency of the instructions he had sent to put an end to the disorders, and to disarm the Circassians, the Imperial authorities being ordered to do that by force, if they resisted, but that he (the Grand Vizier) noticed the omission of all mention of the horrors practised on the Mussulmans by those who had attempted to get up the insurrection."

There is no doubt, from the evidence before the House, that acts on both sides, as necessarily would be the case under such circumstances, were equally terrible and atrocious. Now, previously to this declaration of the Grand Vizier, Sir Henry Elliot said on the 16th of June that the Bulgarian insurrection appeared to be unquestionably put down, although he regretted to say with cruelty, and, in some places, with brutality. He said—

“I am not disposed to accept the accounts which come from the sources to which it would not be difficult to trace the origin of the movement, which are exaggerated to a degree which must deprive them of the slightest credit; but there is evidence that the employment of Circassians and Bashi-Bazouks has led to the atrocities which were to be expected.”

I have now stated to the House the origin of this insurrection, and given a general view of what subsequently occurred until the day on which the statement appeared in the newspaper which has been referred to in the Question of the right hon. Gentleman—namely, Monday, the 26th of June. The accounts of the Consuls which will be seen by hon. Gentlemen and the conduct of our Ambassador with regard to the Porte, which also will be made known to them in detail, are, no doubt, the results of a distressing state of affairs which a guerilla warfare in such a country and among such people must always furnish; but there was nothing in those accounts which at all justified the statements that appeared in the public Press, and which are the foundation of the Question of the right hon. Gentleman. On Monday, the 26th of June, the Duke of Argyll called attention to the first statement in The Daily News. I will not read that statement, because hon. Gentlemen are generally familiar with it and it is of considerable length. In the Blue Book it occupies many pages of print, and therefore I think it would be inconvenient if I were to read it in extenso on the present occasion. The statement is dated from Constantinople. It was headed “Moslem Atrocities in Bulgaria,” and it announced that 30,000 inhabitants had been slain, that 100 villages had been destroyed, that girls had been burnt alive, and that there had been a massacre of the children in the school-houses. A statement appeared the same day in another paper of equal authority—The Times—in which we were told that 10,000 persons were in prison and enduring torture. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: That was a fortnight after.] It was not after the Question was put to me. It was also said that 1,000 girls had been sold in open market. The consequence of this was that inquiries were made in both Houses of Parliament, and, immediately after the Question was put by the Duke of Argyll, Lord Derby telegraphed to Sir Henry Elliot. After he had telegraphed, however, there appeared in The Daily News an additional article, which occupies seven or eight printed pages in the book. Thereupon Lord Derby wrote a despatch, which, if the House will permit me, I will read, because it contains the cream, the pith of the statements in The Daily News, as they were put before our Ambassador by Lord Derby asking for inquiry—

“Foreign Office, July 13, 1876.

“Sir,—With reference to my despatch, No. 501, of the 28th ultimo, I enclose, for your Excellency's information, additional extracts from the “Daily News” of the 8th and 10th instant, reporting the occurrence of further atrocities in Bulgaria and elsewhere, and I have to inform your Excellency that this matter has been again under discussion in both Houses of Parliament. It is stated that in the district of Philippopoli alone 25,000 innocent lives have been taken, whilst by others the number is fixed at about 12,000. It is reported that upwards of sixty villages have been pillaged and burnt, and the inhabitants reduced to beggary and starvation. Large numbers of Bulgarian girls and children are said to have been sold publicly as slaves at Philippopoli and elsewhere, and numbers of Bulgarians to have been undergoing torture in prison. In one instance, where the fugitives fled for protection to a convent near Novo Selo, 40 girls were seized, violated, and subsequently burnt alive in a straw-loft. Similar atrocities are reported to have occurred at Gabrovo and other places, with the connivance, in many instances, of the Turkish authorities. I have to instruct your Excellency to report to me how far reliance is to be placed in these statements. Your Excellency has already on different occasions remonstrated with the Porte against the employment of Circassians and Bashi-Bazouks, to whom many acts of cruelty have been ascribed, and Her Majesty's Government desire that you should, whenever you have reason to believe it necessary, urgently impress upon the Porte to see that its irregular forces are kept from committing atrocities which discredit the Ottoman cause. Her Majesty's Government trust that the reports which have been circulated, and to which I have referred in this despatch, will prove to be unfounded. In a conflict such as is now taking place in European Turkey, it is, unhappily, almost inevitable that acts of unnecessary violence and bloodshed should at times occur, and should give rise to reprisals on the other side. But the Porte will not deny that it is the duty of a civilized Government to use its utmost endeavours for the repression of such barbarities on the part of its own forces. The emergency of the moment or the nature of the country may render the employment of irregular troops a matter of necessity; but, unless these are kept under proper control, it is probable that the indignation which will be roused throughout Europe by the accounts of cruelties and outrages, and the sympathy felt for the inhabitants of the oppressed districts, may go far to counterbalance any material successes which the use of such undisciplined levies may secure. Her Majesty's Government feel, therefore, that they are acting in the interests of Turkey herself, no less than in those of humanity, in warning the Porte against the toleration of acts committed by its troops which would arouse the reprobation of the civilized world."

The House will observe that I am now trying to put before them the statements which appeared in The Daily News. I have given the pith of the first statement in The Daily News, and I have allowed the House to collect the pith of the second statement from this despatch of Lord Derby. I will now proceed to read the further statements which were made by The Daily News before we recently communicated with Sir Henry Elliot. After the two long communications to which I have been referring there appeared the following in The Daily News of July 10th:—

"(By Submarine Telegraph.)

"(From our own Correspondent.)

"Paris, Sunday night.

"A Vienna telegram, dated this day, published by the 'Courrier de France,' says:—

"'A horrible massacre of Christians, lasting two days, has just occurred at Gabrovo and surrounding villages. There were upwards of 10,000 victims. The Turk sent from Constantinople to direct the slaughter is Ibrahim Bey.'"

On the 13th of July Lord Derby wrote to Sir Henry Elliot as follows:—

"Foreign Office, July 13, 1876.

"I transmit to your Excellency a further extract from the "Daily News," reporting that in the district of Tatar Bazardjik cartloads of the heads of murdered women and children were boastfully paraded as their revenge after each defeat. It is, moreover, affirmed that Bulgarian women are now sold publicly in the streets. Her Majesty's Government are waiting to receive intelligence from your Excellency as to the truth of these reports."

The enclosure in the letter was as follows:—

"Belgrade, Tuesday night.

"In the Tatar Bazardjik district in Bulgaria, the Bashi-Bazouks have, it is said, boastfully paraded cartloads of heads of murdered women and children. These exhibitions are their revenge after each defeat. Young women are now, it is affirmed, regular articles of traffic, being sold publicly in the villages by the Tartars and the Turks."

There was one more telegram which appeared in The Daily News of the 13th of July, and Lord Derby at once telegraphed to Sir Henry Elliot as follows:—

"Foreign Office, July 13, 1876, 3 40 P.M.

"The following appears in the "Daily News" of to-day:—

"Belgrade, Tuesday night.

"In the Tatar Bazardjik district in Bulgaria, the Bashi-Bazouks have, it is said, boastfully paraded cartloads of heads of murdered women and children. These exhibitions are their revenge after each defeat. Young women are now, it is affirmed, regular articles of traffic, being sold publicly in the villages by the Tartars and the Turks."

"It is very important that Her Majesty's Government should be able to reply to the inquiries made in Parliament about these and similar statements of atrocities. Inquire by telegraph of the Consuls, and report as soon as you can."

The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster) pressed me more than once on that subject, and very properly so; but he will see from what I have read that there never was any delay on the subject on the part of Her Majesty's Government. I will now read the despatches which have come from Sir Henry Elliot in reference to this matter. I wish first to explain, however, that when I stated that we had not received any despatches from our Vice Consuls referring to statements in The Daily News, of course I did not allude to despatches received since our last telegram. This is Sir Henry Elliot's letter, dated, as the House will see, on the 6th, and received on the 14th, and it includes the statements of the Vice Consul, which I will not read as the House will have them in their hands so soon—

"Therapia, July 6, 1876.

"My Lord,—I have the honour to enclose two despatches from Mr. Vice Consul Dupuis upon the present state of Bulgaria, and the excesses committed in the suppression of the insurrection. These have unquestionably been very great, as was inevitable from the nature of the force which the Porte was, in the first emergency, obliged to employ, but it is equally certain that the details which have been given, coming almost exclusively from Russian and Bulgarian sources, are so monstrously exaggerated as to deprive them of much claim to attention. Cases of revolting cruelty have been mentioned in such a circumstantial manner as to make it almost impossible to doubt this truth, but which proved on investigation to be entirely fictitious; and, without impartial agents on the spot, I am unable to say more than that I am satisfied that, while great atrocities have been committed, both by Turks upon Christians and by Christians upon Turks, the former have been by far the greatest, although the Christians were undoubtedly the first to commence them. I have spoken to one of the most influential Bulgarians upon the subject of the sale of Bulgarian children, to which Mr. Dupuis alludes, and he told me that it had also been reported to him, but that he had been unable to ascertain that anything of the nature of a traffic in them was going on. Many fatherless children had been received both into Turkish and Greek families, but he looked upon them as having been taken chiefly out of charity. I said I had already made representations on the subject to the Porte, and he promised to give me the result of the further inquiries he was making on the subject; but that the Circassians, who have no compunction in selling the children of their own countrymen, would scruple to sell those of the Bulgarians is not to be supposed, and I have not a doubt that many such instances must have occurred. I have already informed your Lordship that very strict orders were given for the disarming of those lawless people, but the operation was found to be extremely difficult, and proceeded but slowly. For weeks past I have never seen one of the Turkish Ministers without insisting upon the necessity of at once putting an end to these excesses, and the answer has been invariably the same. They (the Turkish Ministers) deny that the cruelties have been upon a scale at all approaching to what they are represented; they point out that the horrors committed upon Turkish women and children are passed over in silence; and they plead that they had no alternative but to use the irregular force at their disposal to put down an unprovoked insurrection fomented from abroad, the authors of which are responsible for the sufferings which have been entailed upon both Christians and Mahomedans."

On the same day Sir Henry Elliot wrote again—

"Therapia, July 6, 1876.

"My Lord,—Since I wrote my preceding despatch the Greek Minister has called upon me, and spoke of a Report he had received from his Consul at Philippopoli, where there is no British Consular Agent. This report mentioned a marked improvement in the state of public security, and the disarming of the Mussulmans was being proceeded with. He said the Governor was acting extremely well, but was badly seconded by some of the other authorities. I asked whether any of the Greek Agents in Bulgaria had spoken of children being sold as slaves, and he replied that none of them had spoken of it."

We now come to a telegraphic communication from Sir Henry Elliot, dated "Constantinople, July 14." He says—

"I have been prevented by illness from replying to your Lordship's telegram about cruelties in Bulgaria until to-day. I can add little to the statements in my despatch of the 6th instant. There is no British Consular Agent except at Adrianople, Rustchuk, and Burgas, and they have seldom been able to guarantee the truth of the reports that reached them. There can be no doubt the instigators of the insurrection began by committing atrocities on Mussulmans and burning Bulgarian villages with the view of creating exasperation between the two races. In this they succeeded, and when the Bashi-Bazouks and Circassians were called out, they indulged in every kind of misconduct, killing and outraging numbers of innocent persons. I have not been able to verify the reports of cases of wholesale slaughter which have been brought forward, which come mostly from quarters not entitled to much confidence. A Bulgarian, upon whose statements I have several times made known cases of maltreatment to the Porte, assured me that the accounts published were grossly exaggerated, and he expressly stated that he had no complaint to make of the conduct of regular troops. It, however, appears from other sources that the regular troops have at other times been guilty of great excess. Bulgarian children have certainly been sold, but I cannot find that there has been anything like a regular traffic in them. Until I received your telegram I had heard nothing either of cart-loads of heads being paraded, or young women publicly sold, but I will make every possible inquiry. It was supposed here that the abuses had been put a stop to for some time."

Now I have given pretty well to the House, and without any concealment, the general character of the reports. Of course there will be details in some of the Consular reports, but it would be most wearisome for the House to be furnished with them now. The statements in the journals must be examined and compared, and they may be susceptible of various interpretations, but it would be impossible for me at this moment to enter into any discussion of this kind. The whole of the Papers will soon be in the hands of hon. Members. One statement, however, I think I ought to make. I ought to say that in consequence of Mr. Dupuis' despatch, which was the first despatch we had ever had from the Consul at Adrianople referring to cases at all like those related in The Daily News, he was ordered immediately to repair to the scene of these outrages. There is one thing which I think is consolatory amid these dreadful circumstances—there appears to be a complete failure throughout in creating anything like a religious war. I cannot trace in any manner that the feeling of religious animosity has prompted, I will not say every deed, but has prompted the general conduct of the masses of the population on either side; and the last telegraphic despatch which we received on Friday night from Sir Henry Elliot is so remarkable upon this subject that I think it my duty to read it to the House—

“Volunteers are offering themselves in considerable numbers for service against the Servians, and the Christians, both in the capital and in the provinces, are enrolling themselves. It is proposed to give the volunteer corps a flag, on which the crescent and the cross are displayed side by side. Nothing can be more striking in the present crisis than the almost unanimous loyalty shown by the Christians, and the hostility they feel against the Servian aggression.”

This despatch gives a different view from the one commonly circulated. I do not want to enter into any discussion now. There will be opportunities for doing so afterwards; but these statements made to Sir Henry Elliot on such high authority, and not as reports sent to him or as the result of his own observation, seemed so remarkable that I thought they ought to be communicated to the House. Without entering into controversial matters, I think I have placed the House fairly in possession of all the information which the Government have received, and which will enable them to form some general idea of what has occurred since the commencement of these terrible scenes, so that when we come, as I suppose we shall, to really discuss the subject, with the ample information which will then be in the hands of hon. Members, they will, at least, have something which will guide them in the investigation of these matters.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

[BILL 155.]

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Asheton Cross.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 14th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Administrative Provisions.

Clause 15 (Supplemental provisions as to certificates of proficiency and previous attendance at school).

On the Motion of Mr. RYLANDS, Amendment made in page 6, line 32, after “Act,” by inserting—

Mr. Disraeli

“And such certificate shall be granted to the child entitled to the same free of cost or charge to such child, or to the parent of such child.”

MR. DILLWYN moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 32, after “Act,” to insert—

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the Amendment was a very important one; but as it would to a great extent be provided for in the Code of next year, which would follow the policy of the present one, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was quite ready to withdraw his Amendment on that understanding.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, at end of line 39, to insert “certificates of age for the purposes of this Act and,” for the purpose of showing that they intended to insist upon certificates of age.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause further verbally amended, and, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 16 (Certificates of birth for purposes of Act).

MR. BIRLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 7, line 5, to leave out “one shilling,” and insert “sixpence.”

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he was informed by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Local Government Board that great resistance would be made by Registrars to the proposed reduction. The fee had already been reduced under pressure from the Education Department.

MR. RYLANDS suggested that the number of certificates being greatly increased, registrars would really have an addition made to their income if the fee were reduced from a shilling to sixpence.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped the hon. Member for Manchester would press his Amendment to a division. The question with him was whether they should demand any fee at all.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH appealed to the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council to concede the point.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the last thing he wished was to be hard upon the parents in this matter; but, after what he had said respecting the opinion of the Local Government Board, he felt bound to adhere to the clause as it stood.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER opposed the Motion, observing that the point had been very carefully considered, and they were of opinion that the amount should be that stated in the clause.

MR. MUNDELLA thought a shilling was a heavy charge to be made for the certificate if the parent had to pay it.

MR. MUNTZ supported the Amendment, as in many cases the question of sixpence was an important matter.

MR. WATNEY thought the certificate should be given gratis.

MR. BIRLEY said, he must carry the question to a division, because the charge would be a heavy one on a working man, and they were already putting him under considerable pressure.

MR. HERMON thought that one shilling was too high a charge, and he hoped it would be reduced.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should wish to consult the President of the Local Government Board on the subject before consenting to any alteration of the clause in this particular; but he desired to fall in with what appeared to be the very general feeling of the Committee. Perhaps the matter might be allowed to stand over for the present.

After some further discussion,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER proposed that the word "shilling" be struck out of the clause, and that the sum to be substituted for it should be left blank until after he had been able to confer with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board.

MR. BIRLEY said, he had no objection to that course, but he did not pledge himself to be bound by the views of the President of the Local Government Board.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Clause amended by striking out the words "one shilling," in page 7, line 5, and leaving the amount in blank.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 17 (Penalty for employing a child in contravention of Act).

COLONEL RUGGLES-BRISE moved, as an Amendment, in page 7, line 10, after "Act," to insert "after due warning in writing from the local authority," the object being that in the absence of warning no fine should be enforced against persons employing children in contravention of the provisions of the Act. It was but fair that in this matter employers should be placed upon the same footing as parents of children.

VISCOUNT SANDON opposed the Amendment, as he believed if it were adopted it must lead to very costly machinery to carry it out. Besides, it was really unnecessary. Under one of the earlier clauses of the Bill, the local authority was to give notice to all concerned of the provisions of the Bill, so that employers would have notice.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 18 (Provision as to bye-laws under Section 74 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 75), as extended by this Act), agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 19 (Failure of local authority to perform their duty under this Act).

MR. ISAAC moved, as an Amendment, in page 7, line 31, to leave out "any persons," and insert "registrar of births and deaths of the district, or other persons." He thought that that would be the best possible appointment when so much turned upon the ages of the children.

VISCOUNT SANDON objected to the Amendment as being calculated to fetter the hands of the Department.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 20 (Provision as to requisition of parish.)

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH proposed the omission of the latter part of the clause, which was to the effect that the requisition might be accompanied by representations made by resolution as to the nature of the bye-laws desired by the parish, and that in making and approving the bye-laws regard should be had to such representations. He thought it was going quite far enough to delegate the making of bye-laws to Boards of Guardians, and that it was going too far to ask ratepayers in public meeting to decide on these difficult questions. If the matter were left to individual parishes they would in one Union have various inconsistent bye-laws.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 17, to leave out all the words after the word "Board," to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth.)

VISCOUNT SANDON objected to the Amendment, and as to the clause explained that its only effect would be to enable the locality to express its wishes; as, for instance, whether there should be half-time or full-time attendance. Hitherto the school boards had full power to make bye-laws, and the result was there was infinite variety in the manner in which they had exercised the trust.

MR. W. E. FORSTER admitted that the clause called upon the locality to do more than it was required to do at present, and he thought that the section to which the Amendment applied would considerably fetter both the School Attendance Committee and the Department itself. There was no doubt that any representations made by the ratepayers would be felt, and would have their full weight with the School Attendance Committee.

MR. PAGET said, it was only maintaining the individuality of small places.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, school boards were amenable to ratepayers, but all the members of a School Attendance Committee would not be so amenable.

MR. ASSHETON supported the provision.

MR. DILLWYN thought it unworkable.

MR. A. MILLS said, the more local wishes were expressed the better.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that the Education Board would be placed in a strange position if they had to approve of all the various bye-laws which each separate parish might think fit for itself. The Guardians were quite competent to settle bye-laws without receiving instructions from each one of their vestries. He would ask whether regard was to be had to representations in favour of employing children under 10?

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the 7th clause of the Bill would prevent that. He was afraid that the views of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was "the old, old story"—the same proposal, in fact, which they had discussed fully earlier in the Committee and negatived—that the Boards of Guardians should be able to override the wishes of the ratepayers. He must adhere to the clause as it stood, and give the ratepayers the power of saying what sort of bye-laws they would have.

MR. BRISTOWE supported the Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would make a proposition which he hoped would be accepted by the noble Lord. The paragraph as it stood in the Bill went further than the noble Lord intended, and virtually meant that however absurd the bye-laws proposed by the ratepayers were, the Education Department would be obliged to assent to them. He suggested that the clause should read thus—

"And in making and approving bye-laws the School Attendance Committee and the Education Department shall consider the nature of the representations made to them."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE thought that to adopt the suggestion would be to give up the whole point for which they were contending. Their objection was to any parish meeting being called upon to deal with the details of the bye-laws.

VISCOUNT SANDON thought that it would be as well to adopt the form of words suggested by the right hon. Gentleman; but in his opinion, they were covered by the clause as it stood.

MR. RODWELL observed that in all legal proceedings the words "regard shall be had" meant no more than "be duly considered."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the only question was, whether it was desirable to give the parish meeting authority to make representations as to the nature of the bye-laws which they required. The Amendment suggested by the right hon. Member for Bradford would make the point clearer, and therefore might be adopted by the Committee.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that if the Education Department were to approve of the representations made by the parish, they would often have some very curious bye-laws to approve, and, if not, they would introduce an element of contention between the Guardians and the parish.

Question put,

"That the words 'The requisition may be accompanied by representations, made by a resolution passed in like manner, as to the nature of the bye-laws desired by the parish,' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 125; Noes 62: Majority 63.

Amendment (Mr. W. E. Forster) agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 21 (Officers of local authority); and Clause 22 (Provision as to powers and expenses of school board), severally agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 23 (Expenses of local authority other than school board).

On the Motion of Viscount SANDON, Amendment made in page 8, line 32, at commencement of Clause, by inserting—

"A school attendance committee under this Act shall not incur any expense, or appoint, employ, or pay any officer without the consent of the council or guardians by whom the committee were appointed; and where they are appointed by guardians also, of the Local Government Board, but with such consent may employ and pay any officer of such council or guardians."

MR. PELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 9, at end of Clause, to add—

"Provided always, That relief or money given under this Act for the payment of school fees in any parish where the local authority is the board of guardians shall not be paid out of their common fund, but shall be a separate charge on each parish; and the board of guardians shall issue their precept to the overseers of such parish requiring the overseers, within a time limited by the precept, to pay the amount of the separate charge specified in such precept to the board of guardians, or to some person appointed by them; and the overseers shall comply with the requisition of such precept by paying the sum required out of the poor rate of such parish.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the Government would endeavour to meet the views of the hon. Gentleman by a proposal to be brought up on a later stage of the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 24 (General and local committee of local authority), postponed.

Clause 25 (Clerk of guardians, and application of Acts to guardians), verbally amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 26 (Effect of subsequent appointment of school board).

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 9, line 32, after 1870, to insert—

"Provided, That after the passing of this Act a school board shall not be formed for any school district in which there exists efficient and suitable provision for the elementary education of all the children resident in such district."

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that was by no means a trifling proposal, as it was opposed to the programme he laid down in introducing the Bill, when he stated that every district would be able, as at present, to have a school board if it wished it—the object of the Government being to allow the country to choose either the school board system of the Bill of 1870, or that of the present Bill, the choice being left absolutely to the people of a district, provided always that they did their duty in providing proper school accommodation, and in securing the proper instruction of the children, as made necessary by this Bill. It would be, therefore, entirely contrary to the views of the Government to say that it should be impossible for any district to have a school board, if by a popular vote it desired to have one. Consequently, the Government would offer a decided opposition to the Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER objected to the Amendment, which, if adopted, would effect a great change in the Bill, and reverse the principle laid down in the Act of 1870, and be a retrograde step in the course which had been pursued for the last three or four years. He thought the Government had taken the proper course in regard to the present proposal.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD, in supporting the Amendment, remarked that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich stated, when the Bill of 1870 was introduced, it was intended, not to destroy, but only to supplement the existing system.

MR. CHARLEY also supported the Amendment, on the ground that school boards should be called into existence, not for the purpose of supplanting, but of supplementing, voluntary exertions. He feared that the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council did not sufficiently appreciate the feeling on that side of the House, the Members of which did not think that the Bill would sufficiently carry out the object for which, so far as education was concerned, they were returned. Gazette after Gazette was filled with announcements of the formation of new school board districts, although it was the policy of the Conservative Party to maintain and extend the voluntary system.

DR. LUSH, believing the Bill meant the absolute destruction of school boards, and the transfer of the education of the country entirely to denominational schools, said he should give his most strenuous opposition to anything which would destroy the alternative which some districts now possessed of having school boards if they pleased.

MR. HAMOND contended, on the contrary, that the Amendment, instead of destroying school boards, sanctioned them wherever they were required, although it disputed the supposition that it was necessary to have school boards where there was ample public elementary school accommodation in any district. At the present moment there were no fewer than 500 school boards in England and Wales with not one single school among them. He maintained, therefore, that those school boards were entirely beyond the Elementary Act of 1870. The object of the present Bill was to give local authorities greater powers to do what had hitherto been proposed to be done illegally by the school boards. He hoped the Government would give way on this point.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY contended that if the argument of his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle was good for anything, this Amendment was entirely unnecessary. If school boards had been illegally created they could be set aside. By the Act of 1870 an application from the Town Council or ratepayers would clearly compel the Education Department to give them a school board, and though the Bill provided another mode of dealing with the question, yet its whole principle was that the ratepayers should be left to decide whether they would prefer to elect a school board in preference to relying on the Town Council or Board of Guardians. What was asked was that these bodies should be left to act for themselves. It was not the fact that school boards did not put compulsory bye-laws into operation in districts where there were only voluntary schools, for in Stockport there was not a single school which was not upon the voluntary principle, and yet compulsory bye-laws were in force there. What Her Majesty's Government desired was to respect the individuality of the school districts, and to leave them to act as they thought proper with the view of enforcing attendance.

MR. MUNDELLA expressed satisfaction with the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman, and said that, if they did not stand fast upon the point, it would be fatal to their Bill and to the character of the education to be given. School boards were intended for more purposes than merely supplying school accommodation. In Manchester, in 1869, the state of education was deplorable, though there was ample school accommodation. The fact was, that there were no bye-laws to enforce attendance; but the result of having a school board was that attendance had nearly doubled.

MR. HERMON said, he should vote against the Amendment.

MR. DILLWYN rejoiced at the declaration that the Government did not countenance the reversal of the policy of the Act of 1870. He gave credit to the Government for good intentions in the measure they had brought forward, but it had rather the appearance of being intended to strike a blow against school boards throughout the country.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU trusted that the Amendment would not be pressed to a division, for if it was, he must vote against it. If, as he hoped, the Bill should work well, the rate-payers would never have recourse to the expensive machinery of school boards.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY, replying to objections, said that the Amendment had been very much misunderstood. It would not at all touch existing school boards, as it was entirely prospective in its nature. It was also idle to say that the Amendment was contrary to the Act of 1870. The only functions of school boards were compulsion and the provision of accommodation together with the maintenance of schools. Of these functions the latter was ex hypothesi voluntarily performed, and the former was conferred by the Bill on other authorities; if, therefore, they failed in their duty, a school board was not likely to discharge them. An important object of the Bill was to supersede the necessity of forming school boards for the sole purpose of compulsion, and the Amendment would further that object; it would enable the country with greater ease to avoid the creation of these noxious and unpopular bodies. The Amendment would leave the principles of the Act of 1870 in perfect integrity, while it would be a step, though a small one, towards the consolidation of local machinery.

MR. STORER said, the Amendment would act very beneficially in rural districts by preventing their running into unnecessary expense. There were many districts where school boards had been formed and nothing further done.

MR. MUNTZ said, it would be a great mistake to alter the present law for the sake of two or three particular cases.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Legal Proceedings.

Clause 27 (Application of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 86, ss. 23-4 to penalties &c.).

MR. BIRLEY (for Mr. HARDCASTLE) moved, as an Amendment, in page 9, line 40, to add, after "thereto," the words—

"And every person who shall fraudulently obtain, or enable or procure any other person to obtain payment or an order for payment from any school board or local authority, or expose any school board or local authority to the payment of any school fees, shall be liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he should be disposed to accept the Amendment, if it were amended so as to contain the punishment named in it for obtaining from a school board payment, or order of payment, or remission of payment of a school fee.

Amendment to said proposed Amendment agreed to.

MR. GREGORY moved to omit the words "with or without hard labour," which he said would make the punishment excessive, especially as it was for a new offence.

MR. W. E. FORSTER urged that even three months' imprisonment without hard labour would be an excessive punishment. It was a very severe clause, and it ought to be well considered by the Committee before it agreed to the infliction of such a penalty.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL considered the offence with which the clause proposed to deal quite as bad as that of obtaining money by false pretences. Moreover, as the Amendment provided that the imprisonment should not exceed three months, it would be in the power of the magistrates to mitigate the penalty.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, the House ought to consider that the class of persons to whom the clause applied was a very numerous and poor class, to whom a small temptation of the kind would come often with irresistible force. It was no worse an offence than for a person to go to the overseer of the parish and by, in some degree, misrepresenting his condition obtain out-door relief, when perhaps with a little economy he might be able to do without it. It was said that three months was the limit of the penalty; but these cases would come before a great variety of magistrates, some of whom might not be very judicious, and who would be subject to varying moods, and might sometimes think it necessary to make a severe example. He thought the punishment of a fortnight's imprisonment would just as completely deter any person from the commission of this offence as a punishment of three months, which he considered to be too severe for such a slight offence. He should therefore propose to substitute 14 days for three months' imprisonment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL thought, perhaps, the justice of the case would be met by a maximum punishment of a fortnight's imprisonment with hard labour. He would therefore assent to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman.

Amendment (Mr. Gregory), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. John Bright) agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 28 (Exemption of employer on proof of guilt of some other person).

MR. ONSLOW moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, line 23, to leave out from "representation" to "conviction," in line 25. It was the part of the clause which provided that where an employer, charged with taking a child into his employment in contravention of the Act, proved that he had used due diligence to enforce the observance of the Act, and either that some agent or workman of his employed the child on the production of a false certificate, or on the representation by the parent that the child was of a proper age, and that the employer had taken all practical means in his power to prosecute such agent, workman, or parent to conviction, the employer should be exempt from such penalty. The hon. Member contended that it would be a hardship to require the employer to find out whether a child taken into his employ was really what he had been represented to be, and that the duty of prosecuting the persons in fault should be left altogether in the hands of the Inspectors. If it were not so, great inconvenience, to say the least of it, would often arise to the employer of labour if he had to go about the country hunting up evidence in order to obtain a conviction.

VISCOUNT SANDON observed that the words in question were taken verbatim from the Factory Act of 1844, and he thought it would be desirable to retain them.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, he thought the proposition of the hon. Member a very reasonable one. He was not sure that those words were to be found in the Factory Act, but he was quite certain of this—if they were in the Act they had never been put in force. If the words had not been found necessary under the Factory Act, they ought not to be inserted in this Bill. They were antiquated, and he hoped the noble Lord would not retain them.

VISCOUNT SANDON, having referred to the Factory Act, said there appeared to be considerable doubt in the matter. He should, therefore, act on the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman and adopt the Amendment.

MR. GORST said, there was this difficulty about the declaration of the age of children, that in many cases children were not registered, and in such cases it would totally preclude them from getting employment.

MR. WHALLEY pointed out that the Act was still experimental, and therefore should not be too harsh.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Miscellaneous.

Clause 29 (Adaptation of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 86, s. 3, respecting pauper children to this Act).

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, referring to that part of the clause relating to relief out of the workhouse being given by the Guardians by way of allowance to the parent of any child above the age of five years, prohibited from being taken into employment, or required to attend school, moved that the additional provision should be inserted that such child should be one who had not passed the Standard of reading, writing, and elementary arithmetic fixed by Standard III. of the Education Code of 1876, so that it should be a condition for the continuance of relief that elementary education should be provided for the child. He would not enter into the controversy of why the Standard of education was lowered to the out-door pauper, but he thought that children who were to obtain employment should have attended school more than 125 days in two years. His object was to insure that all children should be required to reach Standard III. in these respects, instead of being reduced to Standard II., as they might be if the clause was not amended as he proposed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 11, line 3, after the word "who," to insert the words "has not passed the standard of reading, writing, and elementary arithmetic fixed by standard three of the Education Code of 1876, or who."—(Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the regulation only applied to out-door pauper children in districts. He understood that Standard III. was to be the class in all pauper schools. The object was to bring all the children into the same category. He always received the proposals of the noble Lord with attention, but the noble Lord was the one person who had taken the opportunity of saying things which he must have known were likely to be personally disagreeable to him, and he must say that, after the way he had received his Amendment, and those of hon. Gentlemen opposite, he thought he was entitled to receive different treatment at his hands.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the clause made no distinction whatever; and even in the case of such children, it was a mockery to give them so low an education. For years the instruction of that class had been, he might say, disgraceful, and a mockery of the word.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that no one had been more willing than his noble Friend (Lord Frederick Cavendish) to acknowledge the willingness of the noble Lord opposite to receive Amendments from all parts of the House, and no one was more sanguine as to the effect of the Bill. This, however, was really an important point. Should pauper children, whether in-door or out-door, in urban or in rural districts, have the same elementary education as other children or not? He quite agreed with his noble Friend that all children should be kept up to Standard III. The real question before the Committee was whether these children were to have an education which might be supposed to be worth having, or whether they were to have an education which was worth nothing at all for the next two years, because the Second Standard did not secure that a child should be able either to read or write.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH regretted that anything which he had said should have given the noble Lord opposite cause of complaint. It was completely unintentional on his part, and he thought that he was paying the Bill a high compliment in saying that this was the only retrogressive clause in it.

MR. CLARE READ said, that last year only 1,400 of those children passed in Standard III. and all the rest had to be kept continuously at school, unless they had complied with the provisions of the Agricultural Children Act.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 108; Noes 181: Majority 73.

Clause 30 (Amendment of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 75, as to elections to fill casual vacancies in school boards).

On Motion of Lord SANDON, Clause amended, so as to bring into immediate operation, on the passing of the Act, the powers of school boards to fill casual vacancies.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 31 (Application of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 75, ss. 83, 84, to orders and documents of Education Department); and Clause 32 (Effect of schedules), severally agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 33 (Definition of employment in case of parent).

MR. ONSLOW moved, as an Amendment, in page 12, line 3, to leave out "employs," and insert who, "after due warning continues to employ." As the clause now stood a parent who employed his child for the sake of gain, without its having obtained the necessary school certificate of proficiency, or had attended a certain number of times at school during the course of the year, should be looked on in the light of an employer, and be liable to the same pains and penalties. Now, he (Mr. Onslow) thought that this was a little too severe on the parent, unless he had wilfully disobeyed the warnings of the Inspector. He therefore thought that the words he proposed to introduce might tend to mitigate undue hardship.

VISCOUNT SANDON thought the Amendment would so far trammel the measure that he hoped his hon. Friend would not press it.

MR. EVANS said, that under the working of the Act of 1870 the parents received two or three warnings from the school boards, and he did not think the local authorities would be less sedulous in the matter.

MR. KNOWLES thought the parents would run the risk of keeping their children from school if they were not required to do so until they had received a warning.

MR. MUNDELLA said, the provision was exactly the same as that in the Act relating to the education of children in factories.

MR. WHALLEY emphatically protested against the more than Algerine severity which it was proposed to adopt in enforcing education.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 34 (General definitions).

On the Motion of Mr. W. E. FORSTER Clause amended, so as to provide that the education of a child should commence at five years.

MR. RODWELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 12, line 7, to leave out "fourteen," and insert "thirteen." It would not, he said, be for the public interest that a child in the agricultural districts should be kept from work until he was 14 years of age. In favour of his Motion he might say that the age at which a child might commence to be educated in the work which would enable him to earn his daily bread was expressly mentioned in the Act of 1870 as 13. The same age was mentioned in the Scotch Act, and also in the Pauper Children Act, and he thought the proposition a reasonable one, for he protested against a child being subjected to a year's enforced idleness.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 7, to leave out the word "fourteen," in order to insert the word "thirteen."
—(Mr. Rodwell.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER expressed a hope that the Government would not accept the Amendment, as it would, to a great extent, do away with the good of the Act of 1874.

MR. KNOWLES supported the Amendment.

MR. MUNDELLA hoped the time was not far distant when the children would pass a higher standard in education than at present.

MR. CHAPLIN found fault with the Amendment, because it did not go far enough. He had an Amendment proposing the age of 12; but he would withdraw it if the Government accepted the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, he was not interested either the agriculturists or the manufacturers, but the Committee had just passed a clause to inflict severe penalties on the parents if they employed their child in any sort of work until he was 14 years of age. He sympathized with the parents, and supported the Amendment to substitute 13 years for 14.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH urged the Government to abide by the age they had inserted in the Bill.

MR. STORER said, at 13 these children were hired, and it would be a great hardship to keep them another year in idleness because their parents had neglected their children's education.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would shortly be attending a council in North Wales known as Eistedfodd, and he believed they would display on that occasion an amount of energy and ability which would show that the very last thing they ought to teach children was reading. In support of that he need only point to the ancient kingdom of Wales, which had produced people more moral, more loyal, and more happy socially than any other portion of this country, or of Europe. He must again repeat that he objected to the Algerine provisions of this Bill. In passing it, they were acting in opposition to experience, and to the opinion of a large proportion of the population of this country.

VISCOUNT SANDON could not claim for the Bill the character of Algerine legislation. The Government were told from other quarters that their Bill was altogether too mild, and these contradictory views encouraged him to believe that they were hitting the happy medium in the proposals which they made. He could not sympathize with those who, like the hon. Gentleman, thought reading undesirable. If they were all musical there might be something to say in favour of that view. He could not assent to the Amendment, being of opinion that, for the sake of uniformity, which would be a matter of great convenience both to parents and to the employers, the limit of 14 years should be adhered to. The age of 14 had been enacted in the Factory Bill of 1874, passed by the present Government, with reference to children engaged in connection with textile fabrics, and it must be remembered that great numbers of agricultural children were in the neighbourhood of the great centres of industry. It must not be supposed that children were to be kept at school until 14, for, with proper care, most of them would be able to go out to labour at 10 or 11 years of age. It was no unimportant part of the scheme of indirect compulsion that the operation of the Act should extend as far as 14 years, because, if a parent neglected his duty, he would know that it would be possible that his child's labour might be kept from him until the child was 14. This would also have a great and very important effect in reference to "wastrel" children, who had always been eluding the grasp of our educational legislation, the dealing with whom satisfactorily was one of the objects respecting which he felt the greatest anxiety. He regretted, therefore, that he could not comply with the wishes—which were by no means unnatural—of his hon. Friends, and must adhere, on the part of the Government, to the age of 14.

THE O'CONOR DON pointed out that in factories a child could not be employed full time until he was 13, whilst under this Bill an agricultural child could be so employed at 11.

MR. CLARE READ remarked that the factory legislation was based upon the ground of health as well as education, whilst in agriculture it was education alone. He hoped that the Amendment would be pressed to a division; because he feared that the age of 14 would very much tend to damage the cause of education in the country. He contended that if they were to advance gradually and surely, they had better not jump to the extreme age of 14.

MR. RODWELL said, the whole argument against the Amendment was based upon the fact that the age of 14 had been fixed in the Factory Act. He rested the Amendment upon the injustice and hardship of compelling children to remain until they were 14 years of age in a state of pupillari. He should certainly go to a division, as he thought the concession ought to be made by the Government to those who believed that 13 was sufficient for any of the purposes of the Bill.

MR. HEYGATE supported the Amendment, on the ground that if the age of 14 were adopted uniformity would not be arrived at.

SIR GEORGE ELLIOT pointed out that the point in difference was only half-time, or six months between the ages of 13 and 14, and he thought the Government would be acting wisely if they gave way.

Question put, "That the word 'fourteen' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 197; Noes 108: Majority 89.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, as an Amendment, in page 12, line 11, at end, to insert as a separate paragraph:—

"The term 'certified efficient school,' in this Act means a public elementary school, and also any elementary school which is not conducted for private profit, and is open at all reasonable times to the inspection of Her Majesty's Inspectors, and requires the like attendance from its scholars as is required in a public elementary school, and keeps such registers of those attendances as may be for the time being required by the Education Department, and is certified by the Education Department to be an efficient school."

This was a school which no one would be compelled to attend, but it was the definition of a certified efficient school which he had promised to give the Committee.

THE O'CONOR DON objected to the words "not conducted for private profit." He thought the clause would be sufficiently stringent without them.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, it would be impossible to undertake the inspection of all private venture schools.

Amendment agreed to; paragraph inserted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 35 (Provision as to part of a parish); and Clause 36 (Construction of this Act with other enactments), severally agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 37 (Temporary modification as to application of Act, and saving for children in employment at passing of Act), verbally amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 38 (Repeal of Acts) agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

House resumed.

CROSSED CHEQUES BILL.—(Lords.)

[BILL 112.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4 (General and special crossings).

MR. J. G. HUBBARD moved, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 20, to leave out "or of two parallel transverse lines simply." Its object was to exempt from the operation of the Bill cheques which had merely two parallel transverse lines.

MR. RYLANDS said, if the Amendment were agreed to, the Bill would become a common nuisance throughout the country, and he hoped it would not be pressed.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Crossing after issue).

THE LORD MAYOR (MR. ALDERMAN COTTON) moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 4, after "specially" to insert—

"Where a cheque is crossed generally or specially a lawful holder may add to the crossing the words 'for account of,' or any abbreviation thereof, followed by the names of the persons or company to whose account he wishes the cheque to be credited."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Crossing material part of cheque).

MR. DILLWYN moved, to report Progress, protesting against such an important measure as that being proceeded with at half-past 1 o'clock in the morning. There were 24 Bills on the Orders of the Day, and the Government ought to decide what Bills they really intended to proceed with, and what they would withdraw.

MR. BACKHOUSE appealed to the hon. Member for Swansea not to press his Motion, on the ground that the Bill was generally desired.

MR. E. JENKINS considered that it was most unfair for the Government not to take the House into their confidence, and let them know what measures they really intended to go on with. He was interested in several Scotch Bills, and had to remain in the House night after night to see that the Home Secretary did not slip any of these Bills through without discussion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the hon. Member did not intend to impute that he would "slip" any Bill through. He had distinctly stated that no Scotch business should be taken unless full Notice was given of it.

MR. E. JENKINS said, of course, if he had used any expression to which the right hon. Gentleman objected, he would at once withdraw it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was most inconvenient that the discussion on a Bill as to which there was a general agreement should be interrupted in this manner.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 123: Majority 110.

MR. E. JENKINS then moved, that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

MR. ORR EWING opposed the Motion. He (Mr. Orr Ewing) was satisfied that the constituents of the hon. Member would be much better satisfied with him if, instead of interposing obstructive propositions, he would assist in passing a Bill which was demanded by the entire mercantile community.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 122: Majority 111.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. BURT said, he had voted in the first instance for Progress being reported; but as the feeling of the House was evidently in favour of going on with the measure, he did not see any use in persevering with those Motions of delay.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Payment to banker only).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Thomas Eustace Smith.)

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

WASTE LANDS AND PEASANTS DWELLINGS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BIGGAR, Bill to provide for the purchase of Waste Lands and the erection of Peasants Dwellings in Ireland out of the surplus funds of the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BIGGAR, Mr. COWEN, and Mr. O'SULLIVAN.

ARKLOW HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT BILL.

Ordered, That the Select Committee on the Arklow Harbour Improvement Bill do consist of Seven Members:—Sir GEORGE BALFOUR added to the Committee.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Motion made, and Question put, "That Colonel Makins be added to the Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 14: Majority 4.

House adjourned at half after

COMMONS BILL.—(Nos. 139, 176.)

(The Lord President.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

Clause 8 (Suburban Commons. Sanitary authorities to be represented in the case of commons in the neighbourhood of towns).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that he had considered the Amendment proposed by the noble Duke (the Duke of Northumberland) in Committee, and he was willing to adopt it. He would therefore propose that the six miles radius of distance should be measured, not from "the outer boundary of the town," as it now stood, but—

"In a direct line from the town hall, or if there shall be no town hall, then from the cathedral or church, or if there shall be only one church, or if there be more churches than one, then from the principal market place of such town to the nearest point of the suburban common."

Amendment made.

Clause 19 (Allotments for recreation and gardens).

LORD REDESDALE renewed his objection to this clause, which extended the power of the Inclosure Commissioners to require allotments for recreation and field gardens, which under the Inclosure Acts was restricted to the inclosure of commons which were waste of a manor, or subject to an unrestricted right of common, to commons not waste or not so subject, and moved to omit the clause.

LORD EVERSLEY also objected to the clause.

After some conversation,

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON assented to the omission of the clause.

Clause struck out accordingly.

Clause 30 (Jurisdiction of County Court in respect of illegal inclosures).

LORD ABERDARE moved at end of 1st Section to add—

"Provided nevertheless, that this section shall not apply to any inclosure or encroachment or interference with the surface of the soil made in the exercise of any rights or alleged rights of getting stone, or of raising or working minerals, or of any operation connected therewith, upon or under a common."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he was unable to accept the noble Lord's Proviso.

Amendment negatived.

Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 183).

PROVISIONAL ORDERS — LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD PROVISIONAL ORDERS (BIRMINGHAM, &c.) BILL.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee.

LORD REDESDALE desired to point out that a very important question was being raised by the great extent to which the system of Provisional Orders was now carried. When exercised with prudence and discretion, the powers conferred by Provisional Orders were no doubt useful and advantageous, and it was also necessary that in certain cases the Local Government Board should be able to set aside the provisions of an Act of Parliament in the matter of local improvements. But at the same time it was not to be forgotten that these powers were liable to abuse, and that they might open the door to an enormous amount of jobbery. In particular it was desirable that in the case of Bills for local improvements there should be a watchful jealousy and discretion observed in order to prevent burdens being imposed by means of borrowing powers for the bearing and repayment of which by the ratepayers no adequate provision was made. He was of opinion that the money raised for local improvements by borrowing should only be raised where full and adequate provisions were inserted in the Bill, not only for the payment of the stipulated interest, but also for the creation of a sinking fund for the repayment of the principal within a reasonable period. Such a provision he thought was necessary for the protection of the ratepayers as well as the creditors. He was extremely reluctant to interpose any difficulty to the progress of this particular Bill. With regard to such a place as Birmingham, there could be no charge or suspicion if they take the care with a debt of, say, off in 30 years.

annually in such a case would be not inconsiderable, and it was surely a dangerous power for the Local Government Board to possess, to be able to relieve the rates by extending the period for the extinction of the debt to 100 years. In an Act of 1851 it was provided that no application should be made to Parliament by a Town Council for power to raise money without first calling a meeting of the ratepayers, and receiving their sanction to the proceeding; but it was proposed in this case to set aside that provision for the protection of the ratepayers—rather a strong thing to be done by a Provisional Order. The question with regard to Provisional Orders was becoming one of very great importance. He did not mean to question the right of the Local Government Board to exercise the powers entrusted to them, but he could not help calling attention to the extent to which borrowing power had already been granted. There were no fewer than 165 places affected by such Bills as that now before their Lordships, and under these circumstances he hoped the Local Government Board would be careful in sanctioning these Bills, and in providing a sufficient guarantee for payment of interest and principal under fair and reasonable arrangements to the ratepayers.

LORD ABERDARE said, he thought the noble Lord ought not to have raised this question without giving notice to the Department concerned. He would, however, point out that the power exercised by the Local Government Board in respect of Provisional Orders was in aid of the local authority and for local purposes, and that consequently the main point was to secure that the parties locally interested should be duly consulted, and their consent obtained before any burden was placed upon them.

THE EARL OF JERSEY said, that the reason why the section of the Act of 1851 requiring the consent of the ratepayers to an application to Parliament by a Town Council was set aside by a Provisional Order, was that some doubt existed whether Town Councils were under the provisions of the Act of 1871 or under the Borough Funds Act of 1872, and the Corporation of Birmingham preferred to come under the latter. The Bill proposed to give borrowing powers to the Corporation of Birmingham to make extensive improvements by the demolition of crowded and unhealthy areas, and the construction of improved dwellings for artizans, with properly ventilated, lighted, and drained streets. That involved a large expenditure, and the Corporation were anxious that the present ratepayers should not be called upon to pay more than their fair share of the cost of making these improvements. The Bill gave the power of distributing the cost and interest fairly with reference to the benefits which the improvements would confer upon future residents in such dwellings, and provided at the same time a sufficient security for repayment.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET thought that their Lordships ought to feel very much obliged to the noble Chairman of Committees for calling their attention to this subject. He would suggest that there should be a Standing Committee of the House to whom all these Provisional Order Bills should be referred; that Committee would, in fact, greatly assist the Local Government Board. At present the House had no means of knowing whether the Bills contained improper provisions or not; and, though he did not desire to impute any blame to the Local Government Department, yet clauses slipped into these Bills, which were without doubt objectionable.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON believed that legislation by means of Provisional Orders was a very good system, saving a great amount of expense in Private Bill legislation. It further secured careful investigation, for the practice was to institute a local inquiry by the Board before a Confirmation Bill was allowed to be introduced. In his opinion, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had not exceeded in this case the powers with which he was entrusted, and had used them with discretion. The town of Birmingham had laid out large sums in local improvements, and that was a sufficient reason why a provision for the extension of time for repayment, such as was contemplated by this Bill, should be sanctioned. He did not think the Standing Committee suggested by the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) would work well; but thought the local inquiry to which he had just now alluded should be preceded by local advertisement so as to apprise the ratepayers of what was intended to be done, so that if they felt any interest in the matter they might attend the public inquiry and state their views.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY considered that the suggestion of the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) that there should be a Standing Committee a very good one. That Committee would see that the rules laid down by Parliament had been complied with. They should remember that as regarded Private Bills they had such a Committee, and that that was a security that nothing improper passed through Parliament.

LORD WINMARLEIGH, said there could be no doubt that these Provisional Orders were a great saving of expense to the parties promoting them; but what was required was that more notice should be given to the localities of what was going on—there should be some means for calling the attention of the inhabitants to the principal points in the proposed Bill. But he would be sorry to oppose this system of legislation.

LORD REDESDALE said, he was far from objecting to the system of Provisional Orders, but the powers conferred on the Local Government Board ought to be exercised with very great discretion. The period of the Session at which these Bills were introduced was objectionable, as it was quite impossible to properly consider the clauses. During this Session there had been brought in 120 Provisional Order Bills, and only 42 of them were introduced before the month of June. But Private Bills had to be deposited in the month of December in order that they might be properly examined; thus they were before the public and the House a sufficient time to enable all parties to investigate them. He would suggest that their Lordships should lay down a rule that these Provisional Order Bills should not be brought in later than the month of April or May, so that there might be time to look into them.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, there were two evils to meet—that of not sufficient notice to the parties, and that of want of time for examining these Bills. He certainly thought that sufficient notice was not given to the parties whose property was affected by these Orders, and that their Standing Orders should provide that some adequate notice should be given before the second reading of these Provisional Orders was taken to the persons who were locally interested in them. He desired to say that it was the business of the Opposition to read these Bills. When he was in Opposition he considered it his duty to read all Bills; and if noble Lords opposite neglected that function they were not performing the constitutional functions of an Opposition.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

House adjourned at a quarter past

NOXIOUS VAPOURS. — A ROYAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is intended to appoint a Commission to inquire into the effect of the emission of noxious fumes from certain manufactories; if so, whether he has any objection to state the names of the persons who are to be appointed Members of such Commission, and the terms of the instructions on which they are to act?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to advise the appointment of a Commission in pursuance of an Address which was agreed to in the House of Lords. The Commission would appear in this night's Gazette, and he had therefore no objection to state the names of the Commissioners and the terms of the Reference. The Chairman would be Lord Aberdare, and the other Members of the Commission would be Earl Percy, Viscount Midleton, Mr. Wilbraham Egerton, Mr. Stevenson, M.P., Professor Abel, Professor Williamson, Professor of Chemistry in the University of London; Professor Roscoe, of Owen's College, Manchester; and Vice Admiral Hornby. The inquiry would be into the working and management of works and manufactories from which sulphuretted hydrogen and other noxious gases were given off; to inquire into the effects produced upon animal and vegetable life by these gases, and to report as to the best means to be adopted for the prevention of the injuries arising from the exhalation of such vapours and gases.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. R. SMYTH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is prepared to lay upon the Table the Amendments to be proposed by the Government to the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill, which stands for Committee on Wednesday?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Last Wednesday I stated to the House, on the part of the Government, my reasons for assenting to the second reading of this Bill; but, in order to avoid any misapprehension. I added that, in my opinion, ~~not to become law in its present form~~ ^{that if it were his Session, it} would be my duty to propose certain Amendments. Those Amendments necessarily would be of considerable importance, and from what was stated in the course of the debate on the second reading, it is quite clear that several hon. Members desired, if not to oppose the principle of the Bill, at any rate to discuss it thoroughly during its further progress, so that it is clear the measure could not be proceeded with this year unless the hon. Member can secure an opportunity for its full discussion in Committee. He tells me that the Bill stands for Committee to-morrow; but when I refer to the Order Book, I find no less than 11 Bills, some of considerable importance, taking precedence of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill; and although the hon. Member was most successful in persuading three hon. Members on Wednesday last to withdraw their Bills in favour of his measure, I think he is hardly likely to be equally successful with all the 11 Members who have charge of the 11 Bills on the Paper. Therefore, I do not think it is reasonable to calculate that there is any fair prospect of proceeding with this Bill to-morrow. If it should appear that there is any such fair prospect, it will be my duty to put the Amendments on the Paper; but looking to the importance of the question I do not think any useful purpose would be served by placing the Amendments on the Paper now.

NAVY — H.M.S. "THUNDERER" — THE RECENT EXPLOSION.—QUESTIONS.

MR. D. JENKINS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he can give any information as to the cause of the bursting of one of the boilers in H.M.S. "Thunderer?"

MR. HUNT: I am not surprised, after the occurrence of this terrible calamity, that hon. Members and the public generally should be exceedingly anxious to learn the cause of the disaster. At present, however, the cause is only a matter of conjecture and surmise; and I am not, therefore, in a position to give the hon. Member the information he desires. But, even if I had up my own mind on the subject, I not think it right to state it in the House until after the conclusion of the inquiry by the Coroner's jury.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, that a subscription list had been placed in the cloak-room of the House of Commons inviting Members to subscribe, and that it was headed by a Member of the Government. He wished to know, If the list had been placed there by the authority of the first Lord of the Admiralty, and whether it was intended by this public subscription to show that the Government did not intend to compensate the sufferers or their families out of the public Exchequer?

MR. HUNT: The Paper was placed in the cloak-room by my authority. This fund is being raised with a view to relieve the immediate necessities of the families of the sufferers, and is not intended to be a substitute for any action which may be taken on the part of the Government with reference to their relief.

ARMY—DRILL AND EXERCISE IN HOT WEATHER.—QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS (for Mr. J. HOLMS) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been drawn to a report that two soldiers of the force now encamped upon Blackheath, near Guildford, died instantaneously of sunstroke during the usual forenoon exercise of the troops on Friday last, and that many men had to fall out of the ranks from exhaustion; and, whether, during the intense heat, the exercise of the troops might not take place early in the morning or after five o'clock in the afternoon?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that in consequence of receiving Notice of the Question of the hon. Gentleman he had ordered a telegram to be sent and he had not yet received an answer to it; but no report of any suffering of the troops of the kind had reached the War Office. As to mustering the troops at an earlier hour he believed that a regulation of that kind had been carried out, for he saw that there was a Brigade out at 7 in the morning; but, inasmuch as the General Officer Commanding, Sir Thomas Steele, was in the habit of inspecting the troops, it was necessary for them sometimes to appear on parade later than that.

TURKEY--THE EASTERN QUESTION-- ROUMANIA.--QUESTIONS.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that Roumania has called out her reserves and addressed a Memorandum to the Guaranteeing Powers asking, among other things, for the Delta of the Danube?

MR. BOURKE: In answer to the hon. Baronet I have to state that we know nothing about the united principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia having called out their reserves. We have received absolutely nothing either by telegraph or post. With regard to the second part of the Question, we have no information whatever on the subject, and I know nothing about it except what I have seen in the newspapers; but I am bound to say we have received a telegram from Constantinople, stating that a Memorandum on the subject has been placed in the hands of Sir Henry Elliot through our Consular Agent at Bucharest. That we have only received by telegraph, so that I cannot say what the contents of the Memorandum are.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Can you say whether the Memorandum was placed in Sir Henry Elliot's hands to be forwarded to Her Majesty's Government or to the Turkish Government?

MR. BOURKE: All documents of this kind would, as a matter of course, go from our Consular Agent at Bucharest to Sir Henry Elliot for communication to Her Majesty's Government, and would be sent on in the ordinary course of correspondence.

ARMLEY NATIONAL SCHOOL.
QUESTION.

MR. CHARLEY asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he will direct that the acceptance of tenders for building the proposed new Board Schools for the township of Armley, near Leeds, advertised to be sent in to-morrow, be withheld until the application of Mr. William Ewart Gott, of Armley House, the Committee of the estate of the Lord of the Manor of Armley, for a Parliamentary Grant for his Boys' National School had been disposed of by the Education Department?

VISCOUNT SANDON, in reply, said, the application of Mr. Gott had been carefully considered by the Education Department, and they were of opinion that they would not be justified in acceding to it. Under these circumstances, the Department would not interfere with the contemplated board schools at Armley.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

[BILL 155.]

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Ascheton Cross.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 17th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (Commencement of Act) agreed to.

Clause 8 (Proceedings on disobedience to order of court for attendance at school.)

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, in page 3, line 23, after "sent," to insert—

"To a certified day industrial school, or if it appears to the court that there is no such school suitable for the child then."

The object was to prevent as much as possible the indiscriminate committal of children to boarding industrial schools. Of course, if day industrial schools should not be accepted at a future stage it would be necessary to strike out the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ONSLOW moved, in page 3, line 24, after "school," to insert—

"but, if the Court shall consider that the parent of a child has shown reasonable excuse for non-attendance, the court may at its discretion grant such compensation to the parent as it may think fit, such compensation to be paid for by the summoning authority."

The object of the Amendment was to remove a great hardship felt by poor people under the Act of 1870—that even when they had satisfied the magistrate that there was reasonable excuse for the absence of the child they received no compensation whatever for the loss of their day or half-day at the Court. He begged to point out that even in our large cities where a parent had to go perhaps not further than the next street, at all events never to any great distance, to answer the summons of the Inspector, and when he had satisfied the magistrate that he had good cause for not sending his child to school, great hardship had arisen. How much more hard would it be on a parent similarly situated in the rural districts, who perhaps would have to walk five, six, and seven miles, and often, perhaps, would have to hire some conveyance, to get to the nearest magistrate's office. Surely it was not too much to ask that the parent should not be deprived of his day's wage, owing, it might be, to the carelessness of an Inspector.

MR. WHITWELL suggested that the Amendment could not be entertained on this clause.

MR. MELLOR supported the Amendment. The parent was justly entitled to compensation under the circumstances for the loss of his day's work; but he wished it had gone further and said that it should be paid out of the pocket of the summoning officer.

MR. RYLANDS said, it would be a great mistake to accede to the Amendment. If carried it would weaken the enforcing of the Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the addition of the Amendment would make the clause contradictory. The clause was based upon the assumption that there was no reasonable excuse for the non-attendance of the child.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the Amendment involved a very serious matter. He sympathized with the wishes of the hon. Member to relieve parents from any apparent hardship, but this was an extreme course to adopt. He felt certain that the local authorities at present carefully watched these cases, so as to prevent the infliction of unnecessary hardship, and he doubted if the Bill would work well from the introduction of the Amendment, because the local authorities would always feel in terror of being in the wrong. Then, again, the compensation was not defined. The Amendment would be productive of every kind of difficulty. He asked the hon. Member not to press it.

MR. FORSYTH said, the proposal would introduce a new principle into the law. Summonses and offences were dismissed daily, but who ever heard of compensation being given in consequence?

MR. PAGET sympathized with the Amendment, but he concurred in its withdrawal as being then irregular.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT also appealed to the hon. Member to withdraw the Amendment. At a future stage he would be prepared to give its principle his support. It was a new proposal to compensate persons who had been wrongfully accused, but Lord Brougham had said that every man wrongfully accused in this country ought to be compensated. It had been said that such a provision as that proposed by the hon. Member for Guildford would restrain summoning officers from doing their duty; but, on the other hand, it would operate salutarily in preventing the power to summons being oppressively and harshly exercised.

MR. ONSLOW said, he would withdraw the Amendment, and bring up a new clause at the proper stage of the Bill embodying the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. TORR moved, in page 3, line 28, to leave out "such penalty as aforesaid," and insert "penalty not exceeding, with the costs, ten shillings," for a second or any subsequent non-compliance with the order of the magistrate, as well as order the child to be sent to a certified industrial school.

MR. RATHBONE supported the Amendment.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, although local experience seemed to support the Amendment, the Committee must be guided by general experience.

VISCOUNT SANDON, considering that 5s. penalty was the limit fixed by the Act of 1870, did not think it would be safe to increase the amount.

Amendment negatived.

MR. BIRLEY said, it appeared to be a general opinion that four weeks was too long a period in which to prohibit the local authority from repeating a complaint of non-compliance with the order of the court. He moved, in page 3, line 35, to leave out "four," and insert "two."

VISCOUNT SANDON willingly accepted the proposed alteration.

Amendment agreed to.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. BRISTOWE appealed to the Vice President to consider whether the same excuses should be allowed on a second occasion as on the first. He would not put down an Amendment for the Report if the noble Lord did not think it could be entertained.

VISCOUNT SANDON thought that reasonable excuses must be equally valid on all occasions.

Clause added to the Bill.

Clause 9 (Duty of local authority as to taking proceedings under this Act or 29 & 30 Vict. c. 118.)

MR. A. BROWN moved, in page 4, line 6, to leave out all after "accordingly" to end of clause. The words so omitted would be "unless the local authority think that it is inexpedient to take such proceedings."

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the Bill would be perfectly complete without this clause; but it had been thought desirable to give a locus standi, so to speak, before the local authority to benevolent persons who interested themselves in these poor children, and who, if children were neglected, might go to the local authority without the charge of meddling. If, however, the Amendment were adopted, and if it were made compulsory on the local authority to take action upon the representations of the "common informer," a state of things would arise that would be intolerable, and lead to many dissensions. His own opinion was that this clause would be very useful, but only if the words to which objection was taken were retained. He could not consent to retain the clause at all if the words, as proposed, were omitted. He must therefore decline to accept the proposal of his hon. Friend.

MR. W. E. FORSTER agreed with the noble Lord in thinking that the local authority must be allowed a discretion, and not be compelled to take proceedings upon the representations made to them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10 (License to child sent to industrial school to live out while attending school).

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, in page 4, line 18, to leave out "public elementary," and insert "certified efficient."

Mr. Bristowe

Also in the same line to leave out the words, "or the said industrial school."

Amendments agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved the omission of Clause 13, and stated that he would lay on the Table to-night the terms of the clause he proposed to substitute.

Clause negatived.

Clause 24 negatived.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, in page 4, after Clause 12, to insert the following Clause:—

Day Industrial School.

(Establishment, &c. of day industrial schools.)

"If a Secretary of State is satisfied that, owing to the circumstances of any class of population in any school district, an industrial school in which children are not lodged is necessary or expedient for the proper training and control of the children of such class, he may, in like manner as under "The Industrial Schools Act, 1866," certify any such industrial school in the neighbourhood of the said population to be a certified day industrial school.

"Any child authorized by "The Industrial Schools Act, 1866," or by this Act, to be sent to a certified industrial school, may, if the court before whom the child is brought think it expedient, be sent to a certified day industrial school, and may during the period specified in the order be there detained during such hours as may be authorized by the rules of the school approved by the said Secretary of State.

"A certified day industrial school shall be deemed to be a certified efficient school within the meaning of this Act.

"In the case of a day industrial school,—

- (1.) A prison authority within the meaning of "The Industrial Schools Act, 1866," and a School Board shall respectively have the same powers in relation to a certified day industrial school as they have in relation to a certified industrial school; and
- (2.) There may be contributed out of moneys provided by Parliament towards the custody, maintenance, and training of children sent by an order of a court to a certified day industrial school such sums not exceeding one shilling per head per week, and on such conditions as a Secretary of State from time to time recommends; and
- (3.) Where a court of summary jurisdiction orders a child to be sent to a certified day industrial school, the court shall also order the parent of such child, if liable to maintain him, to contribute to his maintenance and training in the school such sum not exceeding two shillings per week as is named in the order; it shall be the duty of the local authority to obtain and enforce the said order, and every sum paid under the order shall be paid over to the local authority in aid of their expenses under this Act; if a parent is unable to pay the sum required by the said order to be paid, he shall apply to the guardians, who, if satisfied of such inability, shall give him such relief as will enable him to pay the said sum or so much thereof as they consider him unable to pay; and

- (4.) The managers of a certified day industrial school may, upon the request of a local authority and of the parent of a child, and upon the undertaking of the parent to pay towards the maintenance and training of such child such sum, not less than one shilling a week, as a Secretary of State from time to time fixes, receive such child into the school without an order of a court; and there may be contributed out of moneys provided by Parliament in respect of that child such sum, not exceeding sixpence a week and on such conditions as a Secretary from time to time recommends.

'It shall be lawful for Her Majesty from time to time, by Order in Council, to apply to a certified day industrial school the provisions of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866,' and the Acts extending the same, with such modifications as appear to Her Majesty to be necessary or proper for adapting such provisions to a day industrial school, and bringing them into conformity with this section; and such Order may provide that a child may be punished for an offence by being sent to a certified industrial in lieu of a certified reformatory school, or may otherwise mitigate the punishment imposed by the said Act.

'It shall be lawful for Her Majesty from time to time, by Order in Council, to revoke and vary any Order in Council made under this section.

'Every such Order shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within one month after it is made if Parliament be then sitting, or, if not, within one month after the beginning of the next Session of Parliament, and while in force shall have effect as if it were enacted in this Act.'

THE O'CONOR DON said, that as no one else had risen to make any remark on this clause, he felt bound to say that he entertained grave objections against the proposed system of industrial day schools in which the children would be partially supported. This clause, if passed, would not only alter some of the essential principles of the industrial schools, which was compulsory confinement therein, but would also completely alter the character of the day schools, as it would take out of them the class of children for whom they were originally established. It was for the education of this very class of children for whom these day industrial schools were to be set up that most of the board schools had been erected.

Moreover, the new system would add enormously to the rates of the country if it were brought into operation to any great extent.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that it was no doubt a very important change that they were proposing; but it was a change recommended by several important school boards of great weight, and experience, and by some of the highest authorities connected with the urban population. There was hardly, he believed, a single boarding industrial school now in existence which had not strongly memorialized Government in favour of this experiment. The clause was fenced round with great caution. The Secretary of State could not certify a day industrial school unless he were satisfied that owing to the circumstances of any class of population in any school district, an industrial school in which children were not lodged was necessary or expedient for the proper training and control of the children of such class. They might be perfectly sure that the Home Secretary would be exceedingly careful not to give certificates to too large a number of these schools. There were, besides, very stringent provisions respecting the payment for the children, which were to be recovered in almost all cases from the parish, the localities being given for the first time a direct interest in getting them. He, in concert with the Government, was of opinion that this was one of the most important changes which could possibly be introduced. He did not wish to take to himself or the Government the credit of the scheme itself. The real credit of it belonged to many benevolent people outside the House, and amongst whom he must mention the honoured name of Miss Carpenter, who had tried day industrial schools under disadvantageous circumstances, and with marked success. Day industrial schools were used in Scotland largely, the result being that the small gutter children had been almost entirely got rid of. The plan of course only affected the town population, but it proposed to meet the case of a class which was the despair of the school boards, had eluded hitherto all our legislation, had only been very partially affected by the efforts of good and benevolent people, and which was the disgrace and the danger of our modern civilization in all our great cities. It was absolutely necessary, therefore, to try some fresh method of dealing with this class. This scheme had succeeded marvellously as far as it had been tried by private individuals. It was now proposed to give further encouragement to individuals and school boards to establish such schools—only where the Secretary of State thought they were necessary. It was avowedly an experiment, but he trusted, in consideration of the magnitude of the evil, with which all their efforts had so far been unable to cope, and which must be dealt with, that the Committee would agree to try it.

MR. W. HOLMS having had experience of the system in Scotland, thought this clause would prove most beneficial.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE saw great dangers in the clause, as it would hold out a temptation to magistrates to send children upon very slight excuses to these industrial schools; a new class of industrial schools would spring up all over the country, instead of the old ones getting filled, and thus the country would be saddled with very heavy expense. He would like to hear from the noble Lord what the opinions of the Inspectors, and especially of the Rev. Sydney Turner, were on the matter.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the Rev. Sydney Turner, the late Inspector of Industrial Schools, had spoken in the very strongest manner in favour of these industrial schools, both as likely to check expense and as affording the best way of dealing with the children in question.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked how far these schools would combine industrial training with school teaching?

LORD ESLINGTON, while acknowledging the benefit which the industrial schools had conferred, could not but be struck by the extension of the system proposed in this clause. He should like to know how his noble Friend proposed to recover from parents the pay for which they were liable. At present it was collected through the police; but he thought it was very objectionable to employ the police in matters of education. It would be very desirable if some other agency could be employed for the collection of these sums.

MR. A. BROWN said, that the clause of the noble Lord deserved the support of the Committee for its combination of school teaching and industrial training.

MR. PELL feared that the result of the clause would be to lead parents to evade their obligations by tempting them to neglect the education of their children in order to gain the advantage of food in these day industrial schools. On the whole, unless the proposal were materially altered, he should be inclined to oppose it; and one alteration which should be made was to make this a local, not a Union charge, as country parishes would receive no advantage from day industrial schools.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Committee were rather in the dark in this discussion. What would a day industrial school be? What industrial training would it afford? What food would be given to the children? Would there be half-time schooling? He could hardly make up his mind upon the clause until he was told what sort of school was contemplated.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, these day industrial schools would be almost identical with the lodging industrial schools, minus the lodging. A certain amount of industrial training would be given, exactly as in the lodging industrial schools, a good deal of latitude being purposely left with the Secretary of State and the able Inspectors to adapt the regulations according to the diverse requirements of various localities. Clothing might be given just as in the lodging schools, and one simple meal in the day would be provided. Something had been said as to the difficulty of recovering fees from the parents, and to meet this objection the interest of local authorities was stimulated by making the fees when recovered payable to them. It would not be expedient to appoint new officers to collect these fees. There was no fear that these day industrial schools would spread very much. The assent of the Secretary of State would be necessary, and the contributions of the State would be very small, being limited to 1s. per week per child, which was very much what the feeding of the children would come to. The rest of the money would come from the parents or from Boards of Guardians, or from voluntary contributions. The suggestion of the hon. Member (Mr. Pell) that this expenditure should be localized was a valuable one, and he should be willing to provide in the clause that it should not be spread over the whole of a large

Union, for being mainly an urban affair the cost ought to be confined to the particular community benefited. It was believed, however, that day industrial schools would diminish the number of children in the lodging schools, and so diminish expense. It might appear strange to say so; but it was better that many of these children should not be taken altogether out of their homes and shut up for four or five years within the walls of an institution which, however well managed, was something of a hot-house for the children of the labouring poor. Something had been said about uncontrollable children, and Parliament was bound, if possible, to meet this difficulty. Here was a case mentioned to him by a London police magistrate:—A dock labourer was bound to be at his employment at an early hour, and to continue there, or he would lose his means of subsistence. The man might be a widower with four or five children, who did not go to school, though he urged them to do so. What possible means had such a man of seeing that his children went to school? The magistrate said it almost broke his heart to have to fine such a man 5s. The clause would meet the case of such uncontrollable children, as well as the class of what had been called Arab or gutter children, and as it would secure that the burden of the State should be small, that parents should be made to pay if they were able to do so, and that the charge should be a local, not a Union charge, he thought there was great hope of its proving a very valuable provision in the Bill.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, this experiment, though promising good results, was attended with considerable danger. The noble Lord had stated that school boards were most anxious to have this power; but why not give them also the power of putting their hands into the public purse? He would certainly move to strike out the second section of the clause.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT said, he thought it was quite proper that when a man was utterly incapable of controlling his children, as in the case of the dock labourer put by the noble Lord, they should be sent to an industrial school; but he could not see the propriety of allowing those children to return to the home of such a parent every afternoon. This would be a very mischievous provision if the parent was not obliged to pay the sum charged under the clause. He thought they were going a little too fast. They should be more tentative in their legislation, otherwise they might create a burden and an expense which would become intolerable.

MR. RATHBONE said, he hoped the clause would be guarded effectively by self-acting precautions. These day industrial schools should be obliged to comply with the same requirements as to inspection and results in the board schools.

MR. TORR remarked that, despite all the efforts of the school board and the vast machinery brought into operation by it there were something like 40,000 children in Liverpool still outside the control of any school—of these a large number of the worst class could only be won by means of such a clause as the one now proposed, which was specially applicable to the large towns and not to country districts. The parents did not give them any food, and the children were left to beg or steal it. The only way to get at them was to offer them a school with one meal of food a-day. He supported the clause.

MR. A. MILLS said, he hoped that some efficient machinery would be devised for extracting the payments due from parents for keeping their children at these day industrial schools. He regretted to find that the present board schools in London had displaced and disestablished the ragged schools. Although the London School Board had provided school accommodation for 120,000 children, there were said to be at this moment more gutter or wastrel children in London than there were six years ago. This clause appeared the only means of providing for them. Board schools were reluctant to take in those children because they were irregular in attendance, and brought them neither money nor credit; and what was to become of them he did not know. He certainly would support this clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped the clause would be accepted, though he candidly confessed he had considerable fears as to the result. The most that could be said in its favour was that it was an experiment; but as far as he could see the Government were fully justified in making it. A good deal would depend upon the regulations made by the Secretary of State, yet he had confidence that these regulations would be of such a character as to make the clause successful. Something like a similar proposal had been submitted to himself and the Marquess of Ripon, who saw its advantages but did not like to assume the responsibility of its adoption. It appeared that the cost to the State for each child was to be 1s. a-week or £2 12s. a-year, which might represent a considerable sum in the aggregate. The speech which most alarmed him was that made by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Torr). It appeared that with all the efforts made by the school board of Liverpool—and no school board had worked harder—there were 40,000 children whom they had not been able to reach, owing to the peculiar nature of the population; and the hon. Member looked to this clause to bring them in.

MR. TORR said, that there were in Liverpool about 40,000 children afloat, but nothing like that number could possibly come under the action of this clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it might not be possible to get the whole of these children into the schools; but if the clause were sensibly to diminish the number in Liverpool and other seaports it must act by tens of thousands. The danger was lest these industrial schools should not be a deterrent, but a temptation to the parent. Parliament was about to offer to the hard-working poor not only to relieve them of the care of their children, but to supply them with food cheaper than they could obtain it, and all that the child suffered was the disgrace of a quasi-imprisonment, which disgrace would be soon diminished if many children entered the industrial schools under this clause. It was, in fact, a system of out-relief, and the danger was that it would be a temptation to the hard-working poor to make use of it, and that it would discourage those who did not. The greatest care would therefore be necessary in the precautions observed until it was seen how the experiment succeeded. He trusted that the Education Department would not commit itself too far, so that if it were found that these dangers were real it might retrace its steps before any harm was done.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, there was no doubt that this must be regarded as a tentative clause. The Committee had to deal with a great educational, social, and moral difficulty, which had escaped all the efforts hitherto made by persons interested in the education of children in our great communities, and this was an attempt to overcome the difficulty. There was a provision that the parents should contribute not more than 2s. a-week to the cost of the maintenance of their children (Parliament contributing 1s.), and that, he thought, would check the temptation to abuse the benefits conferred by the clause, while at the same time the clause would give the authorities in large towns like London and Liverpool opportunities and means of getting these gutter children into school, which they never possessed before. The Bill did not profess to deal with vagrants any more than with canal children. A large expenditure upon these industrial schools would, of course, be a very grave matter, and the Government could not consent very largely to increase this source of expenditure. There might also be a danger lest the clause should remove from the parents a proper sense of responsibility. The Government, however, thought that this was an experiment that ought to be tried, and if it did not succeed it would be their duty to consider whether there was any better mode of dealing with this difficulty.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that if the committal of children to the industrial school were to be regarded as a penalty, he should like to know how that penalty was to be enforced.

VISCOUNT SANDON must decline to go into this question further than it was dealt with by the clause.

Clause read a second time.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH moved to omit the second sub-section, namely—

“There may be contributed out of moneys provided by Parliament towards the custody, maintenance, and training of children sent by an order of a court to a certified day industrial school, such sums not exceeding one shilling per head per week, and on such conditions as a Secretary of State from time to time recommends.”

VISCOUNT SANDON said, there was no reason why the State should not make contributions to these schools, inasmuch as it at present contributed towards the support of public elementary schools. These day industrial schools would be doing a work which he might say the Education Department had failed to do, and it would be hard, therefore, to say that they should have no State aid whatever.

MR. W. E. FORSTER pointed out that the sub-section did not distinctly state whether the payment of 1s. a-head by the State was to be met by a local contribution. He thought that there ought to be that security, otherwise they would be putting these industrial schools in a different position from that in which public elementary schools stood. In the case of the latter they proceeded on the principle that every shilling given to them by the State should be met by a shilling from the locality, and unless they adopted the same principle in dealing with day industrial schools there would be a strong inducement to everybody in a locality to increase the number of these schools, and shift the teaching of children entirely on to the State. His noble Friend the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was going too far in proposing practically that there ought not to be anything given out of the taxes to these schools.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that, as the Government shillings would not cover the cost of the schools, additional money would, of course, have to be found elsewhere.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR suggested that the provision in the Scotch Act with reference to this point might advantageously be inserted in the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON thanked the right hon. Member for the suggestion, and said he would look into the matter before the Report, in order to see whether the Scotch clause could be introduced.

MR. FAWCETT complained that this clause would introduce two most serious innovations. Under it Imperial funds were to be given to schools independently of their educational efficiency, and were also to be devoted to the relief of those necessities which arose from the negligence of careless or improvident persons. He trusted that the noble Lord would accept an Amendment providing that these schools should be treated in the same manner as ordinary elementary schools, and that the State grant should be met by a corresponding contribution from the locality.

VISCOUNT SANDON feared that all chance of success with these schools would be destroyed if they were dealt with under the regulations applying to public elementary schools. These schools were, in fact, transition schools, intended for a class of children who could not be reached by the ordinary system. He should be prepared to enlarge the conditions on which the State aid was to be allowed.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE saw difficulties in the clause, but hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the clause introduced a new principle, and they should be very careful in the application of it. He suggested that there should be some such regulation as this—that the amount to be given should depend upon the results of education. The scholars would, perhaps, earn some 15s. or 16s. a-year, and this could go in reduction of the direct contribution from the State.

VISCOUNT SANDON admitted that certain educational conditions should be fulfilled, and these would be expressed upon the face of the clause.

MR. MUNTZ recognized this as a noble effort to meet a great want. It was amusing to hear these children spoken of as though they had parents who could be made responsible for them. The children who would be provided for in these schools had no parents at all, or none who took care of them; they seemed to swarm under the archways and in the alleys of our great towns as though they came there by spontaneous generation. It would be a great pity if the proposal were marred by any attempt to carry out abstract theories. The Government proposed to draw these children by means of offering them something to eat; they had to catch them as they would catch any other animal. If they went into a field to catch a horse they would find it better to take with them some corn rather than a whip.

MR. LOWE said, that before they gave a large grant out of the Consolidated Fund towards creating a particular class of day schools, they ought to be sure that they were doing right. They were now really applying the rules of industrial schools to a totally different kind of school. An industrial school was a modified prison intended for children who had committed offences. They were described as beggars, wanderers who had no home, and who were destitute. Nothing could be kinder than to take poor children found in that position, and put them in a place where they would be taken care of, and the contamination which they would naturally give to each other might be checked by a proper system of discipline and watching. But whoever heard of such a proposal as the present before? They were to gather together these children with the hypothesis on their minds that many of them had no one to take care of them, and slept under bridges and arches, and after keeping them at school one part of the day, and administering to them a prison discipline in fact, they were then to turn them loose at night to go into fresh vice and misery. That was a proposition so monstrous that he could not allow it to pass without entering his humble protest against it. If it was worth while to do anything at all, it was surely worth while to do the thing thoroughly, and provide that these children should be kept out of temptation and subject to proper discipline.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the right hon. Gentleman had spoken as if this subject was entirely new, and had never been thought of till the present time; but there were a great number of hon. Members in that House who knew very well that this matter had been engaging attention for many years. Some 20 years ago he joined with others in calling attention to the wants of this particular class of children and they were met by the authoritative and official assertion that such a class did not exist. They were told that they were speaking of criminals, and that they must go to reformatories. Meanwhile, excellent and benevolent people had substantiated the fact that there was such a class and had striven to meet the wants of these children. The school boards having failed, as they were told, to meet the case of these children, it was necessary somewhat to modify their system in order to get at them, and these day industrial schools were now proposed as an experiment. The Government had endeavoured to frame their proposal in conformity with that which those who had been engaged in this work as a labour of love for many years had found to be the best line of action. He admitted that the system of day industrial schools must be introduced with great caution, in a very tentative manner, and subject to such conditions as would prevent abuse.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he could not vote for the Amendment of his noble Friend; but in supporting the clause he must not be understood to be debarred from making further proposals upon the subject.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, yielding to suggestions, said, as the Vice President had admitted that greater securities were required, he would wait until the Report to see how they were provided.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER proposed that the grant should not exceed the contributions of managers.

VISCOUNT SANDON did not like to commit himself to that off-hand, but he would consider it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. G. TALBOT proposed that the minimum contribution of a parent should be 1s. a-week.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that was the original proposal of the Bill, but inquiry had shown that the lower sum of 9d. would be far more readily obtained.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, in page 9, to leave out Clause 24, and insert the following clause:—

(Provisions as to school attendance committee and appointment of local committee.)

"Subject to the provisions of this Act the council or guardians may from time to time add to or diminish the number of members of a school attendance committee appointed by them.

"A school attendance committee appointed by guardians shall act for every parish in the union which is not under a School Board.

"A school attendance committee may, if they think fit, appoint different local committees for different parishes or other areas in their district for the purpose of giving the school attendance committee such aid and information in the execution of this Act as may be required by the committee appointing them, but any such local committee shall not have power to make any bye-laws or take any proceeding before a court of summary jurisdiction under this Act.

"A local committee may consist of not less than three persons, being, as the school attendance committee appointing them think fit, either wholly members of such committee or partly such members and partly other persons.

"The provisions contained in the Second Schedule to this Act shall apply to every school attendance committee and local committee appointed under this Act."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

(Declaration of duty of parent to educate child).

"It shall be the duty of the parent of every child above the age of five years to cause such child to receive efficient elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and if such parent fail to perform such duty, he shall be liable to such orders and penalties as are provided by this Act."

The noble Lord reminded the House that there had been a general feeling in the House in favour of such a declaratory clause, and the Government had since determined that it was desirable to insert it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thanked the noble Lord for the clause, which he preferred to his own Amendment, and hoped would be agreed to unanimously.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE hoped that this unnecessary clause would be dropped. It was in itself a truism, and he could not witness with satisfaction the adoption in England of a form of legislation of which the precedent could only be deduced from the doctrinism or despotism of the French Revolution. The duty referred to was one of natural law, and could only be weakened by being imported into a statute; while grammar, no less than more sacred matters, suffered by the introduction of rhetorical and sentimental expressions into Acts of Parliament. This clause would justify the vagabond father in saying that the law did not require him to clothe and feed his child; because, having consulted the statute in which his whole parental duty was laid down, he could only find a reference to mental aliment.

Clause read a second time.

MR. J. G. TALBOT thought it was contrary to the scope of English legislation to say, as was done by this clause, that it was the duty of every parent to do so and so for his child.

MR. CHARLEY moved to amend the clause by omitting the words "above the age of five years."

Amendment agreed to.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, be added to the Bill."

The Committee proceeded to divide:—

Mr. Leatham was appointed one of the Tellers for the Noes, but no Member appearing to be a second Teller for the Noes, the Chairman declared the Ayes had it.

Clause added to the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he would now move that the Chairman report Progress in order that he might have an opportunity of making a statement with regard to a new clause which the Government had decided to bring up, instead of Clause 13. That clause, as the Committee would recollect, was a subsidiary clause, and one which he stated the Government felt some little doubt about, although the injustice, and consequently the evil to be dealt with was so very serious a one, that the Government felt, and he had stated so when he introduced the Bill, that it must be dealt with. He had then showed that there had been a great rise in the cost of schooling during the last five years. It had been clearly proved also that the pressure brought to bear upon the country by the Government, by means of the requirements of the Codes, which demanded highly-trained teachers, made it exceedingly difficult for the small and poor schools to get on. The Government insisted on a very high standard of education, which meant very highly-paid teachers, and in various ways they had raised the cost of education. He had accordingly brought forward a clause, which was known as the Poor Districts Clause. After a good deal of consideration and consultation, it had been found since that clause had been before the public that, although it met a good number of cases, still its operation was very unequal; for while it gave aid to districts which did not particularly need it, other districts were left out in which the aid was wanted. The Government had, therefore, thought it better to abandon that somewhat complex scheme. He would again remind the House that the great rise in the cost of education had been pressed upon the Government from various quarters, which were specially informed on these matters, and the facts adduced could not be denied. It had been brought strongly before them by persons connected with education; and the London School Board, by a resolution passed by a large majority, had represented very strongly that the great rise in the cost of education was acting injuriously upon many of the best schools in London. So that, on further examination, it was found that the Government proposal was increasing largely the cost not only of the schools in the poorest districts, but in ordinary places, so that many good voluntary schools were likely to be extinguished—a thing looked forward to with alarm by some of the largest and best school boards—and the burdens on the local rates would be unduly increased in the cases of board schools. The total cost of schools was 35s. per child on the average. To cover this cost the child was able to earn from the State a considerable amount for average attendance, singing, good discipline, reading, writing, and arithmetic, history, geography, grammar, and needlework. That was the sound ordinary education which the public wished the children should receive. The amount that could be earned by a child in a school of that class was 17s. 6d.; but that represented a very first class national or board school. There were other payments made by the State for extra subjects, in science, botany, mechanics, languages, &c., which would enable a school to earn more than 17s. 6d. per head; but these might be considered the luxuries of education, which ought not to receive the same aid from the State as what might be called the necessities of knowledge. As the House was aware, at the present time the State in many cases made considerable deduction from the earnings of the child. It did not necessarily, by means of its proficiency, bring to the school the 17s. 6d. net, because if the locality did not provide one-half of the cost of the school or meet the Government subsidy by fees and subscriptions, what the teaching of the master had enabled the child to earn was cut down. The State had adopted the plan of payment by results, but it had never worked the plan out thoroughly, or pursued it to its logical conclusion; and although the results were as good as the State desired, if the fees and subscriptions did not meet the Government grant, then the State cut down the payment which the child earned. When there were no school board schools the plan acted uniformly, and all suffered alike; but under the present system it acted very unequally because it did not affect the board schools. These schools had the pockets of the rate-payers to put their hands into, so that the masters and mistresses of the board schools were in a much better position than were those of the voluntary schools. The former felt that they could educate their children without any of those deductions. They had nothing to do with the fees of the parents or the liberality of neighbours, while the masters and mistresses of voluntary schools had the fear of those dreadful deductions constantly hanging over their heads, which took away the incentives to exertion, and were a constant disappointment and vexation to the best teachers and managers, and affected them not in proportion to their exertions, but to the poverty of their district. The present system, therefore, was a great check and discouragement to the teachers, and the proposal he had to make on behalf of Her Majesty's Government would, he believed, be hailed with enthusiasm by all the teachers in all the schools. It was clearly essential, if they held to their present system, to make some provision by which a subscription should be insisted on from every school in the country, as it was clearly wrong to allow the rich schools to be supported entirely by fees and the State—and to require from the poor districts the aid of subscriptions, just where there was most difficulty in getting any. But such a course would give rise to very serious difficulties. As he had said, about 9 per cent of the British and Wesleyan schools in England, and nearly 2 per cent of the Church schools, were supported entirely by fees and the Imperial grant. The principle of insisting on subscriptions had long ago, therefore, been abandoned, and the Nonconformist schools took the advantage of the change, owing, he must say, partly to their own excellence, and also in a great degree to the superior class of children they educated. If, therefore, they insisted that so much should in their case come from subscriptions as the condition of their receiving the Government grant, they should be imposing a new burden upon a great number of the most efficient schools in the country, throwing them upon their own resources and obliging them to seek fresh sources of income. He must say that he did not believe such a course would be tolerated. He would now state the proposal the Government had to make. Taking as their basis that the by no means sparing education which was provided when the child earned the 17s. 6d. grant as representing a sound and simple education thoroughly good in every way, and such as the country desired, they said — “We will treat this class of schools upon a bold and intelligible footing, and say with regard to the great mass of those schools which give their children that sound education, we shall go simply upon the system of payment by results.” To simplify the whole matter they would ask no questions as to where the money came from, but confine themselves to the all-important inquiry, Were the results of the teaching good? If the results were good according to the requirements of the Code; if the schools could show those educational results which the Education Department required to be produced, and if they were properly and suitably conducted, then they would ask no further questions and put no check upon teachers or children or managers in any way. If the schools produced certain results, they would receive the Government grant of 17s. 6d., which represented a good, sound, general education throughout the country. That sum would be paid if it was earned, and he was sure the Committee would agree that Her Majesty’s Inspectors might be trusted to see that it was fairly earned. As the Committee were aware, very few children could contribute more in fees, in the great mass of the schools, than 10s. per annum, leaving 7s. 6d., at all events, to be supplied from some other source; thus, as a matter of fact, considerable aid would have to be provided from various quarters, and the principal effect of the change would be to relieve from their present unjust treatment the poorer schools that could only get low fees and small subscriptions. But the Government proposed to go further, and say— “If any persons choose to establish higher schools, schools in which parents are willing to pay larger fees, or where benevolent persons for the benefit of their poorer neighbours like to give larger subscriptions, where higher subjects shall be taught, we shall put those schools in a different category, and make a higher grant if it be earned, but only on condition of its being met by higher fees or larger subscriptions according to the requirements of the Code.” They proposed also to embody in the Bill the arrangement which was accepted by the House last year in respect of rural schools. In the Code it was provided that where the population was below 300 there should be extra grants given of £15 and £10, independent of their earnings. That provision, which was now law, would be introduced into the Bill so as to secure the advantage in question to these small rural schools of 40, 30, or 20 children; which were now more heavily handicapped than any other schools in the land, as they were obliged to have certificated teachers—teachers as efficient as many of the most favoured schools—whose salaries necessarily made these schools far more expensive in proportion than the larger schools. For that reason it was thought right that the State should make some extra provision for them. Such were the proposals he had to lay before the Committee, and he felt confident that the effect of the change, if it were accepted and carried out, would be to give additional vigour to the whole teaching staff of the country, to relieve a great number of the very best schools from unfair and unjust pressure, and he believed, that when its working was fully understood, it would be hailed and regarded by all parties as a valuable amendment of the present system. Looking at it from a broad point of view, he thought that the proposed changes would remove the most fertile causes of discontent, would get rid of one of the most irritating matters connected with the Government grant, for the administration of the Education Department would take away a serious check upon the exertions of the teacher, and give a fresh and healthy impulse to sound and solid education throughout the country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that even if there were time remaining for the purpose the Committee were not in a position to discuss the proposals which the noble Lord had just laid before them. He wished to know whether the clause would distinguish between the two classes of schools mentioned—those which were to be restricted to 17*s.* 6*d.*, and those which were not?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would read the words of the clause. It would run thus—

“Such Grant shall not in any year be reduced by reason of its excess above the income of the school if the Grant do not exceed the amount of seventeen shillings and sixpence per child in average attendance at the school during that year, but shall not exceed that amount per child, except by the same sum by which the income of the school, derived from voluntary contributions, rates, school fees, endowments, and any source whatever other than the Parliamentary Grant exceeds the said amount per child.”

The effect would be that if the child earned less than 17*s.* 6*d.* or 17*s.* 6*d.*, then the sum earned would be given; but if it earned 18*s.*, then that sum would be granted by the State; but as to the higher grants—the Government grants above 17*s.* 6*d.*—they would require to be met by the schools from their own resources.

PARLIAMENT—EXCLUSION OF STRANGERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I wish, Sir, to bring under your notice a matter connected with the order of our proceedings. The First Order of the Day relates to a discussion which is likely to become annual in the House with reference to the Contagious Diseases Acts. The discussion of that question involves painful and repulsive details, insomuch that three years ago an hon. Gentleman, no longer a Member of this House, in the exercise of his right, called your attention to the presence of Strangers. The House was cleared, and the doors were closed against all except Members and persons officially connected with the House. I do not think that such a course, if pursued now, would be in accordance with public opinion. But I believe that there are very few persons, whether in this House or out of it, who will not be of opinion that there are two classes of the community—namely, women and children—who had better be absent during this discussion. I would respectfully ask you, Sir, whether it is in your power, if you find it to be in accordance with the feelings of the House and with your own desire, to close the Ladies' Gallery to-day. I think it is unfair to those Members of the House who have to take part in the discussion to subject them to an influence which cannot but be of a painful character. We are accustomed to abstain from or approach the discussion of a question like this with almost sacred delicacy, and I defy any hon. Member, unless his constitution be very peculiar, to discuss the details of the Contagious Diseases Act in the presence of ladies without great dismay and apprehension. There is another class of person, who, I think, ought to be protected—I mean ladies who may have come up from the country or elsewhere and sought admission to the Gallery without having the slightest notion as to what subject was to be discussed. Therefore, Sir, I would respectfully ask you whether you will, in the exercise of your authority, direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to pursue the course which is adopted by Judges at Assizes when indelicate cases are for trial, when women and children are ordered out of Court. In order to give other hon. Members an opportunity of expressing their opinions on the subject I move that the House do now adjourn.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

MR. SPEAKER: I may state for the information of the House that there are two Galleries of this House appropriated to the use of ladies. One of these is under my direct control, and having regard to the subject-matter of the First Order of the Day I have directed that Gallery to be closed. With regard to the other Gallery, as the House is aware, it is available for the use of the friends of Members, under the orders of Members in the usual manner. I have not felt myself at liberty to close that Gallery; but I have desired the messenger in attendance to inform all ladies who may present themselves there of the nature of the subject about to be discussed. If after that caution they think proper to insist upon admittance, I do not feel at liberty, without the authority of the House, to exclude them. With regard to the admission of children, I may state that last year I desired that some youths should be excluded from the Gallery, and this year I have desired that they shall not be admitted.

MR. CALLAN: I would ask the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion in order that I may present the matter in a different form. I think the course adopted some years ago would be endorsed by public opinion. Therefore, exercising the right vested in me as a Member of the House, I beg to inform Mr. Speaker that I espy Strangers in the House.

Notice taken that Strangers are present.

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out to the hon. Member before I act upon his notice that if Strangers are excluded from the House this will not affect ladies, because the Ladies' Gallery is not supposed to be within the House. Of course, if after that intimation the hon. Member persists in calling my attention to the presence of Strangers it will be my duty to act upon the notice.

MR. SWANSTON desired to explain that when, a week ago, he put down his name for an admission to the Ladies' Gallery he did not know what subject was to be brought forward for discussion on the present occasion. When he found what it was, he struck his name off and gave notice to the ladies, who were strangers to him, that they would not be admitted. He was glad that in doing this he had anticipated the Speaker's directions.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR: I think you, Sir, have taken the right course in notifying to the ladies the nature of the discussion, so that if they do not wish to hear it they may have the option of withdrawing. Further than that, I think the House would be wrong in expressing an opinion as to the fitness of the admission of any person of full age of either sex who wished to hear the discussion. I submit the ladies themselves are the best judges of the propriety of remaining. The fact that the Bill itself relates to women is too often ignored. There is nothing immoral, nothing necessarily prurient in this discussion. The analogy, therefore, that has been made as to the exclusion of women from a court of justice when an indelicate case is tried, is no analogy at all. Women, unfortunately, are the subjects of the legislation to be discussed.

to-day, and is the House going to say that women are not to feel an interest in what concerns their own sex, and are not to form their own opinion after listening to a debate on a subject so deeply interesting to them? I think the dignified and proper course is to allow women to be the best judges whether they will remain or not. There are many of them who have taken great interest in this matter. There is one gentle lady, the wife of a clergyman in Liverpool, who has spent her life in attempting to relieve the sufferings and to redeem the character of unfortunate women. The real evil consists in the immorality of these Acts, and those women who have come forward to save their sisters from these Acts should surely not be debarred from hearing the question discussed.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: As at present advised, I shall deem it my duty to go to a division. I may be permitted to remark that ladies do not take part in these debates, and are present, therefore, only from curiosity. They can read the discussion afterwards; but Members are placed in a very embarrassing position by the presence of ladies.

MR. CALLAN thought it preferable that a few ladies should hear the discussion than that reporters should be present to report it. Then hon. Members had held out that ladies would be able to read the discussion afterwards—but he had that confidence in the Press that if the reporters were allowed to remain they would not report the debate, and therefore he again brought under Mr. Speaker's notice that he espied Strangers in the House.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the House of the Resolution of the 31st May 1875, and stated that he had, on a previous occasion during the present Session, explained that he considered himself bound to follow the practice prescribed by that Resolution, until otherwise instructed by the House; and that as no such instruction had since been given, he should proceed to put the Question, in pursuance of that Resolution.

And Mr. SPEAKER forthwith put the Question, "That Strangers be ordered to withdraw;" and it passed in the Negative.

Mr. P. A. Taylor

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had gathered from the tone of the House on this Question, that it was not in accordance with their wish that he should press his Motion for the adjournment of the House, and after the remarks made by the Speaker he begged leave to withdraw it.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS REPEAL BILL—[BILL 55.]

(Sir Harcourt Johnstone, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Stansfeld.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: Sir, I have to resume the unpleasant task which devolved upon me last Session. I am aware that the general feeling of the House is that these Acts have been passed for a good purpose, and that the discussion of last Session should not be re-opened. This feeling is not unnatural, because the subject of the Acts is of such a painful—I may say revolting—character, that it is a positive advantage to those who wish to retain these Acts to say—"Let us close our ears rather than that this revolting subject shall be brought up again." Therefore the supporters of the Acts have this uncommon advantage, while those who seek to repeal them have been, to a great extent, neglected by the Press of this metropolis. In the North of England we have the advantage of the local Press to ventilate our cause. But even if we were absolutely deserted by the London Press, I cannot forget that only two or three years before the abolition of slavery, the London Press refused (with one exception) to notice the efforts made in this country for the freedom of the slave. There are some in this House, and a great many outside, who do not know much about this subject for the reasons I have mentioned. They do not know the nature of the various Acts which have been passed, and that they have been gradually made more stringent in their action towards the weaker sex. It was during a time of great political excitement that the most stringent of these Acts came into force; and since that time three Departments of the State —the Army and the Navy, and the Home Department—have combined in the endeavour to make these Acts efficient, and so far as the Departments are concerned I do not blame them. The Acts are before them, they have to administer them, and I do not say that they have exceeded their duty; I say they have performed their duty as well as they could under the circumstances; but the fact still remains that the three great Departments of the State have given all their influence in support of these Acts. And now I must allude to the Royal Commission of 1871, and some of the statements made in their Report. The Report of the Royal Commission admits so much that is offensive in the Acts that I feel bound to bring their statements before the House. One paragraph in the Report describes the purpose of the Act of 1866, in these words—

“It sought so far to control the conduct of prostitutes as to render the practice of prostitution, if not absolutely innocuous, at least much less dangerous.”

And the Commissioners also say—

“It is, perhaps, not surprising that this legislation should have given rise to serious misapprehensions of the objects and intentions of Parliament.”

I will also call attention to Paragraph 35 of the Report, which states that “the number of cases in hospital among the marine service” had decreased from causes wholly independent of legislative interference—

“These results, therefore, if they were attributable to legislation at all, were certainly not due to the legislation of 1866, of which periodical examination is the principle.”

Then, in the 37th paragraph, after condemning the manner of taking out the percentages from the averages, they conclude by declaring—

“There is no distinct evidence that any diminution of disease among men of the Army and Navy which may have taken place is attributable to a diminution of disease contingent upon the system of periodical examinations among the women with whom they have consorted.”

In the 48th paragraph they say—

“It is difficult, however, to escape from the inference that the State, in making provision for alleviating its evils, has assumed that prostitution is a necessity.”

There is one curious question which never has been answered. The Royal Commission, having taken evidence more especially from those concerned in the administration of these Acts, and having to some extent overlooked the evidence against the system even of men like Mr. Simon, Medical Officer to the Privy Council, ended by the following recommendation:—

“We recommend that the periodical examination of public women be discontinued.”

How is it, I would ask, that that recommendation of the Royal Commission has been before the House and the country all these years and yet no Government has yet acted upon it? With this fact staring us in the face, how can the Government reconcile it to their duty and their consciences to pass over this recommendation? If the recommendations were carried out, no doubt the Acts themselves would disappear. Those who have interest in these Acts must do all they can to prevent these recommendations from being carried into force. What, then, is the position of the promoters of these Acts? It is alleged that these Acts are devised on sanitary grounds and on moral grounds also. There are some recommendations, which I do not care to follow up, by which these unfortunate women can be sent to reformatories. We assume to have made the wonderful discovery in the last 10 years that prostitution may be put down by legislation. Why, for hundreds and thousands of years the victims of this vice have been made the subject of legislative repression; but no Governments as yet have ever attempted to repress prostitution itself, without producing a revolt or re-action in the other direction. That is what has been done by past legislation. Are we to declare to Europe that we have found out a new system which will keep all straight and safe? The Continental system may have been founded on a most anxious desire to reduce disease. Do not imagine that we wish that disease should continue to exist as a punishment for the vices of man—that is not our position. If disease exists, it should be cured; and every opportunity should be given to those suffering from diseases of this character of getting cured. In various towns of Europe the localities to be inhabited by these unfortunate women are prescribed; their dress is prescribed; and great care is taken as to the places where they shall walk. In Belgium and Italy they are examined weekly; and a soldier who denounces any woman as afflicted with disease is rewarded; therefore they reward a man who commits this sin. I think that the common sense and the right feeling of this country would hardly submit to the State deriving any revenue from licences to brothels; though I know that at Hong Kong there is a system of licensing brothels, the fees for which are paid to the Government. [The hon. Member then read from a pamphlet, at considerable length, the statement of M. Duprés, Professor of Medicine in Paris, and of M. Lecour, head of the department in Paris charged with suppressing this evil, to the effect that the system had utterly failed.] Unable to get more assistance from the Government, and being taunted by the doctors, M. Lecour comes to the conclusion, as the result of prolonged experience, that—

“We must nurse the hope that the rising generation will be better protected by religious teaching, by education, and the solicitude and authority of family life.”

I never heard such a confession of weakness; and yet it comes from the head of that powerful police, notorious since the days of Fouché up to the present time, for the perfection of their detective system. These men confess their inability to deal with these diseases, and the causes from whence they spring. There is a growing tendency in this House and in the country to place too much faith in State agencies, and to put everything upon the State. Why, it has even assumed the duty of parents in regard to education, as if in these days parents were so utterly lost to all natural feeling that they could not succeed in bringing up their children in the way they should go. But all these human efforts to compromise with definite principles of morality, personal liberty, and responsibility, and to bring them into harmony with the lowest desires of humanity must fail; for in such an attempt the baser motive always overrides the nobler, and expediency overcomes the instincts of purity and self-restraint. Well, if this is to go on, I do not look forward to a very happy state of things in this country. I do not think the example set by the middle and upper classes is at all satisfactory at this moment. Many years ago it was said the Court was the highest tribunal of morality in this kingdom, and I trust it may long continue to be so. But 40 years ago Mr. Carlyle prophetically anticipated this very evil, and said—

“It were but blindness to deny that this superior morality is but an inferior criminality, not produced by greater love of virtue, but by greater perfection of police.”

These words, written 40 years ago, represent very accurately the state of things to which we are coming as fast as we can. Now let me take up the sanitary grounds on which the promoters of these Acts base their case. These diseases began to diminish long before these Acts were brought into operation. In fact, what is called “the more dangerous” disease fell from 32·68 per 1,000 to 24·73 per 1,000 between 1860 and 1866, when the first Act was passed. In this latest reliable Army Return—why I say reliable I will presently state—of 1872, we find the average has fallen to 24·26, or less than ·05 per cent in six years, instead of 7·95 per 1,000 in the six years before. The Army Report of 1873 says that there is a regulation by which the pay of soldiers is stopped while in hospital with this disease, and it is presumed that that fact has led to concealment; and Mr. Inspector Lawson has told me within the last month that from the year 1873 the Reports were absolutely unreliable, and I have no doubt he will say the same if called before a Committee of this House. With regard to the Navy, my right hon. Friend there (Mr. Hunt) will, no doubt, make a good defence, as he always does of everything he is called upon to justify; but if he has not had the advantage of these criticisms, perhaps he will allow me to read them to him. In the whole Navy there is no record of the proportion of the secondary disease previous to 1866, up to which date it was 15·7 per 1,000, and it fell, with intermediate fluctuations, to 12·8 in 1869, when the area of the Acts was largely extended. Three years afterwards it rose steadily until it attained the highest ratio of 18·3 in 1872. Since then it has fallen again—according to the latest Report in 1874—to 12·2, or only ·06 per 1,000 lower than in 1869, five years previously. Therefore, if my right hon. Friend is going to claim for these Acts a great diminution of disease in the Navy, I do not think his case is quite so good as he wishes it to be. The average of the whole eight years under the Acts has been 14·9 per 1,000, or only ·8 per 1,000 less than before the Act passed. With regard to the Navy, I do not think he will attempt to show a very strong case, and therefore it will not be worth while to contradict him. If you were able to draw a cordon round all these so-called protected stations, a cordon complete both in military and police arrangements, and if you had an examination daily, as suggested by some practitioners, of the whole population—say, for instance, that in every Union you had the medical officer going round in the morning and examining the whole population with the aid of his associates—I have no doubt you could arrive at a great check on the increase of the disease; but such things are impossible. I hold that it is actually impossible, unless you have a system which would be intolerable to the people of this country, and impossible, I trust, under the liberties we enjoy, so that it is wiser to dismiss these theories entirely, and allow the value of these statistics to be fairly argued and put before this House and taken for what they are worth. [The hon. Member then read extracts from the Report of Captain Harris (Parl. Paper, No. 276), vindicating the conduct of the police in carrying out the Act—that, with a single exception, not a single charge of excess, or violation of duty, had been brought to his Notice.] But it is argued that the restoration of girls to the paths of virtue is to be attributed to the operation of these Acts. Now, I will ask the House and hon. Gentlemen opposite who oppose this Bill, where they see anything in these Acts which gives the Home Office or any other authority such a power of reclamation? I find that the managers of Rescue Societies and Female Reformatories, who have been engaged in this work all their lives—and they are persons who ought to know—say at the end of their Report that a large experience of the whole system only increases their conviction that it is “the greatest moral hypocrisy of the day.” These are not my words, but the words used by those who have been engaged in the work of reclaiming these poor creatures. Although the police imagine that by getting hold of these women they prevent prostitution, the class of clandestine prostitutes is daily increasing; and the percentage of those admitted into the London refuges has increased from 21 in 70 to 60 in 1874. This bears out the statement of the police of Paris. About 10 days ago there was a remarkable compliment paid by The Times to a gentleman, lately a Government officer, who has been rewarded for his services, and who has from the beginning given an opinion that this system would not be productive of the results anticipated. I refer to the Report of Mr. Simon, when it was proposed to extend the Acts to the civil population. He is one of the most remarkable men in the Kingdom, and had considerable experience as a doctor before he became a Government officer. He says he believes it to be a fact that a large number of prostitutes escape supervision, and that any departure from the position hitherto held by the law with regard to the civil population will lead to embarrassment and disappointment. I hold that the argument which applies to the civil population should be equally applied to the military population. I grant that when you congregate enormous masses of men in a celibate condition, in towns full of vicious attractions, that class is more likely to be misled than the class which has the opportunity of marriage. I concede that to the promoters of these Acts; but I hold that the voluntary system as it existed before these Acts is far more likely to meet the objects in view than any system of State interference, espionage, and despotism, most repulsive to the feelings of many of us. With regard to the power which is claimed for these Acts, that they interfere with brothels, there is no such power under the Acts whatever. There was a power given in the Act of 1866 to interfere with places known or suspected to harbour diseased women. But to obtain this knowledge the police must keep up a constant system of correspondence and connivance with the brothel-keepers. Let us not be misled by any gloss which may be cast over this question. It is impossible for the police to keep themselves informed of the health or disease of these women, unless they are in continual communication with the owners of the brothels. On the one hand you have this reclamation denied by the managers of the Rescue societies in London. On the other you see this attempt to suppress brothels, for which no powers are given under the Acts, and which ought to be left entirely to the local authorities; while at the same time the very people who say they are suppressing brothels, are keeping up a constant communication with them, and no doubt favour those from whom they get information for their special purpose. There is a further paragraph in the Report to which I must allude. It has reference to the question of introducing these Acts into places where they are not in force. There are two hon. Gentlemen in this House at this moment who represent those towns to whom allusion is made—the hon. Member for Liverpool and the hon. Member for Sheffield. I do not know whether they have had any correspondence as Representatives of those towns with the various Departments, but I cannot believe that there have been any public meetings in those towns asking for an extension of these Acts. I have yet to learn that that is the case, and I think the Home Office or any other Government Department would be ill-advised if they were to endeavour to put the Acts in force in the county in which I live. I will go a little farther North. Try to extend them to Scotland. Whether owing to her prejudices, or to the fanatical arguments we have used, I think if the local opinion of those towns were taken it would be found, so far from desirous to have these Acts, most uncompromisingly opposed to them in every quarter. Two nights ago, a meeting of 3,000 people was held in Leeds, which is now represented by two hon. Gentlemen on that side and one on this. At that meeting there was no distortion of facts. We do not require that. There was no misrepresentation or exaggeration whatever. We can afford to do without that and be content with the facts. That meeting unanimously pronounced against the Acts. And in every large town in the North of England you will find the same to be the case. What the feelings in the South may be I am not prepared to say, but my opinion is they are in a somewhat limp condition, and that no great movement for real social regeneration and social effort is likely to come from the South of England. One great argument against these Acts is, that they have had no useful sanitary results, while the moral results are so small as to be inappreciable, for although the terror caused by the examinations may have sometimes deterred women from vice, they cannot, even on this point, produce the results of voluntary agencies. We ought not to rely upon the State in matters of this sort. The State, instead of encouraging and fostering public opinion, is more apt to paralyse local efforts and to interfere with local liberty. We have seen enough of it, not only this year, but for many years past. Everything is to be put on the Consolidated Fund. All local burdens are to be charged thereon. Everything is to be put into the hands of over-worked Departments; and, if this continue very long, we may as well shut up all our local shops and live in London altogether, and not take any active part in local life. There is a mixture of despotism and morality in the Acts which horrifies me. The despotism attempts first to cajole, and then threatens and terrifies into an organized hypocrisy, which varies from abject involuntary submission, to constant evasion and escape. I would ask hon. Gentlemen who are strenuous advocates of religious education, if they have greater faith in coercion than in voluntary works of charity? Are you not really playing in this matter fast and loose; hunting with the hounds and running with the hare? Are you prepared to apply your system of detection, spying, and police not only to one sex, but to the other? Because one of the main arguments in this case is that you are interfering with liberty, on the barest suspicion—sometimes less than suspicion, the merest fancy—of one sex, while the men go scot free. Are you prepared when you take up women to take up men, and act as they do in Massachusetts, where, with their somewhat barbarous ideas of liberty, they make prostitution penal for women, and also penal for men? That Act was passed only last year. If these laws are to be extended, let us know it, and not have insidious attempts of State Departments to introduce these Acts covertly—I say that, knowing well what I say—into those places where they are not in operation. There has been a covert attempt to introduce them unknown to any Member of this House. I have the facts in my possession, and can produce them if necessary. If we are to be subject to such attempts, I think those who sit on this side of the House must make some little stand for Constitutional principles. Now, the Whigs, especially in this House, made great efforts to secure civil equality. Cannot they trust local self-government? We have already granted to local bodies power to educate the people, and given them sanitary powers which are working admirably well. And I believe that powers for promoting objects of this character would be far better left to voluntary and local effort. I am bound to say in all these matters we are getting very much into the condition of States labouring under Democratic or Imperial government. I view with alarm these attempts to neutralize the good we have attained through much suffering and endurance, and by Constitutional and political struggles in this country. I fear we shall be handed over to the tender mercies of one central Department, which will watch over us from the hour we get up in the morning until we go to bed. And this will be called—I do not mean any reflection on this Government—a “spirited domestic policy.” We have done with a “spirited foreign policy,” and I do not desire to see a “spirited domestic policy.” I would ask hon. Gentlemen outside to contemplate the peculiar position in which we are placed. In Scotland, I am told, the State sanction is necessary to the marriage of any human being in the country, for the banns must be called in the State Church; so, the State on the one hand sanctions marriage, and on the other endeavours to regulate prostitution. How can you make the two things agree? Is it possible to imagine that the State can on one hand give its sanction to that which is a holy rite in every Church, and on the other hand can be regulating, not only for the Army and Navy, but for the whole civil population, that which is the most loathsome and revolting sin in the whole category of human sins? Well, Sir, I only wish the House were fuller, for I would show hon. Members that if they wish to make themselves masters of this subject, they must go through a course of reading which will be more instructive than pleasing. They should not be content with statistics obtained by Government agency, but should inform themselves of the systems of foreign countries on both sides of the question. You who sit on the other side of the House are not the authors of these Acts. I believe if anybody is responsible for them, it is hon. Gentlemen who sit below me. Not being the authors of these Acts, I think you need not be accomplices in a system which cannot but injure the morality of the country, which has had no perceptible useful hygienic effect, and will only tend to the deterioration of the moral attributes and moral position of the English nation. I can point with some hope to the position which the Scotch Church, a portion of the Church of England, and nearly the whole Wesleyan and Nonconformist Bodies, have taken up in this matter. I do not think we can afford to deal with this question any longer in a cynical and contemptuous spirit—the spirit of indifferentism. The evil is unfortunately too prevalent at the present time. I think that it is our duty, who sit on these benches, to protest against these Acts. I hold them to be fatal to national life and national liberty; and, therefore, in moving the second reading of the Bill before the House, I beg to move the repeal of these Acts.

Motion made and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Sir Harcourt Johnstone.)

MR. T. E. SMITH, in moving, as an Amendment,

“That, considering the time which has elapsed since the Report of the Royal Commission, it is desirable that the subject of the Contagious Diseases Act be referred to a Select Committee,” said:—Sir, I can assure the House that it is with no desire to procrastinate this discussion, or to introduce any new element of controversy into what we all feel to be a most distasteful and repulsive subject of debate, that I have ventured to put a Motion on the Paper with regard to the Bill now before us. But I did feel, Sir, that it might not be improper in a private Member, who has never taken part in the controversy which has raged on this subject, and who has never publicly expressed any very strong opinion on this matter, to place a Motion on the Paper which would enable us to suggest to Her Majesty’s Government the desirability of considering whether it is not in their power to take some steps which may tend to remove this very objectionable subject from the arena of political discussion. I am sure it must be most distasteful to right hon. Gentlemen, to whichever political Party they may belong—because the action of both political Parties in this matter has been the same when they have been in office—to have, year after year, to come down to this House and defend Acts which they know to be most repulsive to the conscientious feelings of a large number of the inhabitants of this country, of the morality of which Acts I am sure they will themselves have considerable doubts. And I think we need only look at the limited attendance here to-day, and to the limited extent to which the Government is represented on the benches opposite, to feel how unwillingly right hon. Gentlemen come down to support the Acts in question. And I am sure it must be equally distasteful to those who take a different view of the subject to have to expose the abuses which they believe to exist. I think that especially to those who object to these Acts must it be disagreeable to have to enter on the subject, because they are most of them Gentlemen who take a very keen interest in the promotion of the movement for the female franchise and introduction of females into the conduct of public affairs. They must be well aware that the controversy on this subject, and the periodical literature of various sorts to which it has given rise has tended more than anything else to impede the movement for the promotion of female political education, and has hindered more than anything else the chance of women attaining the position as citizens of this country which they desire for them. Therefore I think both Parties must feel that it is most desirable that this matter should, if possible, be brought to a close and removed from the arena of political discussion. I venture to appeal to Her Majesty's Government most strongly, and hope that they will see their way to some sort of inquiry, either by a Select Committee, a Royal Commission, or otherwise, which may put the case clearly before those who take an interest in it, so that the time may come when we shall hear nothing more on this repulsive subject. Now I know it may be said that the appointment of a Select Committee, or any other inquiry, is quite unnecessary, because the subject has been already investigated, and that we have full evidence on the subject. Well, Sir, the inquiries which have taken place into this matter have been of a very curious character. There were inquiries at the early stage of this legislation, to which public attention was very gradually directed, and of the existence of which very few people were aware. Those inquiries came to a conclusion in favour of the Acts, and in consequence the Acts were gradually extended, until in 1869 the strongest Act, and the one to which the greatest objection is felt at this moment, was passed. Then public attention was aroused and public feeling awakened. A Royal Commission, composed of Gentlemen of considerable experience, and in whom the Government of the day had every confidence, after sitting a long time, produced a Report in which they distinctly recommended that the Act of 1869 should be repealed. And they made various other very strong suggestions. Well, what has been the result? Her Majesty's Government—I am not speaking of the present Government, but of the Party then in office—Her Majesty's Government have treated that Report, I may say, if not with contempt, at any rate with indifference. That any subject should have aroused public attention, that great attention has been called to it, and that there should be a warm feeling in connection with the subject, that that subject should have been referred to a Royal Commission, and been seriously and carefully investigated, that Her Majesty's Government should for five years not only have passed over the recommendation of that Royal Commission with indifference, but should have carried on, in defiance of that recommendation, a system of administration which had been distinctly condemned by that Royal Commission, is matter requiring more investigation. I know it may be said in asking for some further investigation I am not tending to reduce the interest in the matter, but rather to increase it; and that may be so when the inquiry is going on and the Committee is sitting, but I do believe that that is the only way in which we can come to any conclusion upon the matter. It is hopeless to expect after the divisions that have taken place in this House, that the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone) is likely to obtain a second reading without any further investigation of the subject. I think that it is unreasonable to suppose that the House will pass the Bill of the hon. Baronet without even those in favour of it requiring further investigation; but at the same time I think it is hopeless for Her Majesty's Government to retain these Acts in operation while there exists in the country such a strong and determined feeling against them, and while these Acts violate the religious convictions of a large section of Her Majesty's subjects. If the Government believe these Acts to be good, and wish to continue them in peace and quietness, the only way in which they can obtain that result is to deal fairly and honestly with the country, and to show the good cause which they believe these Acts to possess, and not to shrink from any investigation as to the manner in which the Acts are worked; because so long as there is any reticence about the operation of these Acts, it is perfectly clear that the country at large will not believe that the Government have the good cause they represent themselves to have. What is the case that the Government put before us? It is a case which is very plausible. In the first place, it has been said that it has been examined; but I think that it is hopeless to imagine that the country will be satisfied with a merely official Report—an official Report and composed—I do not wish to say anything in an offensive sense—but written and composed by a partizan of the Acts, and hardly composed in the judicial and impartial spirit which we might venture to expect in a Government Report on a subject of so much controversy. I know—and every one in this House knows—that we have every reason to have full confidence in the accuracy and truthfulness of the Government Papers which are composed by their officials. I do not suppose that any hon. Member will get up and say that a Government which commands the confidence of the country would venture to lay upon the Table of this House a Return which was not genuine, or believed to be genuine. But we must be aware that when the thing goes before the country at large, to people who do not know so much about the conduct of Public Business, this Report will be regarded simply as a partizan statement on the part of the Government, and while giving full credit to the Government, that Report cannot command the full confidence of the country as a statement of facts. But when I look at the Report myself, I cannot but think that it is a very half-and-half statement with regard to the operation of the Acts, giving us by no means a full account of the operation of the Acts. What we want to know is—what has been the operation of the Acts as a part of our legislation; what has been done by these Acts which has not been done in any other way, and what has been the complete operation of the Acts. Now, in both these respects the Returns are singularly deficient. Everybody must have read the details which Captain Harris has given of the beneficial moral effects which the police have been able to exercise in the country. I am afraid that the police have too long delayed devoting their attention to preventing men getting drunk, and other things of that sort; but we have at length discovered that the police are great guardians and promoters of the morality of the country. I am very glad of that. I believe it is a very great duty which the police perform with great efficiency. I believe they have opportunities of doing great benefit to the country when they see sin and wickedness to warn the people; but I have yet to learn that it is necessary to pass a Contagious Diseases Act to enable the police to exercise this beneficial influence upon the country. I should have thought when a policeman saw a young woman indulging in vice, he might warn her against the evil which was likely to ensue quite as well if the Contagious Diseases Acts had not existed. Therefore, I think that it is unfortunate that Captain Harris, in showing the virtuous action of the police, in a Return which was not intended to display the virtuous action of the police, but the practical operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, should have dwelt so much upon feeling and imagination. Then we come to other things which are based not so much upon feeling and imagination—because there must be always an element of imagination in connection with these Reports—namely, the facts and figures; and we find one or two figures which I think may tend in favour of the Acts. We find, for instance, that the amount of prostitution in the towns under the operation of these Acts has considerably diminished. Well,

Sir, that seems to be a great advantage; but we know also from the experience of other countries, that wherever such regulations have been in operation, the amount of registered prostitution always does decrease. But there is something more we want to know—what is the amount of unregistered prostitution in these towns? I believe it will be found, in France especially, and by the experience of other countries where similar Acts have been passed, that there is a very large amount of unrecognized prostitution, and consequently a very large amount of untreated disease; and it is giving an unfair statement of the amount of prostitution—judging by the analogy of other countries—to rely upon the amount of unfortunate women who have been brought under the police superintendence during the course of the year. Well, then, the next thing we find is that the public-houses and beer-houses, which are the haunt of prostitutes, have ceased to be so, and that there are none, or next to no public-houses or beer-houses which are now the habitual resort of prostitutes for the purposes of prostitution. I was under the impression that under the licensing laws all the public-houses and beer-houses were prevented from being used for the purposes of prostitution or being the haunt of prostitutes; and therefore I am at a loss to know why we want the Contagious Diseases Acts to carry this out. I believe that if the police had done their duty in former days, and with the same zeal in other places as they do where the Contagious Diseases Acts are in operation, these beneficial results might be arrived at although the Acts did not apply to these places. But then we find there is a considerable improvement in the diminution of the number of young persons who are leading this immoral life. Well, then again we come to this, that the police have it in their power to warn, and seriously warn, young persons—who are more amenable to advice and suggestion and are more afraid of the terrors of the law—from the consequences of the life they are leading. But all this can be done without the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts. But then we come to one point—the point on which the Royal Commission particularly bases its recommendation for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Act of 1869—and that is the large amount of examinations which have gone on under the provisions of this Act. And I do not think, Sir, that it is necessary for me to enter into the religious, nor, perhaps, the social questions which are necessarily bound up in this matter, because I believe that they will be much more strongly and better dealt with in the course of this debate by other hon. Members; but I wish to call the attention of the House to this—and it has not obtained sufficient attention in the consideration of the effect of these Acts—the great political evil, as apart from either the religious or social evil—which I believe to exist under the maintenance of these Acts in their present form. I believe it is a matter quite unknown in English history, and quite unknown in English legislation, that a large section of the community (who have not committed any offence against the law, or kept disorderly houses, or been a nuisance to their neighbours) should—however great the vice of prostitution—be treated as criminals, although the simple fact of prostitution has never been considered a crime to the law of England. I say it is a great political evil that those who have not committed any offence against the law should be subject to police surveillance by Act of Parliament, and I very much object to one class of the people being under such surveillance. It has been said that, after all, publicans and the keepers of public-houses are subjected to a similar surveillance. But that is an entirely different case. They have entered into the trade without any temptation, without any need, not from circumstances of necessity, but of their own free will, and they have obtained in return a share of the valuable Government monopoly. But this is a perfectly different case; for I find from the Returns that something like 1,000,000 examinations have taken place of a repulsive and disgusting character, and the persons subjected to them having no power to remove themselves from the operations of the Act. Now, I have heard some strong arguments used with regard to these examinations. Some people say—“Oh, the examination is nothing.” Others say that, “These unfortunate women are not the people to object to an examination.” And then, again, we have people speaking of these examinations “as being offensive and disgusting in the extreme." Of course, it is not for me, who am not a medical man, to express any opinion upon the subject, and I would rather turn to the Report of Captain Harris as to what the nature of these examinations is. Suffice it to say that Captain Harris says most distinctly what the opinion of women is upon the subject, because he more than once shows how the dread of these examinations exercises a great moral influence in deterring a woman from prostitution. Now, it is perfectly clear that whatever these examinations are, in the minds of the women who are leading such lives they are repulsive and disgusting in the extreme. This being the case, I do hope that Her Majesty's Government will take it into their consideration whether they cannot do something to put an end to this, and to show distinctly what they have to say in favour of the Acts, that we might see the subject cease to be a subject of controversy. It is one of the most painful, disgusting, and offensive subjects that has come before the House. I have ventured to express the opinion of a private Member on the matter, and it now only remains for me to move the Amendment of which I have given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "considering the time which has elapsed since the Report of the Royal Commission, it is desirable that the subject of the Contagious Diseases Acts be referred to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Eustace Smith,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR CHARLES LEGARD: Mr. Speaker—Sir, I feel I owe some apology to the House for venturing to address it on this occasion, and I can assure you, Sir, I do so with great regret, and I should like to say at once that I hope my hon. Colleague will not for one moment believe that I have undertaken the task from any feeling of opposition to himself, but simply and entirely on account of the strong impressions I hold on this subject. Sir, three years ago I had paid very little attention to this unsavoury subject, until the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) held a meeting in the borough I have the honour to represent (Scarborough), agitating for the repeal of these Acts; since that time I have consequently taken no little trouble to inform myself as to the statistics and details, the rights and wrongs bearing upon this important subject, and I must ask the indulgence of the House for a short time whilst I state the grounds on which I oppose the repeal of these Acts. And, Sir, having reference to the fact that Petitions have been presented to this House, purporting to emanate from public meetings, I cannot refrain from saying that I think that it is to be deeply regretted that those who have taken so prominent a part in the agitation for the repeal of these Acts, and who caused those meetings to be held, did not hold them in districts in which the Acts are in active operation, instead of travelling about the country and visiting places, hundreds of miles away from the districts where the Acts are in force, endeavouring to provoke feelings of hostility amongst people who are consequently the least acquainted with what I say are the beneficial operations of these Acts. And I am strengthened in this view by what fell from my hon. Colleague, when he said that the Press in the North of England was strong enough to carry the repeal of these Acts. Sir, why should the Press in the North of England, where the Acts are not in force, know more about these Acts than the Press in the South of England, where the Acts are in force? Sir, if any hon. Member takes the trouble to look back to the year 1853, when the ravages of the contagious diseases in question first aroused the attention of the military and naval authorities, he will find that the time had indeed arrived when it would have been greatly to be deplored if a disease had been allowed to go on increasing and unchecked in our large seaport garrison towns to an extent unknown in any other part of the world. A disease so destructive of health and happiness, and by which an acquired constitutional taint, may be, and, alas! too often is, transmitted to generations yet unborn. Sir, I find from the Army Medical Report of 1859 that assuming the mean strength of the Army at that time to be 90,000 men, the inefficiency from syphilitic disease would be equal to 2,417 men for the whole year, or equal to three regiments

The consequences were so great that in 1862 a Special Committee was appointed to inquire into the prevalence of syphilitic disease in the Army and Navy. The Committee, at the conclusion of the Report, dated the 15th of December, 1862, stated—“That they had refrained from entering into the painful details which had come to their knowledge of the state of our naval and military stations at home as regards prostitution, the facts were so appalling that they felt it a duty to press upon the Government the necessity of at once grappling with the mass of vice, filth and disease, which surrounds the soldiers' barracks and the seamen's homes—which not only crowds our hospitals with sick, weakens the roll of our effectives, and swells the lists of our invalids, but which surely, however slowly, saps the vigour of our soldiers and our seamen, sow the seeds of degradation and degeneracy, and causes an amount of suffering difficult to over-estimate.”

Sir, the result was an almost universal desire, spread over the country, for some preventive legislation against these diseases in our seaport garrison towns, and the advisability of some legislation was acknowledged by many persons, distinguished as much by their eminent Christian benevolence and practical wisdom, as by their high social position and legislative experience. I shall refrain from entering, as much as possible, into statistics on this subject, as I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty can do so if he considers it necessary; but as a great deal has been said about the tyranny of the police, and most sensational statements have been circulated throughout the country about the manner in which innocent and virtuous women have been seized and examined by the police, and cases have been brought forward in publications and speeches at public meetings, not only of cruel insults to innocent and respectable women, but of repeated wrongs to the unhappy women who have been, and are, subjected to them, I should like to say a few words on this subject. The constables employed in carrying out these Acts are all selected out of the whole body of the metropolitan police—they are all, I believe, married men, and are certainly all men of tried and unexceptional character, and it is quite erroneous to suppose that any of these constables can go up to any woman they may see in the street and carry her off to be examined. Sir, an official inquiry has been made into every case in which names and details have been given, and the persons who have made the statements have been requested to substantiate them. In some cases the persons thus challenged have refused to come forward; in others, the explanations given have been mere hearsay, or more or less frivolous. It is now five years since the Report of the Royal Commission was published, and the result of the inquiries has been to satisfy the authorities that the police are not chargeable with any abuse of their authority; that they have discharged a painful and a difficult duty with moderation and caution; that they have made no mistakes in summoning innocent and virtuous women to be examined; that the charges thus rashly made and repeated have no foundation, but have contributed in no slight degree to excite public indignation against these Acts. Sir, I will now, with the permission of the House, examine some of the statements put forward by hon. Members who oppose these Acts. It is said that the first principles of our constitutional regard for the liberty of the subject are violated by these Acts, in the so-called voluntary submission by which the woman is urged, and in many cases entrapped, into criminating herself. Sir, so far from there being any good foundation for these statements, I maintain that these Acts are so administered as to render it practically impossible for the woman to be entrapped into criminating herself, and for this reason the police are strictly instructed not to give notice to any woman to appear for examination, except on such proof of her being a common prostitute that they can, if required, substantiate the facts on oath before a magistrate. Before the examination takes place the woman must sign a voluntary submission, which is carefully read over and explained to her by the inspector of police, and I may add that every examination takes place in the presence of a female attendant or nurse, and no other person can be present. The Report of the Royal Commission very well says that the temporary suspension of personal freedom in case of a diseased prostitute, “Such suspension being strictly measured by the time required to effect the patient's cure, and accompanied by no restraint unnecessary for such purpose, is not to be regarded as an infringement of a great constitutional principle.”

Sir Charles Legard

Another statement which is urged by my hon. Colleague and others who oppose these Acts is, that they are flagrantly unjust and one-sided, because they impose upon women the gravest penalties from which men are entirely exempted. I am aware, Sir, it has been suggested on grounds as well of justice as expediency, that soldiers and sailors should be subjected to regular examination as well as women. I believe this is done in many regiments; but without discussing the practicability of the suggestion, I venture to think there is no comparison between the cases of prostitutes and the men who consort with them. With the one sex the offence is committed as a matter of gain; with the other it is an irregular indulgence of the human frame. Another of the statements put forward by the opponents of these Acts is—

“That as the women go through the streets to the examination room they are the subjects of cheers or gibes, according to the character of the spectators, and that men of almost every rank are to be seen waiting outside the examination rooms for the women who shall be allowed to pass out, as being safe for that day at any rate, or they would not be allowed to go at large.”

Now, Sir, irrespective of the gross improbability of this statement, can it be believed that the visiting surgeon or the police would permit such conduct? No, Sir, the result of my inquiries on this point satisfies me that there is no truth whatever in the assertion. As a rule, persons are never seen waiting near the examining rooms, and the only exceptions to this have been when the agents of the Repeal Association have posted themselves near the doors, and accosted the women on their way to and from the examination room. And I may add that the women made no opposition to these Acts until they were excited to do so by the Repeal agents, and I think, Sir, it can be readily understood that among women of this class, never accustomed to control or restraint of any kind, there will be found some who may be easily induced by persons whom they look upon as superior in position and intelligence to themselves, to defy or evade the law. It has been stated that these Acts are, medically speaking, a failure. If, Sir, this be so, it is indeed strange that the medical officers of the Army and Navy who must be necessarily special judges of the relative amount of syphilitic disease in their regiments or ships at different times and under differing circumstances, and who have no interest at all in any preventive measures, except so far as they are found to affect the health of the men in the public service, have arrived at, I believe, the unanimous conclusion that the Acts have caused a great reduction of disease in the protected towns in the United Kingdom. In 1872, Lord Aberdare, who was the Home Secretary, said—“Although there was a difference of opinion on the moral effects of the Contagious Diseases Act, the general conclusion to which he had arrived was, that its effects in preventing women from entering on a profligate life was so strong and so great as to make the moral good prevail over the moral evil.” He also admitted “that the evidence given by both naval and military officers was conclusive to the effect that there was a great diminution in the amount of prostitution. The most blessed effect of the Act was that it had almost entirely put a stop to that most horrible form of vice—juvenile prostitution.” And, Sir, I will take this opportunity of saying that I find from the 14 towns included in Dr. Balfour’s tables presented to Parliament, now under the Acts, that the average ratio of primary syphilis in the four years ending 1863, previous to any preventive legislation, was 129 per 1,000, in the four years ending 1873, 53 per 1,000. In the 14 towns included in Dr. Balfour’s tables, never under the Acts, the average ratio for the four years ending 1863 was 121 per 1,000, for the four years ending 1873, 107 per 1,000. In the coastguard ship at Southampton, where the Acts were first applied in 1870, the ratio of primary syphilis has fallen from 104 per 1,000 in 1868 to 26 per 1,000 in 1873, the mean ratio for the four years in which the Acts have been in force having been 31 per 1,000. In the coastguard ship at Hull, where the Acts have never been in force, the ratios have varied since 1867 from 111 and 155 per 1,000 to 100 per 1,000, the mean ratio for the four years ending 1873 having been 124 per 1,000. I should just like to refer to Winchester, as the state of that town was very alarming in 1866. The Acts were first applied there in 1870, in that year 163 women were sent into the Lock Hospital at Aldershot, and 143 individual women were put on the register for the first time; in 1875 only 28 individual women were registered for the first time, and 12 only were sent to the Lock Hospital. In 1873, 179 girls between the ages of 12 and 18, and 117 women between the ages of 18 and 30, who had been found in bad company and improper places, were rescued by means of the police employed under the Acts. There were also 219 who had commenced immoral practices, but who discontinued to do so on being cautioned by the police, and were consequently not registered. I need not mention the numbers which were saved in 1874, as they were stated last year, but I find from the official Report just presented to Parliament, that 374 young girls and women were rescued and prevented by the police in 1875 from a sinful life. These together form a total of 889 girls and young women prevented in the course of two years from beginning a life of open infamy. There can be no doubt as to the accuracy of these statements, which are published by Captain Harris, assistant commissioner of police, and they can all be verified by inquiry. Sir, these are facts and statements, few I admit, but the importance of which it is impossible to over-rate; and I think instead of hon. Gentlemen abusing these Acts, and wishing to have them repealed, we ought rather to be thankful when we reflect that they have both directly and indirectly promoted the objects of sanitary and municipal police. When we reflect that they have also purged the town and encampments to which they have been applied of miserable creatures who were masses of rottenness and vehicles of disease, and provided them with asylums where their sufferings could be temporarily relieved, even if their malady was beyond cure, and where their better nature was probably for the first time touched by human sympathy, then I say when we hear of appeals being made to the wives and mothers of England, to prevent the coming snare of vice being made easy to the rising youth of this country, let that appeal go forth for what it is worth, but let the House of Commons remember, and let the wives and mothers of England remember that the question we have to weigh in the balance to-day affects not so much the present as the future generations. We must place in one scale the repeal of these Acts for injuries and wrongs, imaginary or real, inflicted on those affected by these Acts, and on the other scale we must place a diseased and disabled people; a disease which may not confine its ravages to him immediately sharing in the sin, but which may inflict a terrible and lasting punishment on an innocent wife and mother, a disease which destroys the peace of the living, and the health and the happiness of those yet unborn. I must thank the House for the kind indulgence it has given me, and I will only add in conclusion that I think we ought to bear in mind that great evils must be remedied by measures sometimes apparently harsh; but that ought not to prevent us from giving them our support, when by so doing one of the most inveterate maladies to which the people of this country can be exposed is greatly diminished, and by which the innocent are often involved in the consequences of the guilt of others. And, Sir, it does appear to me that we have no reason in 1876 for voting against the Acts which have done much to eradicate a disease, that it shall no longer supply such a large proportion of patients to our hospitals, nor corrupt and poison the very life-blood of countless thousands of our people.

MR. STANSFELD: Sir, we have already heard in the course of this debate of the difficulties of this subject under discussion. Attempts were made to clear the Speaker's Gallery because the subject was considered one which it was so difficult fitly to speak upon in this Assembly. I would put it to the House, what must public opinion think of a law which we hesitate to discuss with open doors? Sir, no man can be more conscious of the difficulties of this subject than I am, for I suppose that no man has more often taken part in its discussion. But the difficulties that I feel do not in any degree depend upon the delicate, or, as some will have it, the repulsive nature of the subject. Those difficulties vanish for the serious-minded man, who is impressed with the moral gravity of the subject, and who addresses the public upon it under a sense of responsibility. Sir, the difficulty which I have felt, and which I feel to-day, arises from total considerations. The difficulty arises from the very vast

ject and its many sides, and because I know the disinclination which exists in many minds to look into the question, and fairly to take in and to appreciate the arguments adduced against this legislation. Now, we who oppose the Contagious Diseases Acts have been called fanatics, and I admit to you that for the time being the very persistence of our conviction exercises a repellent effect on the minds of those who are not disposed to argue or even to listen to us. So much so that I have often remarked that because of this so-called fanaticism on our part hon. Members in this House, and many men out of this House, are disposed to take anything and everything for granted in favour of this legislation, simply out of reaction against us who seek to compel their attention to it. They take everything for granted in its favour, they believe certain things without having any real grounds of conviction at all, and they believe that they know without having studied any of the evidence of the subject. Now, Sir, one of the strongest evidences, to my mind, of this condition of mind among many persons is, the implicit credence given to the statements contained in police Returns—I do not mean the credence given to any mere statements of facts, but I mean the weight given to these statements of facts as evidence of the efficiency and the moralizing influence of this legislation. I do not propose to go into this part of the question at any length to-day, because I should trespass too long upon the patience of the House—and that part of the question has already been dealt with by my hon. Friend who moved the second reading of the Bill, and will, I dare say, be dealt with again by other hon. Members before the debate is closed; but I would say in reply to the hon. Baronet who has just addressed the House (Sir Charles Legard), that there is no clause in any of these Acts which gives the metropolitan police, or any other police, any power to suppress brothels, or to reclaim prostitutes, and that whatever influence they may choose to exercise, either directly or indirectly, in reducing the number of brothels, in warning girls or in reclaiming prosti-

³¹ ~~could~~ be exercised precisely to ~~that~~ and effect, if the Con-~~acts~~ Acts were not in exist-~~are~~ certain things which

I desire very much to state, and, if I can, to demonstrate to the House, if it will grant me its patient hearing. I wish to show, as distinctly as I can, the origin of this legislation—the ideas and expectations in which it originated. They have been referred to by the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Legard) who has just spoken. I want to prove to the House that, in spite of the figures which he has placed before them, these expectations have not been realized. The question before us, practically, is not whether we will maintain the status quo, and, for the sake of Army and Navy efficiency, retain these Acts in our garrison and seaport towns. In my opinion it is not possible for us, for any length of time, to hold that ground. I believe these Acts will be extended if they are not repealed; and I will give the House my reasons for that belief. Then, Sir, I desire to point out, from Continental experience, the demoralization which is certain to result from the prolonged existence of a law, whether partially applied or extended to the whole country, such as the law which now exists; and I speak of demoralization not merely in the ordinary sense—in the sense of sexual morality or immorality—but of demoralization in the sense of the destruction of all notions of liberty, of law, and of justice in this land. We are sometimes asked, what substitutes we would propose for the Contagious Diseases Acts. We are not bound to propose substitutes for a law which we hold to be altogether evil. If substitutes are held to be necessary, then it will be for the Government of the day to propose substitutes. But though I can recognize no obligation in this respect, I do not shrink—so far as the expression of my personal opinion is concerned—from stating clearly to the House the principles with reference to which I, for one, should discuss and consider any substitutes which might be proposed for the existing legislation in this matter. There is one more fact which I wish to state before I address myself to my argument, and that is, the fact that the opposition to this legislation is no longer confined to our own country. A common evil and a common danger have made other countries unite with us in a common cause, and the movement against the State-sanction and State-regulation of sexual vice, has extended into many lands besides our own. It has extended not only into other countries of Europe, but into the Colonies, and into the United States of America; and, at this moment, the movement is making great progress, both in the Republic of Switzerland and in the Kingdom of Italy. In the Kingdom of Italy a Commission, similar to the one which sat in this country some years ago, is now engaged in considering all the regulations which govern the conditions of prostitution in that country; and, Sir, I feel bound to say to the House that those in this country and elsewhere who have thus banded themselves together in what they hold to be a good cause—are not unconscious—none, indeed, can be so conscious—of the enormity of the task which they have taken upon themselves; but they have taken it upon themselves, moved by a profound sense of duty, of fidelity to the highest principles which ought to guide our actions in this life, and they do not feel it permitted to them to relax their efforts. I will now, with the leave of the House, turn to the first of my subjects—the original object of the introduction of this legislation. Now the original object was to promote the efficiency of our military and naval Forces. I know that that object has been widened—and I will not forget that as I go on—but the original object, the justification in people's minds, of this legislation as far as it goes (for it is confined to these districts around our military and naval stations) was the preservation of the efficiency of our Army and Navy Forces. The hon. Baronet who spoke last has referred to the conditions—frightful conditions—of disease in 1853; and, no doubt, from that reference he is equally conscious of the large expectations of improvement which were held out at the time when the Act of 1864 was first introduced. My proposition is that these expectations have not been realized; that their realization has not been even approximated, and I do not think any man really aware of the extent of the expectations in those times, and familiar with subsequent figures, can deny my proposition that these expectations have not been realized, even upon the Returns and figures of the Government themselves. Now, I will take the Government Returns, the Army and Navy Medical Reports. I am about to question any figures in those Reports. I am about to enter into no close or doubtful calculations. It appears to me that the classification of disease might in minor points be contested; but I will deal with the thing largely, and I do not think my right hon. Friend who will follow me will find any reason to question the accuracy of my statement. I will avoid the use of medical terms—I have never found it necessary to use medical terms. I will first point out that the Army Medical Reports divided the diseases caused by sexual vice into two heads, and without giving the medical names, will characterize the one as “the less” and the other as “the more serious class.” With regard to the less serious class, it is not only explicitly admitted, on the face of the Army and Navy Reports, but shown by these very Reports, that no diminution has followed, as a consequence of the enactment of these Acts. That is with respect to the less serious class of disease. With regard to that which is called the more serious class of disease, there is a decrease. Now, that decrease has often been exaggerated to my mind. But I will not for the moment deal with the question of that exaggeration. There is a decrease, but whatever that decrease may be—whatever proportion of that decrease may be due to the influence of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and whatever proportion to a continuation of the decrease which was previously going on from year to year, and which was due to causes entirely independent of the Acts—whatever those proportions may be, my proposition is, that the decrease is in the less serious cases only of this more serious class. I will give the House what, to my mind, is a proof of the accuracy of my proposition. I turn to the Army and Navy Reports to find out what has been the effect of this legislation upon the disease, upon which the hon. Baronet who has just spoken was so eloquent—

turn to these figures I find whole Army, of which now stated to be there is no re-serious cases.

Mr. Stansfeld

Inspector General Lawson has questioned this statement. What is the result according to his calculation? It is simply this—that whereas I have said that in the year 1866 the admissions to the hospitals in respect of the more serious cases of constitutional disease were in the proportion of 23·39 per 1,000, and that in 1872 they were in the proportion of 24·26, the real facts were that—taking into account cases which I have omitted because they were, so to say, concealed under other names—the admissions for the year 1866 were in the proportion of 24·8. That is to say, 24·8 instead of 23·29. Well, I really do not think we need deal with decimals in a matter of this kind. I do not think my right hon. Friend would justify this exceptional legislation on the ground that as far as the Army Medical Reports show, there is a decrease of a decimal in the admissions to the hospitals, in respect of the more serious cases of constitutional disease. I think we really must deal with the matter in a somewhat more comprehensive manner, and I have no doubt that that will be the course of the right hon. Gentleman. Now I come to the home Navy, with which he must be particularly familiar. With respect to the less serious class of disease, there is a very large increase of admissions in the case of the home Navy. There is no progressive decrease in that which is really serious—constitutional disease; and if I come to the question of efficiency, I find that, taking all these classes of disease together, as regards the Navy, the number of admissions of constantly sick and of invalided per 1,000 is larger now than it was at the date of the passing of these Acts. Now, I differed from the calculations of the Secretary of State for War—or, rather, the right hon. Gentleman differed from my figures—last year. The calculations he then read to the House are not in the Army and Navy Reports, and have not been laid on the Table of the House in the shape of a Return; and I submit that it is hardly fair to the House that we should be expected to take for granted, not only figures, but calculations and deductions from figures which are not placed before us in order that we may carefully analyze and consider them ourselves. I have had some opportunity since of knowing—I think, accurately—what was the basis of these calculations, and I believe it to have been this—The theory was that it was necessary in this case, in order to avoid errors arising from fluctuation from year to year, to compare periods of a certain length in former years with periods of the same length in subsequent years. Statistically speaking, that is, generally, a perfectly sound method of proceeding; but here there are special circumstances which have to be taken into consideration. Taking periods of a certain length for our calculations, we find that in one period there was a steady, continuous diminution of these diseases, owing to causes perfectly independent of the Acts, because pre-existent to them: and it is neither fair nor accurate, statistically speaking, to take a long period before the Acts to get a higher starting point. For a considerable number of years before the enactment of the Contagious Diseases Acts there was a constant and steady diminution in these diseases, from causes which military men know well; and in the number of admissions into hospitals in respect of these diseases. I am therefore entitled to argue that the only correct method of calculation, the only sound datum and starting point is, to begin at a point of reduction in disease which we had attained before the passing of these Acts, and compare what was existent at that particular time with what has existed subsequently. There is another source of error in the Government calculations to which I would call the attention of my right hon. Friend. I ask his attention to these sources of error, because I do not know that they have ever been pointed out to him, and because I am sure he would desire to deal with this matter fairly. In the Army Reports, a comparison is made between the subjected districts and certain selected districts. These districts have, of course, been selected with every intention to select them fairly; but I think I can show to my right hon. Friend and the House that there is an error latent in that selection, although, of course, unintentional. If, instead of taking the selected districts for comparison, you were to take the whole of the Army outside the subjected districts, you would reduce the number of admissions in the rest of the Army 20 per cent. That is to say, you have gained 20 per cent in your argument in favour of the Acts by taking those selected districts. But there is another source of error in taking the selected districts, because if you take London and Dublin you will see that there are exceptional circumstances affecting the rate of admissions. I submit to the House that the cases of London and Dublin are so far exceptional that we cannot select them for a true comparison; and I will show how the comparison is thereby disturbed. In the year 1873, the average numbers constantly in hospital per 1,000 in respect of the more serious class of disease were in the proportion of 4.45. In the selected districts the proportion was 8.86; but if you eliminate London and Dublin from these selected districts, you will reduce the proportion from 8.86 to something like 4.90. In the year 1874 the proportion in the subjected districts was 3.11 per 1,000; in the selected districts it was 6.89; and if you eliminate London and Dublin, it would be 4 and a small decimal, which I have not been able with perfect certainty to calculate. If you take in the unselected districts, I believe there will be no difference whatever between the numbers per 1,000 constantly sick from the more serious class of disease in the subjected districts, and the numbers for the whole of the rest of the Army. I only wish the right hon. Gentleman to take these figures into his consideration. Inspector General Lawson's figures were somewhat extraordinary. He made out, and appears to have persuaded the Secretary of State for War that in the subjected districts there was a saving through the Acts of 387 men daily; but he arrived at that conclusion by a method of calculation which appears to me to be erroneous. He found that if it had not been for the Acts, the numbers constantly sick would have been 13.41, instead of 5 and a decimal, which I have not heard stated; but in the unsubjected and selected districts, which are favourable to the supporters of the Acts, the numbers constantly sick were only 8.86; and therefore it is perfectly clear that there is an error in this method of calculation which cannot stand the test of criticism. These are really imaginary figures, based on calculations which, to my mind, cannot be sound; and, at any rate, they are calculations on hypotheses and not figures representing the actual state of the case. One more thing I have to say. Since Lord Cardwell's Order of 1873 it is admitted, on the face of these Returns, that they are not worth the paper on which they are written. In the latter part of 1873, Lord Cardwell issued an Order stopping the pay of soldiers in hospitals, and before that expired we had a marvellous drop in the number of admissions, followed by a much more marvellous one in 1874. I know, and any of the medical officers engaged in the Army Department will confirm the statement, that they do not themselves rely upon, and consequently that we are not bound to accept, those Returns as to admissions to hospital since the date of that Order stopping the pay of the soldier when he was in the hospital. Now, taking a large view of this subject, and not going into minute matters of a few figures—1, 2, or 3 per cent, more or less—the question I have to put to the Government and the House is this—Assuming for the moment that the only question is simply the maintenance of these Acts for the purpose of securing and promoting efficiency in our naval and military Forces, I ask whether there is any sufficient evidence of success to justify us, even for that purpose and object, in maintaining legislation to which none of us can assent without repugnance and regret? But this question of efficiency is not, to my mind, the real question. There is nothing I so earnestly desire to do as to enable the House to appreciate the real dimensions of this question. My proposition is that we cannot stop here—that if these Acts are not repealed, they will inevitably be extended, and I will justify that proposition by arguments founded upon logic, experience, and positive evidence of intention, so far as this country is concerned. First, however, with regard to the argument of the hon. Baronet who immediately preceded me (Sir Charles Legard)—the argument as to constitutional disease. The hon. Baronet asked the House to hesitate before it repealed Acts which, to his mind, had already put a strong check upon that constitutional disease which he said might affect generations yet unborn. I have shown the House that there is really no substratum of fact, as far as we can judge from the evidence before us in these Returns, to justify the appeal of the hon. Baronet. I do not believe in the fact, but neither do I believe in the argument based upon it. I believe that even if you could, by generalizing this legislation, stamp out a specific disease, you would give such a sanction, and such a stimulus to vice, that, leaving the question of morality entirely on one side, you would, inevitably, in the course of a generation, bring about a general physical degeneracy far worse than any specific disease. But as the argument used by the hon. Baronet is one that operates on many minds; let us consider where it would lead us. Those who believe it cannot be satisfied with legislation confined to certain limited stations. If society is justified in this special legislation by the duty of endeavouring to stamp out a certain constitutional disease, then society can only be justified if it adopt measures which, by hypothesis, are capable of producing such an effect. How can you produce such an effect if you confine this legislation to certain exceptional military and naval stations? I say, therefore, that if you reflect upon it, you will see that the argument based on the necessity of stamping out constitutional disease—if, indeed, it could be done—must, by an absolute, logical compulsion, lead you to the necessity and duty of generalizing these laws and making them binding and operative on the whole civil community in this country. My next argument is one founded on experience. If you go to any country on the Continent where these laws have been maintained for a generation, you will not find a single instance where they are confined to military and naval stations. They affect the centres of population, whether military and naval stations or not. Now, as to the question of intent, as far as this country is concerned. All these Army and Navy Medical Reports are full of suggestions that these Acts ought to be extended to the whole civil population—and full of suggestions that any partial failure in their operation is to be attributed to the fact that they are not universal, and that the disease creeps in from the unsubjected districts of the country. But we have other evidence. A year or two ago an officer of the Board of Trade—Mr. T. Gray—went the round of the seaports. He did not speak on the authority of my right hon. Friend; but he went the round of the seaports and preached the extension of the Contagious Diseases Acts in these districts. There are other and more important agencies. A society exists for the extension of these Acts—a society containing amongst its members the names of many eminent medical men, and the names of not a few Members of this House. I have here the Report of that Society for the year 1875, and in that Report I find these words—

“Under present circumstances”—that is to say, the circumstances of the opposition to this legislation—“the society do not aim at so wide and immediate an extension of the Acts as before; but the case of certain seaport towns, not subjected to the Acts, which are known to be hotbeds of disease introduced by sailors of the merchant service of our own and foreign countries is so glaring, and attended with such disastrous consequences, that we feel it our duty to call for special interference to repress this disease.”

And if any more evidence is wanted, we find it in the Report of Captain Harris, to which reference has already been made. (Parliamentary Paper No. 276, June 12.) I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) is here to-day, and will be able to say something on this subject; because this Report speaks of “great efforts being made to extend the Acts to Liverpool and Sheffield,” and says it will be a great benefit if it were extended to the western counties. Well, then, am I not justified in thus judging the logical consequences of the argument based on the necessity of extirpating and stamping out disease? From the experience of foreign countries, and from the evidence of intention in this country itself, am I not justified in saying that there is in these Acts a principle of growth—I would say, of evil growth—an appeal to the worst motives of some men, and to the mistaken philanthropy of others, that these Acts should be extended to the whole community? Now, I will ask the House—assuming that we must consider this subject from this point of view of the inevitable extension of these laws, if they be not repealed—I will ask the House to bear with me a few moments whilst I endeavour to put before them some of the consequences to morality and to law which I think would follow from such an extension. What is the future that we must be prepared for? In every centre of population throughout these islands, you would have, by force of law, a selected, centralized, irresponsible police force, invested with a perfectly arbitrary power of dealing with the question of prostitution, and of bringing upon the register, and to examination, and to the hospitals, all women whom they have reason to suspect. I am not about to discuss the question of discretion—there may be as much discretion among these police as has been asserted—I speak of the arbitrary system; and by arbitrary, I mean above and outside the law. And I say, without fear or possibility of contradiction, that you cannot extend Acts like these to the whole population—that you cannot work Acts like these—unless you invest the police with practically arbitrary discretion; and I say that the so-called “voluntary submission” is an instrument of terrorism, without which you could not work these Acts; for you could not work them, if you had more than a very small percentage of cases before the Courts of Law. Supposing that in every centre of population you had a body of selected, centralized police, because such functions cannot be entrusted to your local police—and, supposing this system in operation for a generation, then I will ask any constitutional lawyer in this House what he thinks would by that time have been the effect, first of all on the character of the police administration of the country, and then upon those principles of law, of judicial administration and of personal liberty, which have been hitherto the basis of our constitutional life? But, though these laws are arbitrary, and would be still more so if they were extended to the whole of the population, they have not yet reached, in this country, anything approaching to the arbitrariness to which they would inevitably attain if we were to extend them. More stringent laws are constantly being demanded by experts on this subject. Wherever these laws have been in operation on the Continent of Europe their failure is denounced by the very medical specialists who are at the head and front of this question, and to remedy this failure, these medical specialists invariably demand more and more stringent legislation of this kind. International medical congresses have been held where such proposals are brought forward as that the examination of the women concerned should take place much more frequently—not once in a fortnight, or once a week, but once every two or three days; and that the compulsory examination should be extended to certain classes of men. I never heard it proposed that it should be extended to the titled or the rich; but I know that the proposal has been made with regard to our own seafaring and manufacturing population, and also to the lower class of officials in other countries. And, lastly, these medical specialists propound that nothing short of an international, universal system, homogeneous and practically identical for all civilized countries, will be sufficient for the purposes which they have in view. I will give you a few quotations from the pamphlet to which my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone) has referred; and in the statements of M. Lecour respecting the condition of Paris, you will find evidence of the accuracy of what I say. [The right hon. Gentleman accordingly read numerous extracts from the pamphlet referred to.] The whole of the extracts I have read to the House form a confession of failure on the part of the greatest expert in these matters in any civilized country in the world. His last and almost despairing demand is for powers which I devoutly trust this House will never sink so low as to accord, and, even if they were accorded, M. Lecour tells us in profound sadness that he has but one hope left, and that hope consists in a return to those moral influences whose power and whose life, it is my deep conviction, would be sapped and undermined by the legislation he proposes. I ask the House, not without much of this same sadness too, whether it is possible for any thinking man, looking at these proofs of the tendency of this legislation and the logical conclusion to which it inevitably leads, and to the experience of foreign countries to support such all-pervading and perfectly arbitrary schemes of police management as it is declared will alone suffice for the hygienic objects in view, whether they are schemes which Parliament ought to sanction; and whether their effect, if they were carried out, would not be to sap the foundation of those principles of law and liberty, morality and religion, which have hitherto been recognized as the basis of our national and constitutional life? Now, is there nothing to be done? I have put that question to myself, and I will endeavour to answer it. Is there

nothing to be done to alleviate human suffering and to check this disease? That is the idea latent in the minds of those who yield to the seduction of this legislation. Is there nothing that can be done? I think there is. I would say, let us act upon the principles of the religion we profess. Let us not be deceived by police details about the reclamation of prostitutes, juvenile or others. Neither legislation nor compulsory examination can help us here, and these are the gist, the kernel of this legislation. We have a right to ask for laws which shall promote order and decency, or rather we have a right to the due administration of the existing laws on these subjects. To my mind, these laws are not duly administered in this metropolis. We have a right to remove temptation from the path of the young of both sexes, and I hope we shall exercise that right. Then we have a duty to discharge—a duty which I, for one, am prepared to admit has not been fully performed in this country. We have the duty of curing disease. I entirely differ from those who would look askance at human misery and disease because it is the consequence of vice. I say, all the more because it is the consequence of vice will I seek to cure it, because, if properly administered, cure may lead to the moral result we ought to desire. I believe that when this legislation is removed—and it will ultimately be removed—there will be an immense and favourable revulsion of public feeling in regard to this part of the subject, and that voluntary, philanthropic, and religious zeal, in co-partnership with medical skill and medical philanthropy, will find means by which far more good can be accomplished than by any compulsory laws. But I would not be content with voluntary efforts alone. The principle of the Poor Law, if properly administered, ought to suffice for all we want. Sanitary legislation and administration are in a state of progress, and I believe that when this question comes before us for a practical purpose, methods will be found by which, not only in the subjected districts, but throughout the country, the alleviation of suffering and the cure of disease may be brought about more surely, through voluntary zeal, and far more efficaciously than by the present Acts. I venture to say, too, here are improvements in the administration of military affairs which might do much good. The health of the Army, especially in these respects, was improving before these Acts were introduced, through the policy of Lord Herbert. I say that active industrial employments for soldiers, the learning of trades, to prevent idle time, a more healthy system of living, more healthy amusements, and greater facilities for marriage—within certain limits of age and length of service—would all have a beneficial effect; and all of these are improvements which, I trust, have not yet been carried to their fullest extent. Short service is the order of the day, and I believe that short service has not yet gone so far as it may do. But if we take our young men into the Army from 19 to 25 years of age, I ask, is it not a monstrous thing to declare by statute that it is inconceivable that any one of these young men can remain virtuous till he returns to his native home, and that therefore we must make statutory Governmental provisions to enable them to be safely vicious? But this is not only monstrous, it is increasingly mischievous; because year by year we shall send a larger number of these young men back to their homes and to civil life, after two years' training in the cynical conception that it is no part of their duty to place the slightest check upon their lowest passions or desires; but that it is part of the duty of the State to provide for the safe indulgence of those passions. I must now thank the House heartily for the close attention with which they have listened to me. I would appeal to them, let us retrace our steps, and thus coming once again on common ground which we can hold consistently with the principles which are dear to us all—the principles of Constitutional law, liberty, and morality, and of the religion we profess, I believe that we shall find manifold ways of doing far more than this legislation can even attempt towards the alleviation of human misery and the cure of disease.

MR. MUNDELLA: I was not desirous of taking any part in this debate, because in the last Parliament I said what I wanted to say; but, having been a Member of that Royal Commission so often alluded to in the speech of the hon. Baronet who moved the rejection of the Bill (Sir Charles Legard), I feel that I ought to say something in relation to some of the statements which he has made to the House. I acquit the hon. Baronet of any desire to misstate anything with respect to that Commission; but I must point out that he has fallen into some glaring errors which I should have hardly expected after his telling the House that he had spent some time in mastering the whole question. The hon. Baronet told us of the frightful ravages of this disease prior to the introduction of these Acts. Now, if there was one thing more clearly established to the satisfaction of that Commission than another, it was that for 20 years past this disease had been very rapidly abating, and it was shown that the ratio of diminution was much greater before 1864 than it had been since that time. The reason was given for this decrease. Lord Herbert had introduced great improvements in the Army; and he did very much to humanize and civilize, as well as to improve the condition of the soldiers. He did very much, also, in the direction of cleanliness and better sanitary arrangements; and the result was that a steady and rapid diminution of the disease took place. I am always unwilling to quote statistics, but I should like to refer to the remarks of Mr. Charles Buxton, formerly M.P., in his Report to the House of that Commission. He traced the whole progress of the disease from the year 1860 to the year 1869, showing that in 1860 the proportion of cases of disease in the Army was constantly 54·72 per 1,000, whereas in 1869 it had run down to 40·82. That was the proportion for all diseases; but he also showed that in 1860 the number of persons who were constantly sick from this special disease was in the proportion of 23·73 per 1,000; in 1861, 24·70; in 1863, 20·31; in 1864, 19·11; and in 1865, 18·14. Then the Acts began to operate, and his whole conclusion shows that four years after the Acts came into operation the diminution was only 1·32, whereas in the four years previous to the introduction of the Acts, the diminution was 3·42. Now, I would further remind the hon. Baronet that I sat for six months on that Commission, and that the Report of the Commission was entirely against the view which he has taken on this occasion. Any one, without previous knowledge, would suppose, hearing the speech which the hon. Baronet addressed to the House

—a speech marked by considerable ability and great fluency—that he had taken his tone from the Report of the Royal Commission; but it is directly in the teeth of that Report, the first condition of which was that the compulsory examinations should be abolished. Well, why did the Royal Commission come to that conclusion? Was it from the conviction that they were likely to diminish the amount of the disease? No; they came to that conclusion on the ground of the immorality of the whole proceedings, and as much as anything from that very fact in regard to which the hon. Baronet has declared there is no real evidence, but merely the false statements of people going about and telling of the abomination of the examinations—statements which had no basis in fact. These are not pleasant things to refer to, but I will show you on most authoritative evidence how completely the hon. Baronet has either mistaken or overlooked the facts of the case. [The hon. Member accordingly read extracts from the evidence of Miss Lucy Bull, Matron of the Royal Albert Hospital at Devonport, and of an officer of the metropolitan police, employed to carry out the Acts at Shorncliffe, which can be read in the Report of the Royal Commission.] And proceeded—After all, this is not a question as to the effect of these Acts on our soldiers and sailors alone. I was very glad to hear the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Legard) confine his argument as to the benefits of this sort of legislation very much to this section of the population, because, whatever may be said to the contrary, these Acts were obviously not designed to put down public-house brothels nor to reclaim fallen women, but solely for one purpose. What that purpose is I will explain to the House by reading to it the language of a Royal Commissioner, than whom a better man or a more just man ever lived. This Report was, as it states, “Respectfully submitted to the Commission” by the Rev. Frederick Denison Maurice—a Report that was put in before the Chairman drew up his Report. He said he could see nothing in the evidence to shake the opinion he should naturally have formed, from reading the Acts, and he went on to say that the aim of the system was to provide fit subjects for fornication. Now, those who know how careful he was in the use of language, how temperate, how fair, just, and impartial he was, will attach much significance to these words. He was, I believe, at one time a vice-president of the Society for the Extension of these Acts. It was the case with him as it has been with several other gentlemen who formed part of the Royal Commission; some of them went in as subscribers, and others as vice-presidents of the Society of the Extension of these Acts, and they left the Society with the full conviction and determination in their minds that the compulsory examination of women should be abolished. And here let me remind the House that 16 of the Members of the Commission were agreed upon this point, and there were only some six or seven who did not think with them. Among the latter I may mention Lord Hampton and Sir John Trelawny, both of whom were Members of this House at the time, and had introduced the Acts; while the others were official members, one of them being the surgeon to the Metropolitan Police. But the fact remains that the balance of testimony, both as to the sanitary question and as to the moral question, was decidedly against the Acts. As to the sanitary part of the question—which I think is the very lowest ground upon which you can consider it, because there is the far greater and more important question of morality and public policy behind—the testimony of Mr. Simon ought to be sufficient; but on this point I may ask who was it that moved to insert a paragraph in the Report to the effect that all the evidence was worthless as establishing a good sanitary result—an Amendment which was only lost by a majority of one? Why, Sir, that Amendment was moved by no less a person than Professor Huxley, who is not a man likely to be swayed by sentiment, and who has been accustomed to analyze evidence. Well, after hearing all the evidence, he strongly urged the Commission to adopt his Amendment, that the testimony they had heard did not prove anything in the shape of any sanitary advantage or diminution of disease likely to be gained by the military and naval forces, or by the whole population, because according to Mr. Simon and Professor Huxley, and the whole of those who could speak with authority, the disease was steadily increasing both in amount and in intensity.

But suppose I grant that the Acts have produced all the sanitary results to which their advocates lay claim; still I say that that is not the question. Suppose I take it for granted that you have saved something to the Army and to the Navy; I should still like to point out what has been the effect, and what will be the effect of such legislation as this upon the whole population. Let us take a contrast. The hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Legard) drew an exceedingly vivid picture of the ravages of this disease among countless thousands. He told us of its dreadful effect on children unborn. We are all aware of this, and we all regret it; but we cannot, by legislation, prevent the consequences of guilt. You may have heard of Dr. Acland, who, when he passed the picture of one of his ancestors, used to shake his stick at it, and say, "You rascal! It was you who gave me the gout." And, perhaps, after all he was justified in his remonstrance. But I wish at this moment to ask the House to contrast the state of health in England, and the condition of the English population generally, with the condition of any other nation in which this sort of legislation is being carried out. As the House is aware, I was a Member of the Royal Commission, and I took a strong interest in the question, and since that Commission has finished its work I have never failed to continue my investigations and reflections upon the subject, and every day, the more I know, the more deeply am I convinced of the radical error of the system. I do not say that we can do nothing to get rid of this disease; on the contrary, I think we can do very much, and the Royal Commission has recommended us to do much. But the Royal Commission say very naturally—"This is a very nasty subject; you have forced it upon us; we have heard the evidence upon it, and we have made up our minds;" and I would warn the House after what that Commission has placed before it not to persist in carrying on the existing legislation. But to proceed with the contrast I desire to put before the House. In France, you have the best system of regulations as applicable to this disease that the police can frame or carry out. Well, as my right hon. Friend below me (Mr. Stansfeld) has already told the House, that system is a failure. I was in Paris last Easter twelve months, staying there during the vacation, and while I was there I was introduced to M. Lecour, who is well acquainted with this subject. We discussed the matter over, and what was the result? He placed in my hands the literature of which he is the author—and I may say that he writes a book on this question nearly every year—and I found that so far from the French doctors being satisfied with what was going on, my friend was in the very midst of contention, discussion, and strife. Dr. Jeannel has written a book, from which it appears that the state of the disease in France is such as to alarm even the least sensitive person; and M. Lecour tells us what he has done, and in a book he published in 1874 he states that he arrested 11,000 women in Paris in the year 1873 for infractions of the regulations relating to this subject, and that yet the disease is increasing at no slow rate. And what, I ask, is the general condition of the French urban population? Contrast it with that of the English population, and I will tell you what you will find. With regard to the French soldiery, there was a statement that appeared in The Revue du Monde to the effect that after the conscription of 1873, it was found that when the men who had been drawn from the urban districts came to be examined, 15,000 of them were rejected as unfit for military service, to something over 10,000 men who were accepted—that is to say, that out of 25,000 men who were drawn in the conscription from the urban districts, only 10,000 were found upon examination to be fit for service. This is the information we have as to the health of the Frenchmen, and much is also said in the same report as to the constitutional character of the disease from which they suffered. Now, let us take another point. The hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Legard) has spoken of the dreadful ravages made by the disease among our own population. I remember that when the Factory Inspectors made their enquiry into the condition of the factory children they stated that they had examined 10,000 children, singly and separately, by means of the medical officers they employed, and they reported as a striking fact that among 10,000 children of the factory population of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Derbyshire, there was scarcely a trace of enthetic disease! I might also refer to Mr. Simon's Report as to the gross exaggeration that has prevailed on this subject. I should now like to refer the House for one moment to an article that appeared in last Saturday's Times. It is a most significant article on the state of the population in France. It calls attention to the facts regarding this country, which I need not go into, and then it goes on to show that the population in Great Britain will, at its present rate of increase, double itself in the course of 63 years, while in Denmark the same process will be accomplished in 73 years, and in Norway in 71 years, whereas in France, taking the ratio of increase for three-quarters of a century, it will require 334 years to double the French population. The Times warns us not to base our institutions on the social and legal institutions of France. Surely, Sir, we have here sufficient contrast between the two countries. In France you have all this compulsory legislation in full force. There you have all you can possibly desire by way of regulation, and yet the population is in the miserable state that has been described. Mr. Simon says it is the public policy of England to promote marriage, while in France it is indiscriminate fornication. What did old Ben Franklin say? and there were few wiser men in his day than he. He taught, from the mere low ground of political economy, that what will maintain one vice will keep two children. Let us beware how we encourage a system under which young men spend the flower of their youth, wasting their time and health in irregular indulgences. Let them have the courage to marry as their forefathers have done, and increase the population. Marriage is the best restraint on the vices of youth, and I verily believe that but for the celibate state of the Army you would never have heard one word of the disease which is now so rife in that service. No one ever hears of the Contagious Diseases Acts being needed for the Civil Service, or for any other service; they are solely passed with the view of maintaining a celibate Army. Very glowing accounts are given of the closing of 250 public-house brothels since these Acts came into force. But I ask, if these Acts are so beneficial, why should they be confined to the districts they at present protect? Why should we not close public-houses all over England? If you find it necessary to maintain a police for the special purpose of enforcing these Acts, why do you not send them all over England? There is no doubt that if the Government were in earnest on the subject they could close all the public-house brothels in every part of England. It is said that they save young girls from the streets. Is that the object of the Acts? I say that, on the contrary, the object is to prepare young girls for the streets, and not to save them. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not doubt that the English policeman, or Englishmen of any kind, would do whatever they can, apart from the mere matter of imposed duty, to save these poor girls. But what did the Royal Commissioners recommend? Why, that girls under 16 or 17 should be taken off the streets; but no one has paid any attention to it. They also recommended that the public-house brothels generally should be closed, but no one has paid any attention to that. Beyond this they made a recommendation that the age at which the seduction of girls should be made criminal should be altered from 12 to 14, and after having fought this for four or five Sessions we have raised the age to 13. I am the last man to say that we ought not to grapple with this evil. On the contrary, I say we ought to do everything we can to grapple with it; and I am seriously assured of one thing, and that is that we should take these poor creatures and heal them, not that they may go and sin again, but that they may "go and sin no more." Captain Harris says there is a strenuous effort being made to extend these Acts to Sheffield. I have made every inquiry in Sheffield, and I believe that there is no town in England where it would be more impossible to introduce these Acts than Sheffield, and I also believe that the whole population would rise, almost en masse, against any attempt to carry out such a project. I trust that when the right hon. Gentleman rises to speak on behalf of the Government, he will tell us how it is that such a statement ever came to be put forward, and who are the persons who have ever made any representation demanding the extension of these Acts to the borough I have the honour to represent. Granting, for the sake of argument, all that you claim on sanitary grounds, I say that in the interests of public morality and public policy these Acts are among the most dangerous, if not the most dangerous, that Parliament has ever introduced during the present century, and that if the policy on which they are founded be persisted in, it will ultimately be found to produce the most mischievous and pernicious results.

MR. HENLEY: Sir, I wish to state shortly why I shall support this Bill. First, what do I find is the practice? I find that these unhappy women are enrolled, as it were, in a kind of regiment, with police officers appointed to look after and command it, and officers of the medical staff attached. And what is all this done for? Not to discourage vice, not to punish immorality; nothing of the kind, but simply to turn these unhappy women among the population almost "warranted free from complaint," in order that they may exercise their calling, which, to say the least of it, cannot be righteous. Such is the actual working of these Acts. And what are the reports we hear from the places where these Acts are in force? Why, we are told that everything that used to disgust in the unhappy victims of this vice is almost entirely removed from sight, and that, on the other hand, these unfortunate people are now much better dressed, so that vice simulates virtue and becomes more attractive. Well, I ask the House, is this a proper object for a Christian Legislature to maintain? For my part I cannot reconcile it with our duty, and when I look to any other part of the world where unfortunately this idea of regulating vice has been prevalent for many years, what do I find is the result? Why the result is—although, perhaps, I am hardly warranted in calling it such—a very low state of morality. Up to within a few years we have abstained from this kind of legislation in our own country. The number of children born in wedlock constitutes a test of the morality of a country that cannot be mistaken, and in that respect, thank God, our country stands so well in comparison with other nations, that I cannot help thinking that the kind of law which is prevalent on almost every part of the Continent must have had something to do in the creation of that worse state of things, as compared with what exists here. And I would here refer to another matter that has struck me very forcibly. In a country immediately opposite to our own, the result of the very low state of morality that has prevailed there has been a want of children. If that country had increased its population in the way this country has, I doubt whether they would not have given a much better account of the Germans than they were able to do. These, Sir, are some of the reasons that will induce me to support this Bill, the object of which is to repeal these Acts. I hardly believe it to be true that sanitary grounds have been the cause of this legislation, because if that really were the case—if those who produce this kind of legislation had no other object—we should not have heard so much stress laid upon this particular point. Indeed, I believe that they would have refrained from proposing these measures, because the medical evidence from the beginning has shown them that they could have no real confidence in the stamping out of this disease unless they applied the law to men as well as to women. But the authorities of this country so far from adopting this course—and their refusal to do so makes me disbelieve their sincerity—not only refrained from applying the law to the men, but they actually discontinued the examination of the men when they began the examination of the women. I have no doubt that the duty was felt disagreeable and disgusting both by the men and the surgeons; but if the real object had been a sanitary object, and if the purpose really was to get rid of the disease for the benefit of the community, I never can believe that they would have taken the course they have adopted, of merely shifting the examination from one sex to the other, when the medical men themselves tell us that this procedure can be of no real value. I am sorry to have taken up the time of the House, but I have felt strongly on this matter; and believing that the legislation against which this Bill is aimed is immoral, I shall vote against it now, as I have done from the beginning, and as I intend to do so as long as I can raise my voice against it.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that although they had arrived at so late an hour, and so near the close of the debate, he was anxious to say a few words in explanation of the vote he intended to give on this question. He was the more anxious to do so, because at one time he had some little responsibility resting upon him in connection with this subject, and he did not think there was any one then sitting in that House who had so complete a knowledge of the steps that were taken by the Government shortly before the first Act was introduced, and when the question was first mooted in Parliament, as he had. As he thought that this legislation was founded on a gigantic delusion, he must ask the House for a few moments to give him its attention while he endeavoured, without going into the moral question, or even into the statistical question, which had been so ably and convincingly dealt with by others, and particularly by his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) to relate the story as it actually came before him at the time he was connected with the Board of Admiralty. About the years 1859 and 1860—he went back thus far, because he wanted to show what this legislation was founded on—the attention of every one connected with the Navy and the Army was drawn, and drawn very forcibly, to the terrible condition of the men at many of the military and naval stations where the disease was no doubt rife to a serious and alarming extent. He remembered particularly well, a little later on, being very much struck by the case of the Warrior. The Warrior was the first iron-clad ship we had, and she was sent on a trial cruise. She carried a picked crew of 500 or 600 healthy men, and she had to put in at Portsmouth for some small repairs to her steering-gear, which occupied a short time. The number of men she left in hospital suffering from this disease was alarming, and no one who was responsible for the efficiency of the Service could hesitate to take any steps that could properly be taken to mitigate such an evil. Now, the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Legard) had spoken with considerable ability against the Motion, and had referred to a Departmental Committee which reported in the year 1862, and which consisted of persons connected officially with the Admiralty and the War Office—a Committee of which he (Mr. Whitbread) had the honourable, although the unpleasant, post of Chairman. As the hon. Baronet had referred to that Committee, and as the time had long since passed away, he did not know that he should be violating any confidence in also referring openly in the House to that Committee, although its Report was never laid before Parliament. That Committee met to consider what steps could be taken in connection with this subject, and they began by asking the assistance of the Foreign Office in collecting information not only as to the law on the subject in Continental States, but also as to the statistics of the disease. He would not go too minutely into all that came before them—he might, however, say that they found that the severity of the regulations in Continental States on this subject bore no relation whatever to the amount of the disease. He would beg the House to bear this fact in mind. As it was then so was it now. The House had just heard what his right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) and others had told them about the evidence from France. The Committee also had found that in many places where the regulations were extremely severe the disease was alarming—quite as bad as it was in England; and they had found that in other places where there appeared to be few regulations, and where these were scarcely put in force, the disease varied, being sometimes lighter and sometimes more severe. But there was one, as he thought, most unfortunate case, and he believed it was out of that one particular case that a vast deal of the mischief of the present legislation originated. That was the case of Malta. There, long before the time he was speaking of, there had been repressive laws on this subject, and a few years before the date of the Committee those laws had been repealed. The disease immediately sprang up. Those laws were re-enacted, and the disease was apparently for a time stamped out. This it was that led to the cry by which this legislation was forced on the country, and every one talked of stamping out the disease. This was what had been the cardinal delusion. Before he proceeded further he would here state that there was another place under the control of the British Government—he referred to Gibraltar—where laws as repressive as those at Malta were enforced with this advantage, that if a woman were found to be diseased she could be dispatched right across the neutral territory and got rid of without the trouble of putting her into a hospital, and yet the disease at Gibraltar ~~was~~ ^{was} as it was in England. He gentlemen from both places

how this difference was to be explained, and he remembered a gentleman well acquainted with Malta stating to him in private conversation the reason for what had been observed at that island. That gentleman had stated that at Malta the class of women who associated with the soldiers and sailors was a totally distinct class, and as thoroughly well-known as if they were negroes and of a different colour from the rest of the population. It was, therefore, possible to lay hold of all of them. There was no other place from which a fresh importation could come, no place where so complete a cordon could be drawn around those women; but at Gibraltar, as in England, if they tried the stamping out process, they would find a very large border land which they could not regulate. There was an enormous number of these women in different places, who were ostensibly earning an honest living during the day, and whom no police in the country could touch, for public opinion would not stand it. Let them pass what Acts they liked, there were points beyond which they dared not go, and if they were to attempt to interfere too severely with women who, to all appearance, were earning an honest living during the day, but who might be conducting themselves irregularly at other times, there would be such a revolution of public opinion against them that they would soon have to rescind the legislation which raised the outcry. Another point that came before the Committee was the terrible condition of the poor women, living in the neighbourhoods where soldiers were quartered; and, he must say, that this was one of the most painful things the Committee had inquired into. The local police officers and others detailed the condition in which those poor women were—not so much with regard to their moral degradation as with respect to the physical misery and torture they had to endure; for when a soldier or sailor found himself diseased by a woman, his revenge was not always of the tenderest character. The Committee were told by the local police authorities, that if voluntary hospitals were set up, the condition of those poor women was such that they would gladly go into them. The hon. Baronet had referred to the Report of this Committee as if they were supporters of the Act. He would read one clause of their Report containing their recommendation to show whether this was so. A coercive course was strongly urged on the Committee, and they said—

“The former or coercive course has been strongly urged upon your Committee, by many who have had opportunity for observing the fearful extent and evil consequences of venereal disease in our military and naval hospitals. Your Committee, however, have not found in the Reports from foreign countries where this system is practised, such conclusive and consistent evidence of the diminution of the disease by coercive measures as to lead them, particularly while the other course remains untried, to recommend for adoption in this country a system involving new and questionable principles of legislation, and certain to be distasteful to a large portion of the public.”

This Report was acted upon for a certain time and to a certain extent. Parliament voted money for the erection of Lockwards at different seaports and military stations, and, to a certain extent, the voluntary system was tried. But it had a most unfair trial as compared with the coercive system. For how was it tried? It was tried tentatively, by opening one small ward at each of three stations, and it was tried for a short time only. The fact was that it was starved in point of accommodation, and it was voted a failure upon the very smallest evidence that could be brought against it, without an attempt to find a remedy for the weak points discovered in it. It was tried at Devonport with 25 beds, and the contribution to the ward containing them was only paid on the quarterly certificate of the Commander-in-Chief, who was the Admiralty visitor, that the beds had been fully occupied during the quarter. But the moment coercion was put in force they had four times as much accommodation. Was that a fair trial? No one could deny that the wards opened on the voluntary system were filled, but it was charged against them that the patients went out before they were cured, and that they did not go in soon enough in the earlier stages of the disease. And now the great stamping-out theory came in. But it seemed to be forgotten that the first thing necessary in the stamping-out process was to get the thing to be stamped out under their feet, and that was what had never been done with the disease in any country with the single exception of Malta. About the time this legislation began the cattle plague had appeared, and it was supposed that it had been stamped out, and it was thought that human beings could be dealt with in the same way as cattle; but what would have been thought of the wisdom of the cattle plague regulations if they had only interdicted the travelling of diseased cattle on the turnpike roads, and had left all the bye-ways open? This was exactly what was happening with regard to these Acts. If it were possible to stamp out this disease, how was it that during the period the coercive system had prevailed it had been productive of so small a result? Another point was that under the voluntary system the objection felt to the system of registering the names was obviated. The great point that was made against the voluntary system, was that women went out before they were cured; but admitting that this might be the case in some instances, he considered that the system had immense advantages over that of compulsion. The only real argument in favour of the continuance of these Acts would be their success, and that they had not been a success was fully apparent from the evidence. It was quite evident that the Contagious Diseases Acts had no power in them to prevent immorality. There was no new power for keeping order in the streets—that was done by other laws. There was no especial power to enable them to reform young girls or to suppress bad houses. If any man spoke a kind word to a young person entering upon an evil course it would have its effect if it were a word in season, but these words were not spoken under any authority given by the Contagious Diseases Acts. If a police officer spoke them he did so out of his own humanity and not as directed by the Acts. He could not shut his eyes to the fact that a certain number of these women might be deterred from entering the prescribed districts and following an immoral life by the dread of being put upon the register. But, to his mind, this power of registration was the most tremendous that could be put in the hands of any set of men. He submitted that if the State were to continue this power and this attempt to make people virtuous by threatening to place them on the black list, it ought not to be confined to this particular offence, ~~to be confined to this particular offence,~~ ~~He did not wish to say a~~ single word against the police who had to carry out these Acts. He himself had had a hand in placing the Metropolitan Police in the Dockyards, and he believed that a better step in the way of economy was never made. He was fully aware of the good services rendered by that force, but he greatly regretted that they had employed them in this business; but should these Acts be extended, as was proposed, they could be no longer worked by the Metropolitan Police, and he wanted to know how they would be enabled to get a sufficient number of experienced and competent men to discharge the duties—it would be impossible to find a sufficient number of the Metropolitan Police for the purpose. He would here refer to a suggestion contained in a speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), which he made last year, and which had been backed up by Petitions of singular weight, which he presented the other day. The suggestion was that they should treat this disease as they treated other contagious diseases, and say that any person should be punished for wilfully and knowingly communicating it. If they were to act upon this expedient, they would have this great advantage that they would punish not only her, but him who communicated disease. In that case the legislation would be fair and equal as between the two sexes. The policy that had been adopted in the Army appeared to him a great mistake. There it was made penal to contract the disease, and the soldier who did contract it was placed under stoppages. He could not imagine a more fatal policy; because if, in place of making it penal to the soldier or sailor to contract the disease, they had put him under stoppages for concealing the fact, and made it penal to communicate the disease, they would have been dealing with the matter in a far more sensible and natural manner. Now, as it had been found impossible to stamp out disease in this country by coercion, was it not time to consider whether there might not be some alternative course? The voluntary system was voted a failure, but the solid fact remained that the voluntary wards were popular and full. He was now going to state that which he could not prove, but which he believed to be true, and believed still to be true, that it was this, that into the Lock wards, under the voluntary system, women were induced to enter of a class whom the police could not have touched under a coercive system. The reason why the police could not introduce them would perhaps be seen in the report of one of the cases in Captain Harris' recent Paper. But what was the difference? In that time he was speaking of women coming in; no questions were asked; they were cured and they went out, no one being able to point at them in their future life. Now they could not come in without having their names placed upon the register. The result was that many women were kept out who, under the voluntary system, would have been brought in. If it were true that the women left before they were cured, that might have been met. He considered the point at the time, and it seemed to him best if they had a voluntary system to rely upon it as a purely voluntary system; but it must be evident that it would be a very different thing to take powers to detain a person who had voluntarily come into the hospital and to exercise the power which was now in operation under the Contagious Diseases Acts. The objections as to the two would be of a very different degree. In fact, in our Poor Law system, as at present administered, there was power to detain in the workhouse infirmary any person who might be brought in affected with one of these diseases. His own opinion was that it would be better to rely on the system as purely voluntary until we had more experience upon the subject; and if, after that experience, it were found necessary to take powers to detain the dangerous, then the objection he would have to offer to legislation of that kind would be very different in degree and in kind from that which he entertained to the police powers of the present Acts. Now, it could not be said that no alternative was offered. He was as anxious as the hon. Baronet who spoke against the Bill (Sir Charles Legard) to minimize, as far as possible, this disease, but he honestly thought that the end might be attained by means less objectionable than those by which it was now sought. He would earnestly appeal to his right hon. Friend at the head of the Board of Admiralty to apply his own candid mind to the consideration of the question. Let them get rid of the various supposed indirect advantages of the system, and ask themselves whether it was clear that the voluntary plan would not have done at least as much as the Acts; at all events, if supplemented by some of the provisions to which he had been referring; he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to believe it was as unpleasant for them to bring this matter forward as it could be for him or others to defend the Acts. He sincerely hoped, for one, that it might not be necessary to have an annual discussion upon it. But the right hon. Gentleman himself was far too fair to say to them that whilst these Acts were upon the Statute Book, and whilst the Government published an annual Report, with the fullest details from the officer who was at the head of the system, they on their side who objected to them were to keep silence. On the subject of the agitation against these Acts he wished to say one or two words, and he could say them more freely because he had taken no part either by speech or in any other way in the progress of the agitation in question. But he did believe that the agitation was engaged in by those who moved in it first upon the purest principles. He was glad the two sides were beginning to understand each other. He remembered last year, in the justly commended speech of the hon. and gallant Officer (Colonel Alexander) who moved the rejection of the Bill repealing the Acts, that he listened to no part with more pleasure than the graceful tribute he bore to the high character and qualities of a lady who had been much engaged in the agitation. Let the House remember, if it was unpleasant for them in that Chamber to have to discuss this question, what it must have been for ladies, against whose life or character there was not the faintest breath of any suspicion, to have come forward and thrown themselves into a public agitation upon such a subject. They must have suffered deeply and acutely. Those who were engaged in this agitation were amongst the most deserving of our citizens. They took up this matter after mature consideration, knowing what it would cost them, and they were not likely to lay it down quickly, believing as they did that there was a vital principle at stake. And now, as it seemed to him, that the time was ripe for a solution of the question, he urged upon the Government not to leave it in the hands of private Members, but to take up the matter for themselves. If they were to get rid of the police powers in these Acts, and if they could come again to the voluntary system, they would be rid of much that was now distasteful to the public. It could truly be said by those who opposed these Acts that the relationship which had been established between the police and houses of ill-fame was novel and dangerous—one of co-operation rather than of repression. It was said that now for the first time in this country legislation had made authority the handmaid of vice; and believing that the question could not rest where it was—that either one side or the other must prevail, either we must get rid of the coercive system or the Acts must be extended—he earnestly urged upon the House and the Government to take this question up and endeavour to put an end at once to this painful agitation.

MR. HUNT: I agree with most of those who have spoken, that this is a subject which it is painful to discuss. It is most painful for me to speak upon it. I have never opened my lips upon it before, and I should not have troubled the House on the present occasion but for the fact that the Government Department of which I have the honour to be the head, has necessarily been referred to in the discussion, and that I have felt it my duty, as an administrator of the Navy, to examine carefully the evidence on which the maintenance of these Acts rests. Looking at that evidence in the most unprejudiced manner, I am bound to confess that the health of the Navy has materially benefited by the operation of these Acts which the measure before the House proposes to repeal. [Quoting from the published Reports of the health of the Army and Navy, the right hon. Gentleman here instanced the case of the Britannia at Dartmouth, where for three years there had been no case of disease among the crew. A similar state of things had been experienced in the case of a vessel at Southampton. The carefully collected statistics which were to be found in these Reports as to the home stations, and as to Malta, Gibraltar, Calcutta, and other places where the Acts were in operation, showed, as he contended, that in the case of the Army as well as in the case of the Navy, the Acts had decreased disease and greatly diminished its virulence, where it had not entirely stamped it out.] He continued: That the disease will occasionally occur in isolated cases, even under most effectual surveillance, is only what may be expected, but there is abundant testimony to the efficient manner in which the Acts have been carried out. Reading the health statistics, coming as they do from the naval authorities, and from the military authorities, I cannot conceive that anyone can come to any other conclusion than that the operation of these Acts has been materially beneficial to the health of the Services. I know it is said by some hon. Gentlemen—"You have no business, and it is not the duty of the State, to diminish this disease;" and I believe some go so far as to say it is the duty of the State to leave this matter entirely alone because this disease is the proper punishment of sin. I cannot go with that argument. I think that, even supposing the disease never affected any but those who are sinners, it is our duty to alleviate the infirmities of humanity, even when brought about by the wrongful acts of the patients themselves. But when we think of the innocent persons who have been alluded to by the hon. Member behind me (Sir Charles Legard), who suffer from this disease, I think it becomes the duty of the State to step in. With reference to that, I may call attention to some statistics that I do not think have been mentioned in this House with reference to this matter. My hon. Friend behind me (Sir Charles Legard) alluded to the thousands unborn who were the victims of the sins of their forefathers, and upon whom fell the greater part of the burden of suffering which these sins entailed. What do I find in the Registrar General's supplement to his fifth Annual Report of Births, Deaths, and Marriages? What does he say with regard to deaths by syphilis? He says the registered deaths for syphilis during the 26 years from 1848 to 1873 were 31,860, of whom 22,269 were infants under one year of age; 24,253 were under five years of age; so that we see that of the registered deaths in consequence of this disease, a very large proportion indeed were innocent babes. With these figures before us I think no one can say it is not the duty of the State, so far as in it lies, to repress this disease, so as to prevent posterity being affected by this horrible disorder. These Acts, as has been stated during the course of this debate, were first proposed with the view of maintaining the efficiency of our military and naval forces. They were not proposed in the interests of morality. They were proposed in the interest of the efficiency of the Services; and when it was stated that the loss to the Army was, by reason of this disease, equal to three regiments, I think it was about time the Government stepped in, to see whether some remedy could not be applied to this most horrible state of things. Although that was the primary object of the Acts, it was thought that, concurrently with the cure of our soldiers and sailors, something might be done to cure the morals and religion of the unfortunate women concerned, and therefore in these Acts there was special provision that, in every hospital which was registered, moral and religious instruction should be given; and I think that those who have taken the trouble to read the Reports on the subject will be satisfied that a great improvement has taken place. With regard to the moral improvement of these women—not only as regards their manners, which, perhaps, do not always show a greater real improvement, but only some outward refinement—but those who read the Reports will, I think, find that a large number of women have been rescued from the paths of vice, sent home to their friends, or got into service, who otherwise would have been left to pursue their ill ways. It is idle for the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) to say that all this might have been done without these Acts.

MR. WHITBREAD explained that what he had pointed out was, that there was a Reforming Committee before these Acts were passed.

MR. HUNT: I think with the hon. Member that a good deal could be done by voluntary effort without these Acts; but I also believe that there are many of these women who never would be reached but for these Acts. The fact that these women are brought into hospital compulsorily brings them under a system which they never would have consented to be brought under voluntarily. The moral influence would not have been brought to bear on these women in the same number of instances as under the operation of these Acts. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax

(Mr. Stansfeld) says he knows those who oppose these Acts are looked upon very much in the light of fanatics. I have never looked upon them in that light. I fully appreciate the motives of those who are opposed to those Acts, and I think their convictions on the subject are fully entitled to respect. And I must say, as a matter of feeling, that one would be much more inclined to take the same view as the opposers of the Acts, than the view of those who maintain them. But to me it is not so much a matter of feeling as a matter of reason; and looking at it by the light of the evidence brought before me, I must say I consider the maintenance of the Acts advantageous to the interests of the Services, and that I think it is therefore the duty of the Government not to consent to their abolition. There is some difficulty with regard to the way in which this Motion is put by the Chair, to which I would call the attention of the House. There is an Amendment on the Paper that this matter be referred to a Select Committee. Now there has been an inquiry by a Commission, in the year 1871, and very full evidence on the subject was taken. That Commission also made some important recommendations. Therefore, I am not prepared to assent to the Amendment that the subject should be referred to a Select Committee; but I think it most desirable that we should come to a decision upon the Main Question—namely, whether this Bill should be read a second time. Therefore, I should propose that the Amendment be put and negatived, in order that the Main Question may be put and decided that the Bill be read a second time.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE said, if time had allowed, he might have made some reply on the debate, but he would not now interpose between hon. Members and their desire to come to a division. He maintained that his figures were fairly selected, and that they sustained his arguments. With regard to the moral question he had an opportunity, at an earlier stage of the discussion, of contradicting most authoritatively the moral effects which the agency of the police was said to bring to bear on the unfortunate creatures. If anything was more so it was the evidence reformatories that the proper people, and never could be the proper people, under any circumstances, to reclaim and send back to the paths of duty those unfortunate people. He would not detain the House. It was not his purpose to enter into discussion with hon. Gentlemen opposite. He believed the House was not divided as to the necessity for curing disease, but on the question how it was to be done. He trusted the Government might, at some future time—as there was no desire on his side to make this an annual Motion—look into this matter in a different way. While their wish was to cure the country from disease, they wished equally that women should be spared exceptional treatment, and that some means should be found less productive of moral evil than these Acts.

MR. T. E. SMITH then intimated that, after what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, and in order to meet the wish of the House to divide on the Main Question, he would, with the permission of the House, withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day two months." — (Sir Charles Legard.)

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 102; Noes 224: Majority 122.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for two months.

UNITED STATES—EXTRADITION.

QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE, who had a Notice on the Paper to call attention to the Correspondence lately presented by the Government respecting Extradition, asked the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, At what time the Papers which had been so long promised would be in the hands of their Lordships?

THE EARL OF DERBY: We have done all in our power to hasten the printing of the Papers to which the noble Earl refers. I understand that a certain number of copies will be ready in the course of to-morrow; but it will not be possible to circulate them generally for a day or two. There is some delay caused in the binding and putting together of so large a number of Papers; but a few copies will be ready to-morrow. I wish to add a few words on this subject—and it is with considerable reluctance I do so, because of the personal inconvenience which is certain to ensue. Within the last two hours I have received a confidential communication the nature of which I am not able to put before your Lordships, but I have explained it unreservedly to the noble Earl. The effect of that communication is to lead me to the conclusion that considerable inconvenience—I do not mean inconvenience to the Government, but to the public interests involved—would arise if we proceeded to a discussion to-night. In these circumstances, I have to ask the noble Earl whether he will object to postpone for a period of not more than two or three days his Motion on this subject?

EARL GRANVILLE: With regard to the statement of the noble Earl, I have to remind the House that I gave Notice a long time ago of my intention to call attention to the Papers with the view of bringing the subject under the notice of Parliament. I have postponed that Motion from time to time on account of certain Papers not having been produced—and I am aware that this postponement has inconvenienced some of your Lordships. On the other hand, I never can undertake the responsibility of bringing forward at a certain time a Motion on Foreign Affairs when the Foreign Secretary declares that in his opinion it is unadvisable for the public interest should be brought on. The noble Earl has referred to a communication made to me. Upon my own judgment, I should not act on that communication, because I do not think anything I should say or anything my noble Friends near me might say would be an impediment to any future negotiations with the United States; but if the noble Earl takes upon himself this—that he has information which he thinks makes it desirable that the Motion should not come on to-day, I should, with great alacrity, yield to his opinion. I think it will therefore be convenient if I put down the Notice for Monday.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD'S PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION (BIRMINGHAM, &c.) BILL—(No. 111.)

Amendments reported (according to Order).

LORD REDESDALE said, that the powers proposed to be conferred on the Local Government Board by these Orders were excessive. The period for the repayment of money for public improvements in this case should not exceed 50 years from the date of borrowing, and he would move a clause to that effect.

After the clause inserted in Committee moved to insert the following words:—

("Nothing contained in the Order hereby confirmed relating to the Borough of Birmingham shall entitle the urban authority to extend the time for the repayment of the money borrowed under the security of the Street Improvement Rate in the Act of 1851, or under the powers of the Parks Act, 1854, beyond the period of fifty years after the same have been respectively borrowed.")—(The Lord Redesdale.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not agree in the view taken by his noble Friend of these Provisional Orders. He must also point out that the Local Government Board had no power to alter Private Acts of Parliament except by the authority of Parliament. They possessed merely the power of making communications in the form of Provisional Orders to Parliament, as to what they considered right to be done; and their Lordships, unless there were imperious reasons for taking a contrary course, always acted upon the recommendations contained in the Reports of their own Committees. He thought therefore that, on finding that the Local Government Board had adopted this Provisional Order after full deliberation and inquiry, their Lordships would be slow to come to a different conclusion and upset the whole of the local arrangements which the Department had recommended. The powers which it was now proposed to confer on the Local Government Board were not greater than those contained in Private Bills. Last Session two Acts, passed with regard to water and gas in Birmingham, authorized the repayment of borrowed money to be extended over a period of either 75, 85, or 95 years—he did not recollect which; and the arguments which then satisfied the noble Chairman of Committees of the propriety of granting such a long period of repayment applied with redoubled force now, when Birmingham was saddled with the additional burden of the improvements under the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Acts to the extent, he believed, of half or three-quarters of a million. He believed the Local Government Board had exercised a wi discretion in adopting 75 years in this instance, and he trusted the House would not accept the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET objected to the Local Government Board practically legislating absolutely on these matters.

LORD REDESDALE said, he must press his Amendment.

LORD COTTESLOE said, he was glad that his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) had pressed this subject on the attention of the House. Large sums were being advanced for local objects throughout the country. The President of the Local Government Board brought forward his Budget the other day, which showed that the sums already advanced and likely still to be advanced in that way were very considerable; but the House of Commons was hardly aware of the extended period for which those loans were made. Happening himself to be a Member of the Public Works Loan Commission, he could state that, instead of those loans being made, as they formerly used to be, for 20 or 30 years, 50 years was now the ordinary period for their repayment. It appeared to him that those periods were much too long.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 34; Not-Contents 18: Majority 16.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—MILITIA ADJUTANTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NAGHTEN asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Adjutants of Militia who have done duty as acting Paymasters will receive the allowances promised them in May last?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I am afraid I cannot say exactly when these allowances will be issued to the officers in question, as the subject is now under the consideration of the Militia Committee. Some allowance for the duties performed will, however, undoubtedly be granted.

ARMY—FORAGE ALLOWANCE. QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether forage allowance is not granted to all substantive field officers except Majors of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers; and, why Artillery Majors should not be placed on the same footing as Infantry Majors in that respect?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I must answer the first Question in the affirmative: but forage allowance is not granted to officers holding the relative rank of Majors, unless their duties require to be mounted. Forage is not an emolument of the officer; it is issued to him only when the officer's duties require him to be mounted. Majors of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers frequently do not need to be mounted. When they do they receive forage or allowance in lieu, the same as Brevet field officers.

CHANNEL ISLANDS—ROYAL COURT OF JERSEY—ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

QUESTIONS.

MR. LOCKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether another Order in Council was presented to the Royal Court of Jersey on the 4th day of July 1876 for registration; and, whether the Bailiff of the Island refused to register the same, and his reasons for so doing? Also, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to accept the resignation or confirm the appointment of any Jurat of the Royal Court of Jersey so long as the Court refuse to register Orders in Council or Acts of Parliament?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had received a telegram from the Lieutenant Governor of Jersey respecting the Order in Council of which it was alleged that registration had been refused by the Bailiff. The Lieutenant Governor was of opinion that the Bailiff's act could not be construed into a refusal to register, and therefore the Lieutenant Governor did not see why the Government should interfere with the appointment of any Jurat. It was probable that the Order in Council would be registered at the next meeting of the States, which would be held next week.

JAMAICA—MR. P. A. SMITH, DISTRICT JUDGE.—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether a number of Custodes of Hanover and Saint James, in the island of Jamaica, and also of the Magistrates, have signed and presented a Memorial to the Governor, praying for the removal of Mr. P. A. Smith, District Judge of Montego Bay; and, what has been the course adopted by the Governor or by the Secretary of State for the Colonies in consequence?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, it was true that such a Memorial had

PEACE PRESERVATION ACTS—THE COUNTY OF LOUTH.

QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the eminently satisfactory condition of the borough of Dundalk and the county of Louth, both as regards offences against the person and property, as evidenced by the calendar of prisoners, the constabulary returns of crime, and the charge of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald to the grand jury of the county of Louth on the 11th instant, that—

“The detailed reports laid before him presented a very gratifying aspect as regarded the county of Louth, for they showed that during the five months that had elapsed since the last assizes only four cases of crime had been reported. I can only express a hope that the county will establish for itself and maintain permanently the character it now deserves of immunity from crime;”

and, whether he is prepared, in view of the foregoing circumstances, to revoke the Proclamation placing the borough of Dundalk and the county of Louth under the provisions of the Peace Preservation Acts?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to state that I believe that the Charge of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald to the Grand Jury of the county of Louth at the Summer Assizes notices the satisfactory condition of the county with regard to ordinary crime; but it must be remembered that the statements contained in the Question of the hon. Member do not exhaust the reasons for which proclamations under the Peace Preservation Act have been imposed, and which must not be forgotten in considering the propriety of maintaining them. However, last Spring the Irish Government caused inquiry to be made as to the necessity for continuing the Proclamation in county Louth, but the result did not, in the opinion of the Government, justify its withdrawal. I am quite ready to undertake that the matter shall again be considered, and I think it will be admitted that the Government have shown that they are not anxious to maintain these Proclamations where they can properly be revoked.

TOLL BRIDGES (RIVER THAMES).

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the right honourable the Lord Mayor, Whether, in view of the general desire which is felt by the people of the Metropolis and of the counties of Surrey and Middlesex, that the Toll Bridges (River Thames) Bill, already considered by a Select Committee, should pass this Session, he will withdraw the Notice of opposition which he has given to the Motion to go into Committee on the Bill, so that any objections to the Bill may be considered in Committee?

THE LORD MAYOR (MR. ALDERMAN COTTON), in reply, said, as the matter was the subject of an adjourned debate on the part of the Corporation, he was not prepared to withdraw his opposition to the Bill.

POOR LAW (METROPOLIS)—CASE OF CHARLOTTE HAMMOND.—QUESTION.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he can now state the result of the inquiry held by the Board in the case of Charlotte Hammond, whose death was said to have been caused by destitution; and, whether he will lay upon the Table the evidence taken at the inquiry?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that the result of the inquiry had been exhibited in a letter addressed by the Local Government Board to the Guardians of St. George's Union, and it was published in the newspapers to-day. The House would hardly wish him to read the paper; but the general result was to remove from the Guardians any imputation with respect to the case. The Report would be laid on the Table.

ARMY MOBILIZATION—ROMAN CATHOLIC MILITIAMEN.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is the fact that no provision was made for religious ministrations by clergymen of their own church to the officers and men of the Louth, Longford, and Monaghan Militia Regiments (almost exclusively Catholic Regiments) composing the First Brigade, Second Division, of the Fifth Army Corps, now mobilised near Salisbury; whether these regiments would not have been left without Divine Service on Sunday last but for the exertions of Lord Arundel, who lives close by, and whose brother, Rev. Mr. Arundel, officiated for that day; whether it is true that a private in the Louth Militia, who died of sunstroke on Saturday, expired without any clergyman to administer to him the last sacraments of the Catholic Church, to which he belonged; and, what steps, if any, have been taken to remedy this state of things?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: It was impossible to any large extent to spare the regular commissioned Roman Catholic chaplains from their ordinary stations to take part in the present mobilization. The War Office, therefore, applied to the Roman Catholic Bishops of the respective dioceses in which the two Army Corps were to be stationed to provide priests, giving at the same time all particulars as to the position of the camps, and stating what remuneration would be given. Mr. Arundel was, in consequence, nominated by Bishop Clifford, and duly appointed by the War Office to do duty with the 1st Brigade, 5th Army Corps. The War Office had no communication from or with Lord Arundel on the subject. No information has been received by the War Office with regard to any man having died from sunstroke. I am not aware that I can take any further steps in the matter than have been already taken.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—THE STEAMER "MARIE."

QUESTION.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the British steamer "Marie," which has been lying for two years past at Santander, and latterly at Bilbao, is about to sail for the river Niger with a cargo of gin; whether his attention has been called to the fact that the vessel is quite unseaworthy, on account of her having been built for river traffic, her engines being partly above deck, and her free-board being only eight inches; and, whether, having regard to the fact that the local authorities at Bilbao have power to detain unseaworthy ships, he has taken steps to prevent the sailing of the "Marie?"

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The circumstances relating to the British steamer Marie are these—About two years ago it was reported that she was lying at Bilbao, and her crew refused to sail in her, as unfit to go to sea. The Board of Trade instructed the Consul to summon a Naval Court, which, after survey, reported that she was unfit for a wintervoyage. New owners having lately bought her, and being about to send her to sea, the Board warned them of what had occurred, and sent information to the Committee of Lloyd's and the Salvage Association. A telegram has this day been received from the Consul at Bilbao stating that she was going to sail for the Niger, and that the crew were willing to go, and that he was of opinion that there were no reasons for detaining her from the proposed voyage. There are, however, no local authorities having power to detain a British ship at Bilbao.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—CERTIFICATED CHILDREN—CLAUSE 14.

QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether any estimate has been formed of the amount likely to be charged upon the Imperial revenue under the provisions of the fourteenth Clause of the Elementary Education Bill; and, if he will consider the propriety of limiting, according to the number of children in each school or otherwise, the amount of school fees payable for children who may obtain certificates under the provisions of such Clause?

VISCOUNT SANDON, in reply, said, this was a very difficult matter to calculate. He had, however, placed an Amendment on the Paper which he thought would meet the views of his hon. Friend and other Members on this subject. It was proposed that only 10 per cent of the children should get these certificates in each school, the preference being given to those attending for the longest time, and they must make 350 attendances in each year and pass an advanced Standard. Those provisions would extend to schools where the fees were not higher than 6d., and the fees to be paid for higher education not more than 6d.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Mr. Speaker, this being the 20th of July, and there being 31 Government Orders on the Paper, the House will not, I think, consider it unreasonable if I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is able to give the House any intimation of the probable course of Business during the next week, and, if possible, during the remainder of the Session. I trust it may be possible to get through the Committee on the Education Bill in the course either of to-night or to-morrow morning; but the right hon. Gentleman is in a better position than I can be to form an opinion on this subject; for I believe the Government clauses and the new clauses proposed by the Government have already been disposed of, and the remaining work of the Committee consists chiefly of new clauses proposed by hon. Members sitting on the right hon. Gentleman's own side of the House. The first Question, then, which I wish to put to the right hon. Gentleman is, What business he proposes that the House should proceed with after the Committee on the Education Bill is disposed of? I should have liked to have asked whether the Government are now in a position to state, with regard to their other measures standing on the Notice Paper, their intention of proceeding with or abandoning any of those measures; but I know from the experience of last Session that the right hon. Gentleman has a great objection to make what he considers a premature statement on this subject, and, therefore, unless he wishes to make any statement on that matter, I shall not press him to do so. However, it will not, I think, be wasting the time of the House if I point out very shortly the great number and great importance of the measures which have already up to the present time made but small progress in the House, and which must still occupy a great deal of time. Besides the Education Bill, there are on the Paper at present the following measures which, I think, the right hon. Gentleman will agree, occupy a front place among legislative measures. There are the Prisons Bill, the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill, and the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Bill, the two University Bills, the Valuation Bill, the Bill that has just been printed, and is coming to us from the House of Lords, the Cruelty to Animals Bill, and another—I do not know whether it has yet come down from the House of Lords, but if not it soon will, with very considerable Amendments—the Merchant Shipping Bill. In addition to these important measures, there is also some work to be done in Committee of Supply. I am perfectly willing to bear testimony to the advanced state of preparation in which the Estimates were presented early to the House and the progress which consequently the House was able to make at an early stage of Supply. But there are still some very important Estimates to be taken, and I believe it was understood when the last Vote on Account was taken that a pledge was given on the part of the Government that the discussion on the remaining Votes would not be postponed until the close of the Session. Besides those measures of importance I have mentioned, there are a great number of measures of considerable importance, but perhaps of somewhat minor importance to those I have enumerated—the Pollution of Rivers Bill, the Highways Bill, the Patent Law Amendment Bill, the Suez Canal Shares Bill, the Bishopric of Truro Bill, and the Poor Law Amendment Bill. There is also a considerable number of measures relating to Ireland. There are the Linen and Hempen and Other Manufactures Bill, the Irish Prisons Bill, the Juries Procedure Bill, the Civil Bill Courts Bill, and the Clerk of the Crown and Peace Bill. It would be very convenient to learn from the right hon. Gentleman what course he means to take with reference to these Bills. I now come to the Scotch Business, about which I know the Members from Scotland take a very great interest, and in reference to which they are extremely anxious, if possible, that an intimation of the intention of the Government should before long be made. A statement was made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate with regard to one of these Bills. I am not in a position to say whether that statement will facilitate further discussion; but, besides the Sheriff Courts Bill, to which he referred, there are the Poor Prisons Bill, the Eccle Bill, the Agri- cult the Roads and Bridges Bill. Now, Sir, I have said that I am not going to press the right hon. Gentleman to make any statement as to which of these Bills it is the intention of the Government to proceed with, and which they intend to withdraw; but I think we have a right to appeal to the Government on one point. There was a very important measure which was introduced at the commencement of the Session—the Maritime Contracts Bill—and which we were informed was intimately connected with and even as important as the Merchant Shipping Bill, and we understood that both Bills were to be proceeded with together. No progress was made with the Maritime Contracts Bill, and a short time ago the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill was discharged without any Notice being given to the House of the intention of the Government. I believe also the Order for the Indian Legislation Bill was discharged, and I am not aware whether any Notice was taken of the proceeding. I think, however, it due to House that when the Government have made up their minds that important measures are not to be proceeded with, some intimation should be conveyed to House of the intention of the Government, and that we should not be left to find from an inspection of the Votes that the Minister in charge of the measure has come down to the House, and moved the discharge of the Order for that measure. The Government measures to which I have referred are not the only matters which will require a portion of the time at the disposal of the Government. The Government have contracted several engagements towards private Members, as to the fulfilment of which I think the House will be anxious to have some information. It is understood that as soon as the Papers on the subject of the recent negotiations on Turkish affairs have been presented to Parliament—and I must say here that there appears to have been a very considerable delay in their production—as soon as these Papers have been presented, and the House has had time to consider them, an opportunity will be afforded to the House for a discussion on Turkish affairs. There is also an understanding that a day will be given to my learned Friend the Member for (Sir William Harcourt) to bring his Motion on the subject of the on Treaty negotiations. We have also been promised that an opportunity would be given to us to discuss, if we think proper, the mission of Mr. Cave to Egypt. And last, though not least, I have to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the Indian Budget, with regard to which promises are invariably made in the beginning of every Session, but which generally share the same fate. I believe the discussion on the Indian Budget this year will be even more important than it usually is. My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), has given Notice to call attention, on the Question that the Speaker do leave the Chair on the Indian Budget, to the effect which the depreciation in the value of silver has had on Indian finance, and I believe that that is a very proper opportunity to raise the discussion on this important question. I hope, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman will be able to assure the House that the discussion on the Indian Budget will not be postponed as usual to the very last day of the Session. Whatever may be the intentions of the Government with regard to the prosecution of their own measures, I think we have some right to express a hope that they will take measures to fulfil the engagements they have entered into with the House with as little delay as possible, and that they will be able, as soon as the Committee on the Education Bill has been concluded to make arrangements that will enable us to discuss in good time the important matter to which I have referred. I beg to apologize to the House for having taken up so much of its time; but I feel at this period of the Session the House will be anxious to obtain all the information of the probable course of Business which it is in the power of the Government to give.

MR. DISRAELI: The noble Lord is quite accurate in stating that I am generally disinclined to the precipitate giving up of Bills introduced to the notice of Parliament; because experience has taught me that, although the end of the Session may be impending, that very circumstance sometimes leads to a happy compromise which really facilitates progress, so that measures may be carried which at first blush may not appear in so promising a position. The noble Lord is also quite accurate in stating that any undertaking made by the Government for the discussion of public affairs will, I hope, be fulfilled, not only in the letter, but in the spirit; and I will endeavour to express to the House what is the course which I think we ought to pursue at the present moment. In answer to the first Question of the noble Lord as to what Business we will proceed with after the Committee on the Education Bill, I propose, without pledging myself to everything, to proceed first with the Prisons Bill, then with the two University Bills and the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill, and I should be sorry if I cannot by the time when these Bills are passed appoint a day for the Indian Budget. The Indian Budget, being always an interesting subject, this year promises to be one universally so, and will require the consideration of a not thin House. On Monday, the 24th of this month, we propose to go into Committee of Supply in fulfilment of the engagement made by the Government that the Education Vote, on which we had an advance on account, should be considered in the month of July. Therefore we fulfil that engagement. On Monday, the 31st of July, we propose to go again into Committee of Supply, when the Vote respecting the Mission of Mr. Cave and the affairs of the Suez Canal will be before the House. That is another of the subjects on which the noble Lord considers, and justly, that we have promised an opportunity for full discussion should be secured to the House. With regard to the discussion on Turkish affairs and also upon the Extradition Treaty, of course the noble Lord and the House will see that I cannot at once fix an exact day. First of all, the Papers, I regret to say, are not yet in the hands of hon. Members, although I hope they will be within 24 hours or little more; but I will communicate with the noble Lord on the subject, and endeavour, with his assistance and concurrence to fix days for the discussion of these subjects convenient to both sides of the House. The noble Lord complains that the Maritime Contracts Bill and the Indian Legislation Bill have been withdrawn without Notice from the Paper. Now, I think the noble Lord is under a mistake in that respect. My memory is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with respect to the Maritime Contracts Bill, and my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for India, with regard to the Indian Legislation Bill, made statements to the House; and that ample Notice was given to the House of the intentions of the Government. With regard to other measures before the House, there are certain Bills which I may at once state it is our intention to withdraw—namely, the Valuation Bill, the Highways Bill; two Scotch Bills—namely, the Poor Law Amendment Bill, the Agricultural Holdings Bill; and the Patent Law Amendment Bill. I will not proceed further in that vein at present. But I do not despair of making considerable progress in Public Business in the reasonable time we may estimate that yet attends us; but in doing that I must ask for the assistance of the House, and for that indulgence which has always been accorded to us—namely, the remaining Tuesdays and Wednesdays of the Session.

MR. LOWE asked what the intentions of the Government were with respect to the Bill for amending the law relating to cruelty to animals?

MR. DISRAELI: That is not one of the Bills that I have announced that the Government are prepared to relinquish.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland what Irish measures the Government intended to proceed with this Session?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Besides the Bill alluded to by the noble Lord opposite—namely, the Irish Judicature Bill—there are one or two measures, relating specially to Ireland, of very considerable importance. With regard to those on the Paper to-night, I am in hopes that we shall be able to get through Committee on the Cattle Diseases Bill. It is proposed to discharge the Order respecting the Linen and Hempen and Other Manufactures Bill. The Juries Procedure Bill awaits further consideration in Committee, but I have reason to think that it will be practically unopposed. The Prisons Bill is an important measure, but its progress will depend in a great degree on the fate of the English Prisons Bill.

MR. R. SMYTH: I have listened with some alarm to the concluding observations of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. It so happens that I have a Bill down as a First Order, indeed the only Order, of the Day for Wednesday, the 2nd of August—namely, the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill. That Bill, after meeting with many difficulties, has been : and time by a considerable : whilst I think it quite reasonable that the Government should appropriate to themselves those remaining days which private Members have selected for abstract Resolutions, I cannot admit that it is reasonable on the part of the Government to take a day which has been obtained for a Bill, that has already passed a second reading. I feel that I am helpless against the general feeling of the House. ["No, no!"] I do not feel myself altogether helpless on this subject as against the Government. If, however, it is the feeling of the House that the day should be given up to the Government I can only acquiesce with a good grace.

MR. NEWDEGATE had heard with sincere regret that the Government had determined to proceed with the Prisons Bill, because, in his opinion, it was a measure totally opposed to the policy hitherto pursued by the Conservative Party.

MR. CALLAN rose to Order. There was no Motion before the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, he understood the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was about to ask a Question. Any discussion as to the merits of the Prisons Bill would be quite out of Order.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was about to ask the First Lord of Treasury whether he intended to proceed with the Prisons Bill that evening, since it seemed improbable that the discussion on the Education Bill in Committee would terminate at any reasonable hour. He trusted that the Government would not attempt to force the Prisons Bill through the House with any indecent haste.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY thought it right to inform the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), who was not present, had a Motion down for the 2nd of August relating to political prisoners. From what he knew of the hon. Member's sentiments, it would not be easy to persuade him to forego the opportunity of bringing on his Motion.

MR. DISRAELI: I do not anticipate at present what will take place on the 2nd of August. It will depend upon the feelings of hon. Members generally at the time. With regard to the question of hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), as the Prisons Bill stands second paper, I do not anticipate that it ought before the consideration of the House to-night. Of course, it will not be proceeded with at an unreasonable hour.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I should like to make one suggestion with regard to the Bill of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Smyth). I understand that it is a Bill about which the House may be said to be agreed. ["No, no!"] At any rate the minority is a very small one. When the Government assented to the second reading of the Bill the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland proposed to submit some Amendments in Committee. I do not know in the least what those Amendments are; but whether the Bill is proceeded with further this Session or not, it seems to me that it would be a great advantage, considering that the question is one in which Ireland is very much interested, if those Amendments could be laid on the Table of the House; because, if the Bill cannot be proceeded with further this Session, it is desirable that those Amendments should be the subject of discussion before the House meets again next Session, when the Bill will be re-introduced.

MR. CALLAN wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether, considering the absence of Irish Members on the 2nd of August it would be desirable for the Government to place Amendments on the Paper to afford pabulum for discussion by agitators during the Recess, and not for the consideration of the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that on the second reading of the Bill of the hon. Member of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Smyth) he expressed the opinion that it could not pass into law in its present shape, and that if it were proceeded with this Session, which he did not anticipate either then or now, it would become his duty to propose Amendments. If the right hon. Member for Birmingham gave Notice of a Question he should be happy to answer it.

MR. SULLIVAN complained of the conduct of the Government in the matter of this Bill. Irish Members had expected to have been met in a fair and conciliatory spirit, and now the Government would not tell them what Amendments they proposed to make. For his own part, he could only say that there was only a very small minority of Irish Members opposed to the Bill. ["Order."]

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that he could not discuss the measure; if he wanted to put a Question he might do so.

MR. SULLIVAN merely wished to impress upon the Government the necessity of dealing with the Irish Members in a fair spirit so far as this Bill was concerned.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD had heard with great regret that the Government intended to withdraw the Valuation Bill. He felt that announcement the more keenly, because at the commencement of the Session he introduced a Bill on the same subject, which he withdrew in deference to the Bill of the Government. ["Order."]

MR. SPEAKER inquired whether the right hon. Gentleman was about to put any Question?

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked if the Government would give him an opportunity on going into Committee of Supply of bringing forward a Motion in favour of the establishment, on a true uniform basis, of local and Imperial taxation?

DR. WARD pointed out that the Irish University Bill was down for the 2nd of August, and the matter was an important one which had not been discussed for some years.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON begged to give Notice, after what had taken place, that if the Government proposed to take Wednesdays for the rest of the Session he would do all in his power to oppose that Motion, and take a division upon it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman to state on what day he proposes to make the Motion to which he has referred, relating to Tuesdays and Wednesdays. I rather inferred that it was his intention to ask the House at once to give up Tuesdays and Wednesdays to the Government. So I presume that the right hon. Gentleman will make the Motion either on to-morrow or Monday. I ask the question, because when the House makes this sacrifice, it, to a certain extent, makes itself responsible for the management and conduct of business by the Government; and I think that it is a Motion which the House, if asked to agree to it, ought to agree to on full consideration, and upon being satisfied by the Government that the course they propose to adopt is a judicious one.

MR. DISRAELI: I have not any intention to fix any day for the Motion, because I am not myself in favour of the Government availing themselves of the privileges of independent Members, unless there is a very general concurrence. If there is not that general concurrence, I think the Motion will only lead to debates which will retard the progress of Business. I threw out the suggestion rather with the idea that it would give hon. Members opposite an opportunity of paying a happy compliment to the Government.

CAPTAIN NOLAN, referring to the Motion of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) said, Irish Members would be satisfied with the Tuesday evening if the Government took the morning.

MR. A. BROWN said, he had a Motion on the Paper for Tuesday next, and he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would say whether the Government intended to take that evening or not?

MR. T. E. SMITH hoped that in the general arrangements ample opportunity would be found for considering the great changes made "elsewhere" in the Merchant Shipping Bill, after the pains taken by this House in the elaboration of its clauses.

MR. ANDERSON, understanding that the Lord Advocate proposed to retain only the worst parts of the Sheriffs' Court (Scotland) Bill, advised the right hon. and learned Gentleman to withdraw the Bill altogether.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

[BILL 155.]

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 18th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

VISCOUNT SANDON moved the following new clause (Amendment of 33 and 34 Vic. c. 75, s. 97, as to conditions of annual Parliamentary Grant)—

"So much of section ninety-seven of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, as enacts that the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain the annual Parliamentary Grant shall provide that the Grant shall not for any year exceed the income of the school for that year which was derived from voluntary contributions and from school fees, and from any sources other than the Parliamentary Grant, shall be repealed as from the thirty-first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven. After the thirty-first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain the annual Parliamentary Grant shall provide that, (1.) Such Grant shall not in any year be reduced by reason of its excess above the income of the school if the Grant do not exceed the amount of seventeen shillings and sixpence per child in average attendance at the school during that year, but shall not exceed that amount per child, except by the same sum by which the income of the school, derived from voluntary contributions, rates, school fees, endowments, and any source whatever other than the Parliamentary Grant exceeds the said amount per child; and (2.) Where the population of the school district in which the school is situate, or the population within two miles, measured according to the nearest road, from the school is less than three hundred, and there is no other public elementary school recognized by the Education Department as available for the children of that district, or that population (as the case may be), a special Parliamentary Grant may be made annually to that school to the amount, if the said population exceeds two hundred, of ten pounds, and, if it does not exceed two hundred, of fifteen pounds; and (3.) The said special Grant shall be in addition to the ordinary annual Parliamentary Grant, and shall not be included in the calculation of that Grant for the purpose of determining whether it does or not exceed the amount before in this section mentioned."

New Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that while the immediate boon to the schools of this new clause would be very slight, the effect would be dangerous both in its economical and educational aspect. Nothing could exceed the liberality of the House of Commons with regard to educational grants. In 1870, £500,000 was the amount moved for the annual grant; that was now increased by the noble Lord to £1,500,000. While the House would not grudge the money to be granted for such a purpose, he thought they should not give up any check they had upon that expenditure without good reason. That check was at present found in the locality being called upon to give as much as was supplied by the State, and the result was that local management was combined with central control. If, however, the contribution were unequally divided, and if the locality gave much less than the the danger was lest the local management should become so careless that Parliament might be compelled to interfere. The end might be that the State would be eventually inclined to do without local management, and our schools would then pass under a central or bureaucratic control. The present system furnished a strong stimulus to subscribe, and the more money was raised the higher was the capacity of the teachers obtained, and consequently a better education even in elementary subjects was given to the children in their schools. He was willing to admit that there was, to a small extent, a balance of disadvantage, in so far as it was an unpleasant thing to earn money, and then to have a deduction made from it. The Church schools were by far the largest in number, and he found that their total income ending August, 1875, was £1,867,000, which was made up as follows: — Parliamentary grant, £679,000; school-pence, £570,000; endowments and sundry other sources, £101,000; subscriptions, £517,000. Supposing that the stimulus to keep up the subscriptions disappeared, what must they expect to happen? There was nothing unreasonable in supposing that the fees would reach 4d., which upon the average attendance of last year of 1,185,000 children, would give £790,000, being an increase of £220,000. The noble Lord took the possible grant at 17s. 6d. a child. If it reached that average the grants would increase by £358,000, and the result would be that no subscriptions at all would be necessary, and there would be £60,000 profit without them. He did not believe that the grant would reach 17s. 6d., though it would probably reach considerably beyond what it was at present. The chief effect of the clause would be upon the larger schools. He would take a school of 300 children. It was by no means unreasonable to expect that each child would get an average grant of 15s., thus realizing £225. Then, supposing that school not to get a larger fee than 3d., its total income would be £375. He had no hesitation in saying that a good school of 300 children could be liberally managed for £375, and consequently no subscriptions would be necessary for that school. Hon. Members might say, why should there be subscriptions? Simply because if they kept up subscriptions additional money would be raised, and the school would be a better school than it would be without them. What the Committee had to consider was, whether they ought to entrust the management of these schools to persons who really gave nothing but their time. Moreover, if one of these schools took advantage of all the extra subjects and tried to give a thoroughly first-rate education it would do so with a tremendous fine upon it. He thought that if no subscriptions were demanded there would be less educational interest and zeal displayed by managers, and that a great number of schools would become very little better than private adventure schools. This plan of the noble Lord if it fully succeeded and became extended throughout the country would, he believed, very much increase the religious difficulty. If it turned out that very large sums were given every year to denominational schools without any considerable amount of denominational subscriptions, persons who did not belong to the denomination would very much doubt whether that was the mode in which public elementary schools ought to be maintained. The sum represented by the deductions was small, amounting to less than £30,000 a-year, but to abolish them would be to establish a principle which, in the end, would, he believed, do much harm even to denominational schools. The noble Lord's proposition really meant that any diminution of voluntary zeal should be supplied by a State grant. Now, the Government in 1870 never supposed it to be the duty of Parliament to supplement by a State grant any want of voluntary zeal. It was in the nature of things that the existence of rate-supported schools should be a great blow to voluntary schools, because a man might fairly say—"By my subscription to voluntary schools I am really saving the pockets of my fellow-ratepayers who are as rich as I am, and who ought to pay their share." But if the result were less voluntary zeal, it was no part of the business of the State to supply the deficiency. He regretted, therefore, that a clause should be proposed which was not only not just, but which would, as he believed, be useless. The Bill with the Amendments courteously accepted by the noble Lord was a considerable progress in education, as well as a considerable boon to the voluntary schools; because the system of indirect and of direct compulsion now introduced by Clause 7 would be very nearly as strong a measure of compulsion as was contained in the bye-laws of any Board, and thus the Bill would do much to send children into the voluntary schools and to increase the school fees and grant. He wished the noble Lord had contented himself with giving this boon, a boon fairly earned, to the voluntary schools, and had not proposed a clause which could only be adopted at the expense of a very important principle.

MR. HEYGATE, on the contrary, thanked the noble Lord for proposing a clause which would remove obnoxious and unreasonable deductions which had an irritating and depressing effect upon the mind of school managers far beyond their pecuniary value. The right hon. Gentleman argued that, if the clause passed, subscriptions might fall off and voluntary zeal would languish. But those persons who were best acquainted with the working of the Education Grant informed him that the result of abolishing these deductions, which only amounted to some £26,000, would be exactly the contrary of that suggested, and that subscriptions were more likely to be elicited than checked thereby. It was suggested that if the deductions were abolished, voluntary schools might live without any subscriptions, and would thus cease to be voluntary. But how could that be? In 1874 over £600,000 was contributed by voluntary subscribers, and how then could the additional £26,000 enable them to dispense with the £600,000. Then, again, as much as £14,000,000 had been spent, indeed, upon Church schools, but the hon. Member who had stated that fact omitted to mention that that sum represented only the cost of building them. That large sum represented an amount of voluntary effort, which had done an immense deal of good, and saved large sums of money to the ratepayers, and that should be favourably remembered now. The Report of the School Management Committee of the London School Board, presented on the 31st of May this year, estimated the average cost of each child at £2 15s. 2d. But in the voluntary schools the average cost was £1 17s. 1d. This 18s. difference was due to voluntary services in the voluntary schools, and was as good as so much money in annual subscriptions, so that, even without taking subscriptions into account, they were still entitled to be considered as voluntary institutions.

Payments by results with drawbacks was simply taking back by the State with one hand what it gave with the other, and that was a sort of thimble-rigging which people did not understand. Another objection to the system of deduction was that it fell heaviest on those districts which were least able to bear it. Schools in rich districts like Belgravia never lost a portion of the grant by these deductions, it was in poor places like Rotherhithe that the loss was felt. He entirely disapproved of the arguments used against the Bill, and gave the clause his most hearty support.

MR. W. HOLMS said, the clause proposed to give grants from the Imperial Exchequer entirely irrespective of the amount of the contributions of individuals or of the fees paid. Two months ago, when introducing the Bill, the noble Lord said it was not the intention of the Government to reverse the policy of 1870, but the fact was that the clause in one respect—namely, with regard to the payment for elementary education—would very materially subvert the policy of that Act. The policy of the Act of 1870 was to spare the public money when it could be done without, to procure as much as possible from the parent, and to stimulate the generosity of those benevolent men who desired to assist their neighbours. Every one who read the Reports of the Council on Education would agree that that policy had been most successfully carried out. In 1871 the amount of voluntary contributions to the schools was £418,000, in 1874 it rose to £602,000, and in the first-named year the Government grants were £575,000, and in 1874 £1,050,000. The school fees also rose, showing that the parents were willing to respond to the action of Parliament. If the present clause were adopted, instead of stimulating private contributions the effect would be to diminish them, and in the course of a few years they would entirely cease. He then pointed out that if the latter part of the proposed clause, which gave a special grant of £15 per annum to a district where there were less than 200 inhabitants, in addition to the annual Parliamentary grant which might amount to 17s. 6d., a total amount of 30s. might actually be paid for each child attending school in such a district.

MR. RITCHIE denied that there was any truth in the view taken by the hon.

Member opposite (Mr. W. Holms), that this clause amounted to a reversal of the policy of 1870. On the contrary, he maintained that this clause was drawn precisely on the lines of that measure. He denied, too, the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that it would increase the expenses of management, and lead to useless expenditure. On the contrary, some of the existing deductions were a distinct premium on extravagance. The grant earned was reduced if the sum spent on maintenance was not double the amount of the grant earned, and this led in many cases to money being expended really unnecessarily in order to obtain the amount of the grant without deduction. This I call a premium on extravagance. There was nothing in the principle of payment by results that was objectionable; and he maintained it as an indisputable fact that the squeezing out of voluntary schools, which was going on in many parts of the country, would lead to a considerably increased expenditure, and that the ratepayers had, from a merely pecuniary point of view, a large interest in their maintenance. At present about 8s. per year per child was paid by the friends of voluntary schools, and that amount would be withdrawn from educational means, and the ratepayers be charged with a great additional burden if these voluntary schools should be closed. As an addition to the sum subscribed voluntarily which would fall on the rates if denominational schools were transferred to boards, the cost of education in board schools, while not more efficient than in the denominational schools, was much more costly. This extra cost would also have to be borne by the ratepayers. Any clause like the present, which tended to encourage local voluntary effort, ought surely to receive the support of Parliament. With regard to what was called the religious difficulty, he could only say that he regarded the maintenance of voluntary schools as the only guarantee that the children of the country would be brought up in any knowledge of religion at all. As long as the Conscience Clause was carried out there could be no cause of complaint from any religious denomination, nor any violation of conscience; but there would be a violation of conscience if they said to a parent who was anxious that his children should receive a reli-religious education—"You must send your children to a school in which, whatever they are taught, they will receive no religious instruction." He believed that the great majority of the people of the country were in favour of the maintenance of the voluntary schools, because it enabled them to obtain for their children a religious education which was suited to their every day lives.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, if the clause passed, school managers and masters would soon be enabled to adapt themselves to it, and when they did there would come all the dangers the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) had pointed out. It would give the school managers a temptation to raise the fees, and the effect would be that the interests of the poorer children would be sacrificed. The clause allowed new sources of revenue to enter into account for the first time. Endowments did not count formerly as local subscriptions, but they were to do so now. Under the present Code they had been used for raising the character of the school, and for giving higher education; but under the new clause endowments would be merged in the private subscriptions, and would not have the same effect that they would formerly. They would find that as school managers and masters would adapt their schools to the conditions of the clause, voluntary subscriptions would fall off, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consequently have to render greater help to schools. Virtually the proposal of Her Majesty's Government amounted to a reversal of the policy adopted in 1870, which, as explained by his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, who was then First Minister, was not intended to interfere, and in operation had not interfered, with free private contributions; and he trusted hon. Members would consider the matter very deeply before they accepted a provision which would lead to the waging of a new war with denominationalism. The House always attached great importance to experience, and he would therefore give them an experience. They were going to bring their schools into the condition of the schools of Ireland. In regard to those schools, the State paid almost all the money, the subscriptions being of a very trifling amount. The result of the State paying for the education was that school committees existed only in name, and sometimes not at all, and that, as their substitute, there was merely a denominational manager appointed as correspondent to the Commissioners of Education in Ireland. The effect of this was that the schools did not attract interest in their localities, and did not obtain subscriptions. Was this the position they were to come to in England? He denied that it was to the interest of those who now called their schools "national" to make those schools no longer national but denominational adventure schools. The raising of the war of denominationalism would, he contended, be an injury to the cause of education and a great injury to the voluntary schools. The clause would handicap the schools that gave high class education, so that it would be impossible for them to give that education. It would be far easier to the managers to raise the fees than to keep the subjects of education high. The experience of schools of this character in Scotland was that the teaching of higher subjects raised the whole level of the school. It would be very unfortunate, therefore, if a clause like that before the Committee were allowed to become law, as it would have an undoubted tendency to extinguish the higher subjects in schools. For these reasons, he trusted the clause would not be pressed.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, one of the recommendations of the new clause was its simplicity, whereas the former clause was very complicated. The new clause had now been two days before the House, and he did not think the Committee were unprepared to deal with it. The right hon. Member (Mr. Lyon Playfair) seemed to have overlooked the fact that in Ireland the Government had imposed education upon the country instead of fostering a system which had grown up there, so that the position of the two countries was entirely different. He also seemed to have forgotten that at present many schools were supported by the fees of the children and the Government grant. What peculiar right had managers of those schools to manage them? The parent and the State were alone the contributors. What would be the effect of making any new restriction as to subscriptions? He had made a calculation with respect to certain British, Wesleyan, and Roman Catholic schools, now supported entirely by fees and the Government grant, showing the sum which would have to be raised by each if the Resolution of his noble Friend (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) as to subscriptions was adopted. His calculation was as follows:—Risca British School, £21 6s. 4d.; Liverpool Roman Catholic Practising School, £54 2s. 1d.; Pits-o'-the-Moor Wesleyan, £52 12s. 1d.; Rochdale, Clever Street British, £40 14s. 7d.; Rochdale Wesleyan, £59 13s.; Wandsworth Road, Belmont Baptist, £52 17s. 3d.; Grimsby Wesleyan, £67 6s. 4d.; Exeter Protestant Dissenting Charity British, £13 11s. 5d. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) talked about an average fee of 4d., but at present the fee was 2d. in the country and 3d. in the large towns, and even those amounts were considered high. Surely the right hon. Gentleman was too sanguine in his estimate. Objection was made to the 17s. 6d. limit, but after consultation with the Treasury he found it necessary to impose that restriction. When a school assumed a different character it would be necessary that it should get higher fees or subscriptions. At present there was an unequal pressure between the board and the voluntary schools. They must not overlook the fact that this limit had no action whatever on the board schools; but on the voluntary schools it had an immediate effect. The object of the Government was to hold the balance fairly between the two kinds of schools. He could not understand the objection that the Inspectors would no longer work these schools up to the same standard. There was such a thing as a Code passed every year, and if they found there was any decay in the intellectual character or acquirements of the schools a tremendous screw would be put on to see that proper results were obtained. It was a mere dream to suppose that the great mass of the schools would be supported by fees and by the Government grant; for the fact was that a great deal of voluntary effort would be needed. He could not understand why the proposal now made should increase the religious difficulty. Their only desire was to do what was fair and right to all existing schools, and to redress the grievances which were now felt very seriously by many voluntary schools. So far as he was able to judge of the temper of the country in all directions, they were not prepared for the sake of a very small increase of the Imperial grant to see the voluntary schools extinguished because the balance was not held fairly between them and the board schools. He believed this clause would give a large amount of freedom to teachers and encouragement to schools, breathing into many of them fresh life; and he hoped the Committee would adopt it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said that, looking at average attendances, the fees in many cases were close upon 3d. a-week.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, it seemed to be taken for granted that only secular instruction was given in board schools. The religious instruction given in the London board schools was quite as good as that given in any voluntary schools, and there was only one place, Birmingham, where religious instruction was not given in board schools; but the special reason for that was that the Nonconformists generally had formed themselves into a society for the very purpose of giving religious instruction, and if there were any children left without religious instruction it was because the clergy of the Church of England, with one or two honourable exceptions, had refused to enter board schools. It was admitted by the Vice President that there were many places in which the fees were excessively low, and that parents ought to be encouraged to pay high fees; but in proportion as the grant was increased, a temptation was created to keep down fees. There were other objections. As a labourer in calculating the wages he ought to have, would include the school pence he had to pay, if the fees were kept down artificially by an increase of grant, that would be a direct payment in aid of wages. As, further, what was now contributed out of rates might in future be contributed out of the Government grant, there would clearly be a subsidy in aid of the rates, which explained the popularity of his proposal with hon. Members opposite. The broad objection to the clause was, however, that stated by his right hon. Friend—that it would enable a school, in many cases, to be conducted with little or no local effort at all. The religious question was raised by this clause, because in the case of a denominational school carried on by grants and fees, part of the latter being perhaps paid by Guardians, the increase of the grant would be a direct subsidy of the religious education, which would not be, in any sense, paid for by voluntary subscriptions, as all the instruction, religious and secular, would be paid for out of public money. The proposition which he had placed on the Paper, which he thought it convenient to explain at this stage, was that no public elementary school should receive any payment from the annual Parliamentary grant unless the money arising from the subscriptions or rates amounted to at least one-sixth part of the total annual income of the school; it would apply to both voluntary and board schools alike. He desired that there should be no inducement to the Government to shovel out the public money in a reckless spirit to the schools in the country districts. Let them, at least, on his side of the House, not be accused of re-opening this difficult question. The responsibility lay with hon. Members opposite, and the day might come when parties were not as parties were now, when they would repent having done so.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 185; Noes 100: Majority 85.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he protested against the sub-section of the clause, as it had been always understood that every school that fulfilled the conditions of the Code should receive the public grant; but this clause would introduce a new principle into the system under which the public elementary schools had hitherto been dealt with.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE moved at the end of the clause to add the following sub-section:—

“If in any public elementary school the income arising from subscriptions or rates do not amount to at least one-sixth part of the total income of such school, there shall be deducted from the annual Parliamentary grant payable to such school a sum equal in amount to the difference between the said one-sixth part of the total income of such school, and the said income arising from subscriptions or rates.”

MR. WHALLEY said, the Act of 1870 was welcomed as an attempt to rescue the minds of children throughout the country from clerical influence. The Bill, however, introduced a new system.

MR. A. MILLS called the hon. Member to Order for entering into the general question when the Committee had before it a particular Amendment.

Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for Peterborough appeared to be travelling rather wide of the subject under discussion.

MR. WHALLEY said, that denominational education was not only ignorance, but injurious ignorance, and the Bill sought to promote denominational education. Its details had been kept back till the end of the Session. The Prime Minister told him last Session that circumstances might arise when certain laws existing in this country against Jesuits—

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member was clearly travelling from the subject before the Committee.

MR. WHALLEY was sorry he had not been allowed to finish his sentence. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman would find, within his own Cabinet, everything that he (Mr. Whalley) understood by what was called Jesuitism. [“Order.”]

THE CHAIRMAN hoped the hon. Member would withdraw this expression.

MR. WHALLEY would of course withdraw it at the instance of the right hon. Gentleman, but protested against the Bill as one which, in its promotion of denominational education, was most retrogressive and a gross insult to the common sense and experience of the country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER supported the Amendment moved by the noble Lord the Member for Calne. He was loth to put a restriction upon any special schools; but he considered that as the Bill now stood it would become necessary.

Question put, “That those words be there added.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 83; Noes 130: Majority 47.

On Question, “That the Clause stand part of the Bill,”

MR. RYLANDS said, he rose to oppose the addition of the clause to the Bill. It opened up a question of so much importance that after the attempt to amend the clause in some slight degree had been defeated, he did not think they ought to add to be added to the Bill.

It involved a reversal of the Act of 1870. The point at issue was to draw the attention of the Committee was one in which, personally, he felt a very deep interest. The clause proposed by the noble Lord was a breach of the compromise entered into in 1870. He had the honour of a seat in the House at that time, and of taking part in the discussions and divisions which took place upon the Education Bill of 1870, and he might remind hon. Members that when they came to consider the details of that Bill they were met by two very great differences of opinion. On the one hand, there was a very large number of Members who were anxious that there should be a national system of education promoted on a basis upon which all persons could concur, and that there should be no interference with religious rights. On the other hand, there was a large number of Members who were in favour of the existing denominational schools, and who urged that it would be unreasonable to pass any measure the effect of which would be to deal harshly or unjustly with denominational schools. If in 1870 they had been in a position to deal with the education of the country as though they were dealing with a sheet of white paper, they would, no doubt, have been able to frame a system which would have been uniform in its character, and comprehensive in all its arrangements. But they had no such sheet of white paper, and they could not shut their eyes to the existence of the denominational schools which had sprung up all over the country under the grants from the Committee of Council. Most of them belonged to the Church of England. He would not attempt to deny that the Church of England was to be very much praised indeed for the large sums of money which that Church and its members had subscribed in support of its own denomination; but it ought to be remembered that although the Church had subscribed a large sum of money it had also received the lion's share of the grants of the Committee of Council, and that during every year in which the Minutes of Council had existed a large proportion of the money granted by Parliament for the purposes of education had been handed over to Church of England schools. Hon. Members ~~would~~ would say—and it was perfectly —that if the Church had had these contributions from the State, the ~~as~~ might have been in a similar if they had voluntarily contributed as much. But there was a wide contrast between the circumstances of the rich and powerful Church supported by the State, and the struggling efforts of poor and detached Dissenting bodies, who had to maintain their Churches entirely out of their own resources. It would be seen at once that, although the Dissenters were as anxious to promote national education as anybody, they had not had the means of raising the funds to the same extent as the Church of England. Having been frequently in communication with the Dissenters, he knew they looked with great jealousy upon the large proportion of the funds granted for educational purposes which was enjoyed by the Church of England; and when they came to pass the Act of 1870, they had to ask from the Dissenters a still further concession. As a Legislature they could not treat denominational schools as if they were non-existing. Parliament felt that it was bound to recognize their existence and to treat them with consideration and justice. The Dissenters, although there were great differences of opinion among them, still, in the main, had much sympathy with the difficulties of Parliament, and the result of the discussions in 1870 was, that they yielded to a compromise that denominational schools should be continued. It was to all intents and purposes a compromise; and it was a compromise which was the result of considerable discussion and many divisions. It was also a compromise that was accepted in a great degree by a large number of the moderate minded men in the country, although it was looked upon with some dislike by the more extreme Dissenters. It was, however, accepted generally; and he thought it was a very grave matter for the noble Lord, by this clause, to seek to disturb it, and to propose an arrangement which, he was quite sure, would give much dissatisfaction to those who, out-of-doors, had yielded to it. Perhaps it was as well that he should tell the House why it was that a number of hon. Members with whom he acted in 1870 agreed to accept the compromise proposed by the late Government. They believed that, while the arrangement was just and fair in relation to denominational schools, it did open up a prospect that the board schools would be gradually established throughout the country, and that to a great extent the board schools would absorb the denominational schools. To a considerable extent there had been an absorption of denominational schools, and what had been done in that direction had been of positive advantage to the country. He did not sympathize with the idea expressed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, that they could not have religious instruction unless they had denominational schools. He believed that in many of the board schools religious instruction was provided, and he would be sorry indeed if it was excluded. In most of the board schools under the Conscience Clause there were the reading of the Bible, and instruction in the main truths of religion, and he thought it was possible to devise a great public school system of that kind. If they could have public schools in which the children of all denominations could commence their life by learning together the great lessons that would fit them for future struggles, such a spectacle was not only in idea an admirable one, but in its effects upon the national character would be found to be of immense advantage. If in our large schools they were to banish all sectarian feelings of rivalry or animosity, he thought they would do much to promote the spread of the best form of education. That was his opinion, and if the effect of the Act of 1870 had been gradually to absorb the denominational schools, and to cover the country over with school boards, he thought it would be of great public advantage. He therefore supported a measure which, while it did justice to the schools connected with the various denominations, did not put a barrier in the way of the adoption of a system which he considered would be better for the interests of the country. If, then, they had been willing that the terms of the Act should be such as to give certain advantages to denominational schools, those who were anxious to see the denominational schools supported ought to be content with the advantages which they obtained under the Act of 1870, and should not attempt now to disturb the compromise which was then entered into. He had refrained from voting in favour of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard) lest it should be taken to mean that denominational schools should be compulsorily withdrawn from the management of the church and denominational committees and handed over to committees of a public character. He believed that such a course would be an act of injustice to the managers of denominational schools. This clause, however, went as much in the other direction, and it seemed to him the effect of the clause would be to place denominational schools upon an equal footing with board schools, to give them additional strength and to increase their numbers. He contended that that was an arrangement entirely contrary to the compromise of 1870, and he therefore felt bound to resist it. The noble Lord said that denominational schools were handicapped in their struggles with board schools. It seemed to him (Mr. Rylands) that they ought to be so handicapped. The only excuse under which they could reasonably come to Parliament to ask for large grants of public money for denominational schools was that they were voluntarily supported. If they were relieved from voluntary support, then there was no argument at all why it should not be claimed that they should be put under public management. Just as he thought the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr was unfair in one direction, so he contended the proposal of the noble Lord was unfair towards the Dissenters. He was fully alive to the difficulties which many very excellent clergymen had experienced in raising subscriptions for their schools. In many of the country districts, good clergymen interested in education experienced the utmost difficulty in raising the necessary funds. They went to the neighbouring landlords and farmers, and had the greatest possible difficulty in screwing out of them a sum sufficient to support the schools. These gentlemen were, no doubt, in circumstances of great difficulty, and he dared say that they were constantly pressing on the Education Department the necessity of giving them relief. But he was of opinion that the only proper relief to give them was to place them under a school board, in order that the adjoining property might be rated and the owners compelled to support the schools instead of creating a charge upon national funds towards which all classes—Dissenters as well as Churchmen—were required to contribute. The proposal contained in the present clause was a gross injustice, and involved a most unfair arrangement, and the sooner these schools, which were receiving so much support, were put under public management the better. He had offered no undue opposition to the present Bill. Upon certain great principles he went with the noble Lord. He was not one of those who wished to banish religion from the schools, and he did not wish to carry out any extreme views in regard to national education; but as far as the arrangements were made in 1870, and as far as they had been fairly accepted by Dissenters, he would be no party to placing them in a worse position than they occupied under the Act of 1870. For these reasons, he was prepared to oppose the proposition that the clause should be added to the Bill.

MR. BIRLEY said, it appeared to him that many points had been ignored or overlooked in this discussion. As to the compromise alleged to have been effected, the principle was actually invaded in 1872. It was found that, however excellent the intentions of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), the provisions of the Act were not hereafter workable. There might be a deficiency of subscriptions for some good schools; but if this Bill were passed into law, he believed that voluntary subscriptions would increase. In thinly-populated districts the voluntary subscriptions would be found especially necessary, and in every three or four years some unexpected emergencies must arise, such as an epidemic, or the illness of the master or mistress of the school. He trusted his hon. Friend opposite would cease to set Nonconformists and Churchmen in such constant opposition. He had hoped that the right hon. Member for Bradford and the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair), even if they could not accept the Amendment of the Vice President of the Council, would have suggested some mode of remedying the inequalities of the present system.

MR. J. K. CROSS pointed out that under that clause and other provisions of the Bill, so-called voluntary schools would receive support from the rates and also 17s. 6d. per annum for each child from the Government.

MR. WHALLEY observed, that this question was agitating Europe at the present moment, and it was owing to the dexterous management of the noble Lord that the public were not so much excited on the gravity of this question as it was in other countries. The Church of England was utterly degraded and put into an unworthy position by the policy which the Government recommended. The Church of England ought to rest in her pulpit. She ought not to descend to these poor little innocents and try to squeeze into their little brains the Athanasian Creed. There was no comparison between this country and Scotland on this question, because the national character of England was compromised, scandalized, and degraded by the conduct of her clergy—a set of Sepoys. [“Order.”]

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY asked if the remarks of the hon. Member were in Order.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the remarks of the hon. Member were entirely beside the Question.

MR. WHALLEY was much obliged to the Chairman for keeping him in Order, but he was about to point out that our schools to whom these grants would be made were quite equally with our pulpits most remarkable spectacles of what he understood to be Jesuitism. The clergy, sustained more or less for the purpose of promoting what we called the principles of loyalty and Protestantism, supported by an enormous revenue, established the voluntary schools he supposed to carry out their views. They were not to be relied upon to deal with our children behind the pulpit, for it was as much as we could do to manage them for their conduct in the pulpits. [“Order.”]

THE CHAIRMAN rose to Order, and pointed out that the Question before the Committee was that this clause should be added to the Bill. If the hon. Member did not keep to the Question, he must appeal to the Committee to support his decision.

MR. WHALLEY almost ventured to think it better that the Chairman should make such an appeal than that he should be restrained from uttering what he believed in his own conscience it was his duty to utter, to see if it were possible to make his voice heard even through that triple barrier, the reporters' gallery. He would not put the Chairman to the test though. He had before absented himself from the House rather than be restrained from speaking on this question in obedience to his feelings and English instincts, and did not return until he was invited back by the authorities. The passing of this clause would be a most outrageous exercise on the part of the Government of the powers and authority they had by their majority. Their conduct was the most retrogressive and the least honest—[“Order”]—of those who advocated—

THE CHAIRMAN must point out to the hon. Member that the expression which he had just used was not customary. He hoped that it would be withdrawn.

MR. ROEBUCK: Surely any Member of this House is perfectly justified in saying the conduct of a Ministry is dishonest. I think it is a right we have. I do not say it was wise to say this in the present instance, but we have this right, and if I thought the Government were acting dishonestly I should claim the right of asserting that they were doing so.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield might have heard such charges made in his experience in that House; but so far as his (the Chairman's) experience went, he had not heard them put with such directness of language; and he thought the practice of Parliament rather was to veil a charge of this sort in words rather less offensive.

MR. WHALLEY said, that he did not say “dishonest” but “least honest,” but he would withdraw the words.

MR. NEWDEGATE thought it was quite necessary Members should be allowed to call a spade a spade, and on the present occasion he was happy, in vindication of the freedom of debate, to endorse the expressions of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield.

Clause added to the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, after Clause 24, to insert the following clause:—

(Power to authorise appointment of school attendance committee by urban sanitary authority.)

“On the application of the urban sanitary authority of an urban sanitary district which is not a borough, and which is co-extensive with any parish or parishes not within the jurisdiction of a School Board, containing according to the last published Census for the time being a population of not less than five thousand, the Education Department may by order authorise the sanitary authority of that district to appoint, and thereupon such authority may appoint, a school attendance committee as if they were the council of a borough, and that committee, to the exclusion of the school attendance committee appointed by the guardians, shall enforce the provisions of this Act in the sanitary district, and be in that district the local authority for the purposes of this Act, and on the requisition of the parish but not otherwise shall make bye-laws as such local authority, and all the provisions of this Act shall, save as before provided with respect to the making of bye-laws, apply accordingly as if the sanitary authority were the council of a borough.

“Provided, That the expenses (if any) of a school attendance committee appointed by an urban sanitary authority shall be paid out of a fund to be raised out of the poor rate of the parish or parishes comprised in such district, according to the rateable value of each parish, and the urban sanitary authority shall, for the purpose of obtaining payment of such expenses, have the same power as a board of guardians have for the purpose of obtaining contributions to their common fund under the Acts relating to the relief of the poor, and the accounts of such expenses shall be audited as the accounts of other expenses of the sanitary authority.

“Any bye-laws in force in an urban sanitary district, or any part thereof, before the appointment of a school attendance committee by the sanitary authority of such district shall continue in force, subject nevertheless to be revoked or altered by the school attendance committee of the sanitary authority.

“Where an urban sanitary district is not a borough, and not wholly within the jurisdiction of a School Board, and is not within the foregoing provisions of this section, the urban sanitary authority of that district may from time to time appoint such number as the Education Department allow, not exceeding three, of their own members to be members of the school attendance committee for the union in which the district or such part thereof not within the jurisdiction of a School Board is situate, and such members, so long as they are members of the sanitary authority, and their appointment is not revoked by that authority, shall be members of the school attendance committee, and have the same powers and authorities as if they had been appointed by the guardians.

“Where a School Board is appointed after the commencement of this Act for any parish which forms or comprises the whole or part of an urban sanitary district in which the school attendance committee is appointed by the urban sanitary authority, such school attendance committee shall, at the expiration of two months after the election of the School Board, cease to act for the urban sanitary district, and the school attendance committee appointed by the guardians shall be the local authority for so much of the urban sanitary district as is not under the School Board.

“All bye-laws in force at the expiration of the said two months shall continue in force, subject to being revoked or altered by the local authority, in pursuance of section seventy-four of ‘The Elementary Education Act, 1870,’ as amended by this Act.”

The noble Lord, in explaining the object of the clause, said it was a very important one. There were a good number of towns which, though they had no municipal institutions, were still very large urban communities, having populations ranging from 40,000 to 8,000; and without some such clause as this those large urban communities would be treated merely as units on the Board of Guardians, having only single representatives there, the effect of which would be that great urban communities would be managed virtually by their rural neighbours. The Government had to contend with considerable difficulty in dealing with this matter, because of the old difficulty of the areas for rating. They had found that they could not adopt urban sanitary districts universally, but they had been able to adopt it in certain districts. They had found that a large number of these urban communities happily coincided with civil parishes; and therefore they proposed in this clause that, where the urban district coincided with one or more civil parishes, the urban district should appoint its own school attendance committee. The limit of population was adopted in such cases—namely, where it was not less than 5,000. In those local improvement districts, which did not coincide with several parishes, it was proposed, where the population exceeded 5,000, to give the urban authorities power, with the assent of the Education Department, to appoint so many members of the Board of Guardians as would fairly represent the districts upon the school attendance committee.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY feared that the effect of the clause would be that one-half the parishes would have bye-laws, and the other half would have none—a state of things which would lead to confusion. He moved an Amendment to insert after the word “guardian,” in line 9 of the clause, the words “and the urban authorities may make bye-laws, and.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the objection to the Amendment was that in making bye-laws for enforcing compulsory attendance it was important, as far as possible, to act in accordance with public feeling. Now, the urban sanitary authority were not elected ad hoc with a view to the passing of educational bye-laws, and it would be forcing things too far to give them this power without testing the feeling of the parish in some way. Moreover, a requisition from the parish was the principle adopted in a previous clause.

W. E. FORSTER said, the which the noble Lord wished to adopt for urban sanitary authorities had been adopted for Town Councils, who would act upon their own discretion, though they were not elected ad hoc. There was no sufficient reason for making a distinction between the two bodies.

MR. ROEBUCK pointed out that though urban sanitary authorities were not now elected for the purpose of passing these bye-laws, at every election after the passing of the Bill they would be elected ad hoc. The chief objection of the Chancellor of the Exchequer therefore fell to the ground.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that all the matters of changes of area were very difficult, and the Government would consider the matter and state what course they would adopt on the Report.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY said, he would withdraw the Amendment upon this understanding.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause added to the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved, after Clause 25, to insert the following clause:—

(Returns by local authority (although not a School Board.)

“The local authority under this Act (although not a School Board) shall send to the Education Department such returns and information respecting their proceedings under this Act, and respecting matters on which School Boards can be required under ‘The Elementary Education Act, 1870,’ to make returns, as the Education Department from time to time require.”

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. WHITWELL moved, after Clause 6, to insert the following clause:—

(Copy of time tables, &c. to be supplied to local authority.)

“The managers of each public elementary school receiving a grant of public money shall, on the first day of June in every year, supply to the clerk of the existing local authority of the school district in which it is situated, whether it be a school board or board of guardians, or the council of a burgh, a copy of the time table or tables that has or have been in use in such school during the year immediately preceding, together with a nominal roll of the children who during that period have availed themselves of the conscience clause for the purpose of being absent from religious instruction during the time such has been given in any such school.”

VISCOUNT SANDON opposed the clause on the ground that the local authority had nothing whatever to do with the internal management of voluntary schools, and that the proposition was the first step towards giving them the management of those schools.

MR. WHALLEY thought it most essential that the manner in which these schools, supported as they would be in a great measure by the rates and the Government grant, ought to be known to the local authority.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ONSLOW moved, after Clause 8, to insert the following clause:—

(Compensation in case of reasonable non-attendance.)

“If the court shall consider that the parent of a child has shown reasonable excuse for non-attendance, the court may at its discretion grant to the parent such a sum of money to cover the necessary expenses and loss of day's wages as it may think fit, such moneys to be paid by the summoning authority.”

VISCOUNT SANDON did not think it necessary that the magistrate should have such a power. The matter would be in the hands of the Guardians, and they were not likely to be too hasty in summoning parties.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU thought there ought to be some power to grant compensation in certain cases.

MR. WHALLEY also contended that there ought to be such a power, and that magistrates ought to be entrusted with it.

Clause negatived.

MR. WHEELHOUSE moved, in page 4, after Clause 10, to insert the following clause:—

(Provision for blind and deaf-mute children.)

“The School Board, or other local school authority of any union, parish, or place, may, in its discretion, provide for the reception, maintenance, and instruction of any person being blind or deaf-mute in any hospital, school, or institution established, or to be established, for the reception of children suffering under such infirmities, and may pay the charges incurred in the conveyance of such children to and from the same, as well as those incurred in his or her maintenance, support, and instruction therein; and the said School Board or other school authority may provide for the maintenance and instruction of such child, in every case where there may be special circumstances rendering it advisable, by giving money for that purpose; Provided, nevertheless, That, in respect of any such child, during the period it shall be at school, payment of money for the purposes of this section shall not be deemed to be parochial relief given to the parent, or person in loco parentis, of any such child, nor shall such parent or other person, by reason of any money given under this section, be deprived of any franchise, right, or privilege, or be subject to any disability or disqualification.”

The hon. and learned Member urged the helpless condition of this unfortunate class if left without education, and their liability to become paupers if the special education they required was beyond the means of their parents and guardians, while such special education placed them in a comparatively independent position, enabled them to earn their own living, and saved them from becoming permanent paupers, and thus costing the State far more than it would cost to make them useful members of society. He also urged that the parents of these children paid rates and taxes like other people, and yet they, who most required State aid in the education of their children, could receive no State aid at all and obtain no education for them, because no provision was made for such education. When the Act of 1870 was introduced, it was alleged that provision was intended to be made for the education of every child in England. If this were so, why should these two classes be unprovided for? Experience had shown that voluntary assistance alone was not sufficient to cope with the matter.

New Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he felt a strong desire to benefit these poor children, but the question was how the expense should be defrayed. He had devoted a long time to the consideration of the subject, but had not been able to see his way to the solution of the difficulty. The care and education of pauper children who were blind or deaf and mute devolved upon the Guardians, and there were admirable private institutions for others, supported by voluntary subscriptions. He hoped the Committee would not enter on these large outside subjects in discussing an Education Bill.

MR. MUNDELLA expressed his disappointment with the answer of the noble Lord, and hoped that he would still consider the propriety of giving the local authority a permissive power to educate this class of children, who, of all others, had special claims upon the sympathies of the country. He believed that in Sheffield provision was being made at the present moment for the education of these children.

MR. A. MILLS said, the London School Board had taken the subject up, and if it could be done under the present law, he did not see the necessity of a permissive clause in this Bill.

MR. MUNDELLA said, if school boards had the power, why not extend it to the local authorities?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, Guardians could already pay for the maintenance of pauper children of this class in special institutions; but it was a very large question whether local authorities should practically take charge of all those unfortunate children, whether of the pauper, or non-pauper class.

MR. WHEELHOUSE replied that he wanted some provision for the education of mutes who were not paupers and whose parents contributed to rates from which they could now receive no benefit, on the ordinary principle of securing the education of all children capable of receiving it, Government itself having, as he contended, clearly conceded the principle of such education. It was very hard to be told—as he was practically now being told—that the Poor Law authorities had nothing to do with this class, whatever the Education Department had; and when in turn he appealed to the latter Department, to be then told that no provision could be made by this Bill, especially as he (Mr. Wheelhouse), as would be well recollected by the House, had already more than once endeavoured to pass a Bill which he thought then, and still continued to think, would have solved the difficulty had it been accepted.

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, these children had as much right to education as any other class, and something was already being done for them in Scotland.

SIR ANDREW LUSK observed, that the House was about to take a great deal of trouble and spend much money for the children who could see, and they therefore might take a little pains and go to some expense for the unfortunate children who were blind.

MR. MUNDELLA appealed to the noble Lord to consider the question upon the Report.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH hoped the noble Lord would not by his sympathies be led into a course which would divert the Bill from its primary object as an educational measure.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the Government had a keen sympathy for these poor children, but they could not do everything that was wanted in one Bill. The subject had been considered by the Department, but they did not see their way clearly to make provision for these children in the present measure.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 54; Noes 223: Majority 169.

MR. MUNTZ moved, in page 4, after Clause 10, to insert the following Clause:—

(Expense of providing industrial school may, with consent of Home Secretary, be spread over a term of years.)

“Where a School Board have incurred or require to incur any expense in providing an industrial school, they may, with the consent of Her Majesty’s Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, spread the payment over such number of years not exceeding fifty, as may be sanctioned by the Secretary of State, and may contract a loan for such purpose in the same manner as if the said industrial school were a public elementary school; and for this purpose the provisions of section ten of ‘The Elementary Education Act 1873,’ shall be held to apply to such loan, and the First Schedule of ‘The Public Works Loans Act, 1875,’ shall be held to include such work.”

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the principle of this clause was acted upon by school boards at present, only the proposal of the hon. Member made the manner of carrying it into effect clearer.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. PELL moved, after Clause 21, to insert the following Clauses:—

(Dissolution of School Board where no school house or site, and district has sufficient public school accommodation.)

“Where application for the dissolution of a School Board is made to the Education Department by the like persons and in the like manner as an application for the formation of a School Board, under section twelve of ‘The Elementary Education Act, 1870,’ and the Education Department, are satisfied that no school and no site for a school is in the possession or under the control of the School Board, and that there is a sufficient amount of public school accommodation for the district of the School Board, the Education Department may, after such notice as they think sufficient, order the dissolution of the School Board.

"The Education Department by any such order shall make provision for the disposal of all money, furniture, books, documents, and property belonging to the School Board, and for the discharge out of the local rate of all the liabilities of the board, and such other provisions as appear to the department necessary or proper for carrying into effect the dissolution of the board.

"The Education Department shall publish the order in manner directed by 'The Elementary Education Act, 1873,' with respect to the publication of notices, and after the date of such publication or any later date mentioned in the order, the order shall have effect as if it were enacted by Parliament, without prejudice nevertheless to the subsequent formation of a School Board in the same school district. All bye-laws previously made by the School Board shall continue in force, subject nevertheless to be revoked or altered by the local authority under this Act."

(Provision where School Board possesses any property or has incurred liabilities.)

"An application for the dissolution of any such School Board as aforesaid shall, if the School Board possesses any property or has incurred any liabilities, be accompanied by a draft scheme, passed by a resolution of the ratepayers in the like manner as the resolution for the application was passed, for the transfer of such property and liabilities to, and the future management of the school by, such authority or body of persons as may be willing to undertake the same on terms to be mentioned in the scheme.

"The Education Department shall take the application and scheme into consideration, and may make an order allowing the same, with or without modifications, and containing provisions for the dissolution of the School Board, and if necessary for the vesting of the property of the School Board and the discharge of their liabilities out of the poor rate of the parish, and for the issue of precepts for that purpose to the overseers by the board of guardians of the union within which the parish is situate, and such other provisions as may appear to the Education Department necessary or proper for carrying such scheme into effect, or they may make an order disallowing the application and scheme; but an order allowing any such application and scheme shall not come into operation until three months from the date of such order, nor shall such order come into operation at all if within such period of three months a resolution is passed by the ratepayers, in like manner as the requisition of a parish to guardians for the purposes of this Act, to the effect that it is not desirable that such order should come into operation."

MR. MUNDELLA opposed the clauses on the ground that they were re-actionary. He could scarcely think that the hon. Member was in earnest in proposing them, because some of the most valuable school boards in the country were those which had no schools under them. If the Government adopted them, hon. Members on that side of the House would feel justified in using every resource in their power to resist the Bill.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON expressed a hope that the Committee would not allow itself to be deterred from passing the clause by the threat of obstruction which had just been held out by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella). He (Mr. Egerton) thought that hon. Members on his side of the House could not justly be charged with being re-actionary, as not only had the Act of 1870 been passed, as a compromise, in a very different form from that in which it was introduced, but the example had been set by some hon. Members opposite, who had not ceased disturbing the Settlement of 1870 by agitating for the compulsory formation of school boards. He thought they were justified, when the time came, to review the whole subject, after an experience of six years, in attempting to remedy the defects of the former Act by every means in their power.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the Government would not accept the Amendment that had been proposed. It would not be easy to make an alteration in the existing law more likely to have an ill effect on the cause of education. School boards had enormously increased the amount of education all over the land. They represented hard work as well as devotion to the cause of education, and they had regard to the old municipal principle and greatly encouraged education in the districts in which they were established. They could not have done the good which they had done without exciting some opposition, and the Amendment would subject them to an incessant agitation against their very existence, which must weaken their hands and make it difficult for them to do their work. He could not conceive a greater delusion than the idea that there was any necessary connection between school boards and secular education. The great hope for education was that it should be fastened upon the municipal action of each place, and that the inhabitants should feel that it was their business and duty to promote it, and that they ought to elect bodies for the performance of that duty.

Mr. Pell

THE O'CONOR DON did not see the objections to the clause in the same light as his right hon. Friend. This clause would not apply to cases where sufficient provision was made for education. These school boards were called into existence when there was no other local machinery for enforcing education; but now other local bodies had powers similar to those of school boards. If the proposals contained in this clause were adopted the school boards would not be done away with, and it was only in cases where they had not been successful that the provisions of the clause would apply. He trusted the Government would not reject the clause.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, it was right that where it was found that a school board was not wanted, power should be given to get rid of it. He believed that applications had been made to the Education Department, but the answer had been, "No, the school board is there, and it is eternal." Why should such boards be continued when they did not serve any useful purpose? In many cases school boards had been originated from merely party motives, and without reference to the professed object. There were, he believed, many school boards which did their duty well; but, on the whole, he believed there was great dissatisfaction throughout the country, and it was time to give the public power to dispense with them when they did not fulfil the objects for which they were appointed. He could not conceive what there was in this proposal to excite a feeling of alarm.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, he was surprised to hear an hon. Member opposite say that this proposition was not at all of a re-actionary character. He was sorry that hon. Gentlemen did not understand what they were supporting. The right hon. Gentlemen who had just spoken had told them the whole story. He condemned school boards because he thought that they were not sufficiently religious, although he admitted that in some cases they were not doing so badly in regard to religious instruction. It was quite clear that if there was any force in his argument he would want to carry it much further, and propose the dissolution of all school boards. ["No."] That was the clear tendency of his argument. Could there be anything more absolutely and completely re-actionary as regarded the Act of 1870? The Parliament of that day had municipal corporations and Boards of Guardians all over the country, and if they thought proper they could have adopted the recommendations of this Bill and have given school powers to committees of corporations and Boards of Guardians; but they thought it much wiser to have a special board for the purpose, and that special board was the School Board. The hon. Member said there were 530 school boards without schools. — [Mr. PELL: 530 where they have no schools.] — There were a great many of these school boards which had not been at work sufficient long to provide the schools which were necessary in their district. There were many other school boards who had not thought it necessary to build schools because they could take them over all ready. In Rochdale, where he lived, the school board had not had occasion to build a single school, though it had been in operation since the Act of 1870, but it had taken over several schools. These schools were under board management, and were practically board schools. If they adopted this clause they would hand over the powers of the school board to committees of corporations or committees of Guardians; but these would not have power to take over schools. It would therefore be a great misfortune to take away the boards. The right hon. Member who spoke last said there was great dissatisfaction throughout the country with the working of the school boards. [Cheers.]

MR. J. G. HUBBARD: I do not think I said that. On the contrary, I said that there were school boards which discharged their duties well.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, it was clear from the cheers which had been raised on the benches around the right hon. Gentleman that he (Mr. Bright) was not alone in his conception of what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Bright) did not think that it was possible to prove that there was any great dissatisfaction, any general dissatisfaction, or any dissatisfaction worth while to name in connection with school boards. There might be Gentlemen who complained of the rates. Hon. Gentlemen had for the last five or six years exercised their political influence in stimulating hostility to the rates. Though there might be a feeling of that kind, there was a general admission that the institution of school boards was the right thing for Parliament to do, and was one of the best things Parliament had ever done. It might be admitted that there were many school districts which would rather like to get rid of school boards, and run their chance of whatever might happen, to save a halfpenny or three farthings on the rate, and under this clause they would have the whole question re-opened in every district where the smallest minority was dissatisfied. Was it worth while, was it necessary to try and overturn—for what was the real object of this clause—the system which Parliament deliberately adopted in 1870, which was in concurrence with all that they had done with regard to their municipal institutions, and which, he held, had worked admirably throughout the country? The enormous value of the school boards had been shown by the statements of the noble Lord, and he confessed he was astonished, considering how much hon. Members were now prepared to support public and national education, that an attempt should be made to overthrow that system which was deliberately established in 1870, and which the universal concurrence of opinion throughout the country and all the facts and figures before Parliament had shown to be so good. He would undertake to say—without desiring to state what hon. Gentlemen opposite would say was a menace or an expression of undue indignation—that he believed if the clause were to pass it would be felt throughout the country by the warmest supporters of education that a great blow had been struck against the Act of 1870, and that the noble Lord had, in obedience to influences which he ought to have resisted, consented to what he ought never for a moment to have thought of surrendering. He hoped the Government Bill might do the good which the noble Lord expected. He (Mr. Bright) was not what might be called a fanatical supporter of very strict and rigid compulsion. He sometimes was of opinion that there were persons so enthusiastically in favour of education that they worked—he did not wish to call it their hobby—because it was a great wish for the public good which actuated them—but he sometimes thought they were too strenuous in urging a compulsion which might be very unwise, and almost oppressive. He did think they had adopted a system which had produced great good, and from which the next generation would gather enormous fruits, and he hoped the noble Lord would not assist in strengthening prejudices which, in obedience to the interests of the country, he ought to the last resist.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT was rather surprised that the right hon. Gentlemen, with all that clearness of perception he generally displayed in that House, had failed to appreciate the real question before the House. It was not that school boards should be got rid of absolutely and compulsorily. He could not support a clause having that object in view. He agreed that the Act of 1870 had done a great deal of good, and the school boards in many places had proved of inestimable value; but if the majority of the ratepayers should come to be of opinion that a school board had done its work, or that it would be better for the parish that it should be dissolved, why should they not have power to get rid of it, it was simply a question for the ratepayers.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR had no doubt that school boards at present produced a good deal of agitation in the election of members. What was proposed to be substituted would increase that agitation ten-fold, for minorities in the course of time became majorities, and they would have another fight, and thus there would be an incessant agitation throughout the country for school boards or no school boards.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he had listened to the discussion with great interest, and he did not think that was one of those occasions on which it was necessary for any one to get excited. If the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) thought they were going to abolish school boards, he could understand his feelings; but the Government never entertained any such idea, and they would not think of assenting to it. There was no reason, however, why the place which had once elected a school board should be saddled with it for all time. If they wanted to get rid of it they ought to be allowed to do so, and to act otherwise would be to go contrary to all their English ideas of reform. The result would be that if this power were not granted in the Bill that the minority would govern the majority, and they would compel people to elect a board they did not want to elect. He held they ought to consolidate and strengthen existing local authorities, whether they were Boards of Guardians, Improvement Commissioners, or Town Councils. He might illustrate what would happen if a remedy were not applied by relating a story of what happened to him soon after he came into office. An hon. Member opposite came to him in great perturbation, and said that in his little village of about 200 or 300 people they had elected a school board and put a school under it, but they had got tired of this, taken away the school, but they could not get rid of the school board. "There it is," said the hon. Gentleman, "and they all attack me for having set it up in the village." The Act of 1870 did not give any power to deal with the case; but at last the members of the school board absented themselves for six months from the board, so that all the notabilities of the village were disqualified for all time from sitting on a school board again. When the three years expired, however, they had to go through the farce of an election, and they had to work the Act although opposed to compulsion. Having adopted the principle of popular consent in governing all these matters as the basis of the Act of 1870, he did not see how in opposition to popular feeling they could persist in upholding machinery which had been already superseded. The first part of the proposal of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) was one deserving of the greatest attention. He was not afraid of being told that this was a reactionary measure, for it was no such thing. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had alluded to the fact that he (Viscount Sandon) had defended school boards. He had done so, but it was not necessary that he should champion unnecessary school boards. Two years ago he had stood up for many school boards in the exercise of the principle of compulsion, and he had resisted the attempt to forbid a locality to have a board which desired it. What he said was this, that the popular voice that created the board should have the power to dissolve it—but only in case the board had no school of its own, and, in short, no duty to per-think that the Motion involved a complete dissolution of school boards, but that was not the case. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the thing must be worked gradually; but was greatly surprised to hear him speak so warmly in favour of the present school boards. He was not at all surprised that the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) should have done so, because school boards were his own creation, and he (Viscount Sandon) admitted that they had done a great deal of good. He would remind the right hon. Member for Birmingham that in the year 1873 he had condemned the mode of electing school boards, and added that no free breeze of public opinion passed through them, but only the unwholesome atmosphere of sectarian exclusiveness. That was important testimony. He (Viscount Sandon) confessed that although he stood up for school boards where they had work to do, and had done it in Sheffield, in London, in Liverpool, and in several other places he could not put his hand upon them, yet if he found that there were some boards in the country which the ratepayers wished to get rid of, and where the existing local authorities would carry out the work better, he should not think the proposal of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire could be fairly objected to. The Government were prepared to accept the first part—but only that—of his hon. Friend's clause.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT explained, in reference to his speech delivered in 1873 that his objection to the mode of the election of school boards was confined to the cumulative vote. He regretted that the noble Lord had attempted no reply to the objection he (Mr. Bright) had made, that the authority which would be substituted in all places where school boards would be abolished would be an authority that could not build a school if one was wanted, and could not take over any school which the authorities connected with that school might think it desirable to hand over to a public authority. The noble Lord was proposing to substitute a partial and incompetent power for that which was competent and impartial, and on that account the Committee should not support this Amendment, which, so far, was clearly re-actionary.

MR. C. HOWARD thought it would be a great misfortune if they were to impose the task of dissolving school boards upon persons appointed for a very different purpose, and who might be very fit to perform the duties connected with the vestry or country district for which they were elected, but who might not necessarily be most interested in conferring the benefits of education upon their neighbours.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that although the Amendment had stood on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member (Mr. Pell) for some time, it had only just been accepted by the Government. It was, therefore, to some extent a surprise upon the Committee and the country, and as it was desirable that the Committee should have longer time to consider it, he moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Henry Jackson.)

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that at that hour he would not oppose the Motion. He wished to repeat that the Government had only accepted half the Amendment—namely, that which allowed a school board to be dissolved where they had no school. The other half of the Amendment they had refused to adopt.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS BILL.

(Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Salt.)

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [22nd June.]

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH proposed that the Bill should be read a second time pro forma, and added that he would then place upon the Paper certain Amendments which he believed would meet the objections to it which had been raised on behalf of the manufacturing interest.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not think that this course ought to be assented to, and therefore he moved that the debate be further adjourned.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, whilst sympathizing with the President of the Local Government Board in his desire to pass the Bill, could not agree that what he proposed would be a proper way of dealing with so important a subject. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think it was only a matter affecting a few manufacturers, and that because he had made an arrangement with them, the nature of which was not known, the House had no further concern in the question. The Bill, however, was one involving the interests of the public. It proposed to create a new local authority, as if we had not enough of local authorities already. That was a principle which the House ought not to assent to without further discussion. In his opinion, it was utterly impossible that a question of so much importance could be treated in that manner.

MR. DILLWYN protested against the House being now asked to assent to a measure which had been re-modelled in conformity with some Lobby arrangement.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER maintained that the course proposed by his right hon. Friend was not an unreasonable one, unless there was a desire on the opposite side of the House to obstruct the Bill. This matter had been long under the consideration of Parliament, and a very considerable amount of time and attention had been bestowed upon it. Objections to the Bill had come from a particular class of persons in the country, the Government had endeavoured to meet these objections; and all that was now asked was that they should simply place upon the Table the Bill in the form in which they intended to proceed with it.

MR. GOSCHEN reminded the Chancellor of the Exchequer that very little time had been spent on the Bill in the way of debate and discussion in that House. If the Government chose to give precedence to the Prisons Bill over this measure, they could not fairly charge the Opposition with wishing to obstruct Public Business.

MR. RIPLEY remarked that the President of the Local Government Board was willing to grant such concessions as would tend to make the Bill beneficial to the country, at the same time that it would not injure manufacturers; and he therefore trusted that the debate might not be adjourned.

MR. TENNANT trusted that the Bill would be read a second time, its principle having been repeatedly discussed.

MR. MACDONALD supported the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

CATTLE DISEASE (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 94.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 5th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BIGGAR asked, Whether, since there were Amendments to this Bill, it could be proceeded with now, after half-past 12?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that it was quite competent to proceed with the Bill.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that many Irish Members, including the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had expressed themselves as willing that the Bill should be proceeded with that evening.

On Motion, That Clause 5 (Effect of order) stand part of the Bill?

MR. BIGGAR said, this Bill was not at all called for. It was only supported in Ireland by the large graziers and cattle salesmen, and it would injure the interests of small farmers. As this clause would put the Bill in operation by means of the Poor Law Guardians, he would move its rejection.

MR. BUTT said, the hon. Member was mistaken in thinking that the large graziers in Ireland wanted this Bill. It had been seen in Ireland that it would be of great advantage to them if they could establish confidence in England in the store cattle exported from Ireland. This would be the result of the Bill, and he was especially anxious that one of its objects—the establishment of an efficient inspection at the ports of debarkation in Ireland—should be attained. This might lead to the abolition of inspection in English ports. He had some Amendments himself, which he would reserve, on the Report. He thought that the cost of this inspection should be borne by some general fund, and not at the expense of the unions.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH assured the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Biggar) that there was no intention on the part of the Government to place on the Boards of Guardians the duty of paying Portal Inspectors, though he did not know that he could hope for aid from the Imperial Treasury. The powers given to the Boards of Guardians were distinctly powers in addition to those already possessed by the Lord Lieutenant.

THE O'CONOR DON never liked this Bill, and in Ireland there was no demand for it. The greatest hope he had in regard to it was that in nine-tenths of the country it would be a dead letter.

MR. MURPHY conceived that the Bill would achieve for Ireland a vast advantage in restoring confidence in Irish cattle in English markets. Six hundred thousand cattle were annually imported into England from Ireland, and Englishmen would be satisfied if they knew that in Ireland the same precautions would be adopted under this Bill as were now adopted in England.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 (Appointment of Committees).

MR. BIGGAR objected to the authority therein given to Boards of Guardians to delegate their powers, and moved an Amendment accordingly.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH assented to leaving out the Proviso, if the feeling of Irish Members was against it.

Proviso struck out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 8 (Appointment of Inspectors and other officers).

On the Motion of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Amendment made authorizing the Boards of Guardians to revoke appointments of Inspectors, but requiring them after such revocation to make another appointment so long as required by the Lord Lieutenant.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 9 to 12, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Mode of payment of compensation).

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH moved, in page 5, line 5, after "union," to insert—

"Provided always, That in case it is proved to the satisfaction of said Chief or Under Secretary that any animal in respect of which compensation has been paid by the treasurer of any union was, within seven days immediately preceding its slaughter, brought into such union solely for the purpose of being shipped to some place out of Ireland, or sold at a fair, and that the owner or person in charge of such animal has not been guilty in relation to such animal of any act in contravention of any order, regulation, or licence made or granted under the principal Act or this Act, then such Chief or Under Secretary shall, by order, direct payment to such treasurer out of the moneys for the time being in the Bank of Ireland, to the credit of the Cattle Plague Account, of the whole of the moneys certified to have been paid by way of compensation in respect of such animal."

Proviso agreed to.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH promised to consider before Report the subject of the hon. and learned Member's (Mr. Butt's) clauses, providing that the Bill should not extend to animals brought into Irish ports for being again exported therefrom, and for the regulations as to exportation of animals.

Preamble agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

TOLL-BRIDGES (RIVER THAMES)

(re-committed) BILL—(BILL 219.)

(Mr. Alderman M^r Arthur, Sir James Clarke Lawrence, Mr. Forsyth, Sir Henry Peek, Sir Trevor Lawrence, Sir Charles Russell.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. SPEAKER: My opinion having been asked whether this Bill could properly be proceeded with, seeing the extent of the alterations made in the Bill by a Select Committee, I have to state, for the information of the House, that it has been held that the Amendments made to a Private Bill by a Select Committee ought not to be so extensive as to constitute a different Bill from that which has been read a second time by the House. This is not a private Bill, but as affecting private interests, it has been dealt with as a quasi-private or hybrid Bill. It cannot be questioned that the Amendments are of a very extensive character; for the Preamble and the clauses have been completely changed, and both in form and substance it is a new Bill. But the circumstances under which this Bill has been considered by the Committee are peculiar. Early in the Session a Bill was introduced for throwing open the Metropolitan Toll Bridges. But the second reading of this Bill was postponed to a later period; and, in the meantime, the whole subject-matter of the Bill was referred to the consideration of a Select Committee. When that Committee had reported its recommendations to the House, the Bill was read a second time and committed to a Select Committee, nominated partly by the House and partly by the Committee of Selection. To this Committee were referred the Reports of several Committees on the subject, including the Report of the present Session recently made to the House. These circumstances are certainly exceptional. The House deferred the second reading of the Bill until it had received the Report of its Committee, and in committing the Bill to a Select Committee seemed to indicate the scope of the Amendments to be considered by a reference to previous Reports. This proceeding was indeed in the nature of an instruction to the Committee, which permitted a greater latitude of Amendments than is generally allowable. In view of these special circumstances, the House may probably not consider that the Committee has so far exceeded its powers as to require the withdrawal of the Bill. There is, however, a question affecting the Standing Orders which ought not to be overlooked. After the first reading the Examiner reported that the Standing Orders had been complied with. The Committee has since made Amendments affecting private rights and interests, and I would suggest, for the consideration of the House, whether the Bill as amended should not be referred to the Examiners to inquire how far the Standing Orders have been complied with in the Amendments made by the Committee.

Order discharged.

Bill, as amended, referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills to inquire whether the Amendments involve any infraction of the Standing Orders of the House.

Leave given to the Examiner to sit and proceed forthwith.

PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Bill to amend "The Public Record Office Act, 1838," ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 262.]

CIVIL SERVANTS SUPERANNUATION (UNHEALTHY CLIMATES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Bill to make further provision respecting the Superannuation Allowances to be granted to Civil Servants serving in unhealthy climates, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH and Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 263.]

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 21st July, 1876.

CONFESSION.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE, who had given Notice to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of Report of the Committee of the Upper House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury with regard to Confession agreed to in the Session of 1874," said, he ought to apologize to their

Lordships for bringing before them a subject not altogether agreeable to some Members of their Lordships' House, but he thought that as most of the Members of the Upper House of Convocation were Members also of their Lordships' House, that was a fitting place in which to bring the subject forward. The subject was not only a complicated one, but it was one of the greatest importance, the interest in which was augmenting every day, for it touched the question of habitual confession—a practice which had been condemned as contrary to the practice and teaching of the Church of England by the highest authority of the Church. It would be in the recollection of their Lordships that he brought this question before the House in 1873, and his Motion was followed by considerable debate in the Upper House of Convocation. Considerable difficulty was expressed as to how the matter should be dealt with, but the purport of the debate was to condemn compulsory confession, and to show that habitual, compulsory, or sacramental confession was contrary to the practices of the Established Church. Notwithstanding this condemnation the practice had increased rather than diminished. As to the Public Worship Regulation Act, it did not give any greater facility in dealing with the practice than existed before the passing of that Act. He had himself attempted to introduce a clause into the Bill in reference to it, but failed. The consequence was that habitual confession was spreading, and there were now scattered over the country several thousand clergymen who practised it; and he might refer in proof of that statement to the Charges from the Bishops of several dioceses speaking of it and lamenting it. There were at that time notices in several churches of the diocese of London—one of which he had himself seen—to the effect that the church would be open for two hours three days a-week for the purpose of confession and absolution. It was perfectly vain for the Bishops to condemn these practices in their Charges, if they permitted the practices in their churches. They had all recently read in the public Press a very unfortunate case, and they all sympathized with the noble Earl (the Earl of Minto). He had recently been talking to a lady who said no doubt they all sympathized with the noble Earl, but there was not one family among the upper classes in life which had not to regret some similar case. It was a very significant fact that in a recent sermon the Bishop of Manchester said that although no one had a greater dread of the introduction of confession than himself, yet he had been unable to forbid it, as one of his most earnest and most gifted clergymen represented that he could use it to keep young men pure. It did not appear, however, that the existence of the Confessional kept the youth of France and Italy pure, and he contended that the right rev. Prelate, in publicly accepting habitual confession, had acted ultra vires, and done a grievous wrong to the National Church. As to the literature of confession, which consisted of works of very questionable morality—some indeed worthy of Holywell Street—they purported to be religious works, instructing the young how to examine themselves; but there was one point especially on which they constantly insisted—namely, that if a person felt inclined to confess, he ought not to allow himself to be influenced in a contrary direction by even his nearest and dearest friends. With regard to this evil, he might mention two typical cases. One was furnished by a letter which was written by a clergyman to a young lady, and which was to the following effect:—

“My dear Child,—I tried to see you after evensong to tell you you should use your own judgment as to whether you should communicate without previous confession. . . . I should not say anything unkind; but it seems to me that if you leave off coming to a sacrament which our Lord has ordained for the forgiveness of sins done after baptism, you are running a great risk. I know no other way by which mortal sin committed after baptism is forgiven except by sacramental confession and absolution. If you are living and dying without again being absolved, it is only right you should see clearly the risk you are running.”

The same clergyman, he understood, had since forwarded to a young lady a small book, entitled Absolution, and How it is to be Obtained, containing questions for self-examination on the Seventh Commandment. The second case was described by a letter which had been addressed to him by a father—

“About two months ago,” his correspondent wrote, “I discovered that my daughter had for about 18 months been almost monthly confessing to a clergyman. She tells me that, when she first went there, she told him she was not of age, and that she had come to him unknown to either of her parents, and that if they knew of it they would be very angry.”

The letter went on to state that this clergyman's church was open every Friday from 3 to 5; that he sat in his surplice in a small room screened from the church, and that one went in at a time, knelt down beside him, and received absolution by his putting his hand on the head. Such was the result of this miserable system that a graduate of the University, a clergyman of the English Church, an English gentleman, being carried away by sacerdotal zeal, acted contrary to all rules of honour or good feeling, and deliberately encouraged filial disobedience and systematic deceit. That case was well known in the neighbourhood where it occurred. The clergy felt their cloth assailed, the laity asked whether their children were to be thus decoyed from them; but they knew that they were safe in the hands of the most rev. Prelate; they knew that he had stated that sacramental confession had no place in the Church of England; they knew he had promised to use all the power and influence of his high position and his high character to suppress it; and, therefore, they were assured that his Grace would publicly visit with the gravest censure one whose conduct was unbecoming a clergyman or a gentleman. He would say one word more. None of them were free from attacks so treacherous, but they were more dangerous in regard to the poor than the rich. The latter could avoid any church in which such practices were carried on; they could, if necessary, change their residence or remove their children from schools; but the poor in agricultural districts must go to one church, or stay away altogether, nor could they avoid the abominable system when introduced into the schools. Had they not a right to expect that Parliament would protect them by seeing that the parish clergyman of the National Church conformed to the practice and teaching of that Church? That habitual confession was gaining daily a stronger hold on the English Church he had shown; he believed that confession was the corner stone of Sacerdotalism, and that no greater evil ever afflicted society. Nationally, it robbed men of self-reliance; in England it would divide class from class. Socially, it would destroy our English homes, by interposing a stranger between husband and wife, between father and child. Religiously, it would rob us of pure Christianity by creating many mediators instead of one. If a contagious disease threatened man or beast, Parliament interfered to protect them. He prayed now those who had the power to endeavour to stay the advance of that deadly moral malady. The noble Lord concluded by proposing his Motion.

“Moved, “That there be laid before this House Copy of Report of the Committee of the Upper House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury with regard to confession, agreed to in the Session of 1874.”—(The Lord Oranmore and Browne.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he did not understand that the noble Lord made any formal complaint against the right rev. Bench for the mode in which they had dealt with this question. On the contrary, by moving that the House should approach Her Majesty with a request that their formal decision on that subject should be printed and circulated for the benefit of their Lordships, he presumed that the noble Lord rather wished to declare that the formal utterances of the Bishops in the Convocation of the Southern Province were what they ought to be in this matter. He had to state that he offered no opposition whatever to the Address which the noble Lord had moved. He would be very glad that the Report of the United Bishops of the Upper House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury on that subject should be in their Lordships' hands if Her Majesty was pleased to accede to the Address, and order the Bishop's Judgment to be printed; and he believed the reading of that Report by the clergy would be likely to cure many of the evils of which the noble Lord had not unnaturally complained. The only point on which he understood the noble Lord to complain against any Member of the right rev. Bench was that he did not think they had been able in practice to carry into effect their deliberate and recorded opinion and judgment on that subject, as given in the year 1873. He was glad that the noble Lord had alluded to the correspondence which had passed between himself (the Archbishop of Canterbury) and a gentleman living at Croydon, because it gave him an opportunity of stating that case, as it was brought under his notice. That gentleman complained in his letter that his daughter had been induced to go to habitual confession by a clergyman, against her father's will and without his knowledge, and also, he might add, against the opinion expressed and laid down in that decision of the Upper House of Convocation. As soon as he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) received that letter he immediately communicated with the clergyman in question to hear what he had to state in his defence. He was not satisfied with what the clergyman said, and he expressed his dissatisfaction in what he considered very strong terms. The particular circumstances which the noble Lord had brought under his notice that evening were not reported to him in the letter which that gentleman addressed to him in the first instance, but in another letter to which, owing to his being absent from that part of his diocese and from pressing business, he had not yet been able to give the attention it deserved; and, the case being one in his diocese, he thought it better that he should inquire into it when public business allowed him to be present in that particular locality. Turning to the general remarks of the noble Lord, he hoped that the noble Lord had exaggerated the extent to which the evil of which he complained was carried. He could not believe that there was no family in the upper ranks of society which was not suffering under this evil: he was loth to believe that the evil was of that magnitude which the noble Lord had described—namely, that whereas the Bishops of the Church had pronounced a very distinct utterance on that subject, many of the clergy had thought themselves at liberty to ignore and set aside that decided and clear utterance of the rulers of the Church. No doubt there were instances in which what the noble Lord complained of did exist. It was true, no doubt, that there were instances when clergymen with more zeal than discretion were unwilling to be guided by those who were their authorized teachers. No doubt, also, the noble Lord had some ground of complaint if notices were placed on church doors inviting persons to do that which the Bishops had very distinctly said they ought not to do. But, of course, before such a violation of the laws of the Church as the putting up of those notices could be taken any cognizance of, there must be some formal complaint made; and he had no doubt that if such a formal complaint were made the Bishop of the diocese would immediately inquire into the matter and do his best to prevent a repetition of the evil. As to the utterances attributed to his right rev. Brother who was absent, knowing that his right rev. Brother was able to defend himself, and as, after all, the utterances in question were recorded in newspaper reports of the accuracy of which they could not be absolutely certain, he need not enter on that matter. However, the question to which the noble Lord had alluded was a very difficult and delicate one. As long as there were persons who were weak enough to think they would receive benefit from placing themselves more than the Church required or enjoined under the guidance and direction of a clergyman, whatever his sentiments might be, it was not unnatural that some mischief should arise to those who so acted. No doubt in this country a great number of Roman Catholics works which did not bear on the face of them any distinctive characteristics of that faith were circulated from house to house, and fell into the hands of young persons who were incapable of distinguishing the parts that were sound and those parts which were distinctly Roman Catholic in their teaching, and upon them they frequently had a mischievous effect. He was certain that if the noble Lord could so influence public opinion in this matter as to prevent booksellers from selling such works, and young persons from buying them, he would do much good by preventing literature of this kind, which had a deleterious effect, not only upon the faith but upon the manly character of those who put themselves under its guidance, from being circulated.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON (who was very little audible) said, that in the case referred to by the noble Lord, which occurred in 1874, he had written to the clergyman informing him of the charge that had been brought against him and calling on him to explain his conduct. He received in reply a letter from that clergyman admitting that he had misinterpreted the teaching of the Church of England on the subject, and promising obedience to his spiritual ruler. Since that time he had heard nothing more of that clergyman teaching the doctrine of confession; nor was he aware that the practice prevailed to any extent, until he was informed by some clergymen that young persons had stated to them that they had been confessed by a certain curate; but that they had been warned against doing so in future. So far as he himself was concerned he had never concealed his opinion, and he had in his Charges entered into the whole subject, and he had endeavoured to impress upon his clergy the observance of the doctrine of the Church of England. He did not think that cases of this kind, when they occurred, could be usefully dealt with in public—the best way of counteracting the evil was by fatherly advice and a prudent forbearance. Such offences could only be proceeded against in the Ecclesiastical Courts on charges of teaching false doctrines, and he thought few things were more inexpedient than prosecution for false doctrine. No doubt, the Bishops could interfere in a summary way with curates who offended in this respect by revoking their licences; but if the incumbents themselves pursued an objectionable course and could not be interfered with except by judicial procedure, he could not with justice take away the licence of the curate who did the incumbent's bidding—that was to say, if the Bishop was unable to suspend an incumbent it was not right to suspend his curate by summary process. These things must be cured by patience.

Motion agreed to.

FIJI.—ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

VISCOUNT CANTERBURY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Why the "Correspondence respecting the colony of Fiji," presented by command on the 6th August, 1875, and the "Further Correspondence respecting the colony of Fiji" (in continuation of the above-mentioned correspondence), presented by command on the 17th February, 1876, had not been distributed, and complained that the Rules and Orders of Parliament had not been pursued, inasmuch as certain Returns had been made to Parliament in blank, and that consequently Parliament was ignorant of what had taken place in regard to the colony of Fiji. In fact, since the 20th October, 1874, the date of Sir Hercules

Robinson's despatch, they had not had a scrap of information respecting that important colony. Three papers, and three alone, had been laid on the Table of the House. The first was the letter of instructions sent out by the Earl of Kimberley to certain Commissioners to report to him as to the best mode of dealing with Fiji, and that was dated 1873. The next was the Report of those Commissioners, and that was dated in April, 1874; and the last Paper was the Correspondence which had been transmitted by Sir Hercules Robinson to the Secretary of State in regard to the provisional arrangements which had been made for the administration of the government of the colony. When the Islands were first annexed it was asserted that the new colony would be self-supporting. His noble Friend below him (the Earl of Kimberley), when he held the Seals of the Colonial Office, distinctly refused, on behalf of the Imperial Government, to sanction any arrangement which would entail any liability on the Imperial Exchequer. But by the last information from Sir Hercules Robinson the revenue was barely sufficient to meet his own expenses. The noble Lord opposite had informed the House that the Governments of New Zealand and other Australasian colonies were willing to contribute a portion of the expenditure. But upon that question, as well as on all others connected with the financial and social condition and prospects of the Fiji Islands, their Lordships had no information whatever.

Moved That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies or extracts of any other correspondence or documents explaining the present condition of the colony of Fiji.—(The Viscount Canterbury.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON regretted the delay which had occurred in the furnishing of the Papers referred to by the noble Viscount. It had arisen from unusual pressure on the Colonial Department all through the Session. The document would, however, be in the hands of their Lordships in the course of a few days. The noble Viscount had gone on to raise several questions of great importance, but of which he had given him (the Earl of Carnarvon) no Notice—had he done so he should have been able to give him fuller explanations than he had it at the moment in his power to furnish. On one point, however, he might remark that, without some assistance from the Imperial Treasury, it would have been impossible to form an effective administration in the newly-annexed colony, and he was therefore of opinion that the loan of £100,000 was one of the most economical transactions that could have been entered into. As to the disturbances which had recently occurred in the colony, he was happy to say that in a communication he had received a few days ago, Sir Arthur Gordon, the new Governor, stated that the disturbances were entirely at an end, that they had never assumed the appearance of a war, that perfect tranquillity prevailed throughout the Islands and that life and property were secure. Their Lordships would agree, he thought, that that was a great result to secure in the course of a few months. The great difficulty of the colony was, of course, finance. The original method of raising revenue in the islands was by means of a poll-tax. This was a very objectionable tax, and had given rise to much discontent. It was now abolished, and Sir Arthur Gordon was having recourse to other less objectionable means, and the Government was proceeding in a most tranquil and satisfactory manner. He would, in conclusion, simply observe that all that had occurred in the colony during the last 12 months went, on the whole, to confirm the impression which he had originally formed. There were great difficulties to be encountered, but these difficulties were, he was happy to think, in a fair way of being surmounted, owing very much to the energy and judicious management of Sir Arthur Gordon, in whose administration, if there was one thing which more than another gave him confidence, it was the belief that he was determined, to the best of his ability, to hold the balance fairly between the White and the native population. Good government had, he might add, been established in the Colony, a satisfactory station had been secured there for our ships, and it was, he hoped, in fair process of gradual development. He thanked the noble Earl for giving him the opportunity of stating these facts, though he still thought they had a right to complain of unnecessary delay.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY agreed with his noble Friend that the pressure on the Colonial Office had been so great as to cause delay in the production of these Papers. But one reason why they should be produced, with the least possible delay, was that it was impossible to give notice of the line of observation which any noble Lord might deem it his duty to adopt in their absence. As to the outbreak which had occurred, no adequate information had, up to the present moment, been furnished; and very frequently, as in the case of New Zealand, war had resulted from quarrels arising out of the land question. But there was another reason, and a serious one, why they ought to have complete information upon this matter. Owing to his want of information he might fall into errors, but it appeared that a loan of £100,000 had been guaranteed upon the credit of the Imperial Government. He did not remember any Bill passing Parliament guaranteeing such a loan.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, this only showed the inconvenience of being obliged to speak on a subject without having all the information necessary to render their statements quite accurate. The "loan" to which the noble Earl referred was a Vote taken in the House of Commons last year for £100,000, of which £10,000 was spent last year, and it was intended to spread the £100,000 over three years. By the rules respecting grants of money this Vote did not come specially before their Lordships, but this was an Imperial, not a colonial matter.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was obliged for the information. The noble Earl was much better informed than he could be; but a Vote having been granted last year it was necessary to have information this year as to the manner in which the money had been expended, and whether a further Vote would have to be taken. One of the matters which he had at the time felt most anxious about was whether the Imperial Government would be committed to increased expenditure in the colonies by annexing these Islands. There was, he knew, such an intense desire to spend money anywhere and anyhow that it might be considered by the public as rather a handsome thing that they were establishing a colony in spending this money; but that did not exempt them from holding that the expenditure should be scrutinized.

One of the advantages, it was represented, that they were to gain from annexing these Islands was that they would stop a traffic which would become little better than a slave trade. On that point they were entitled to have information. They must not only consider Fiji, but the whole of the archipelago; and when they took Fiji they not merely undertook to deal with those Islands, but the islands surrounding Fiji; and he thought they had a right to complain that Parliament had not full and complete information on the whole subject.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, it was quite natural that the noble Earl should ask for information respecting Fiji, and he conveyed the idea that there was a strong wish for that information. But that was so, neither in that House nor in the other House of Parliament; but there had been any indications of a particular anxiety on the subject. He did not recollect a single Question there or "where" about it, and that did not mean if there was such a lively interest in the matter as the noble Earl seemed to imagine. At any rate, the noble Friend the Secretary of the Colonies, showed that he was ready to give information as the noble Earl was desirous of obtaining it. With regard to the publication of the Papers, the delay had arisen partly from the pressure of other business, and partly, no doubt, from oversight. It would have occurred if so much interest was felt in the topic as the noble Earl had thought fit to assume. As to the Vote of £100,000, that was a matter of the proper place, the other House of Parliament, and the Vote required the sanction of Parliament in the proper manner; there was, therefore, no cause for complaint that the noble Earl did not propose a Bill, since none had been proposed. The noble Earl had not, it was to be seen, laid any stress upon the duty of the Government to make the colony of Fiji self-supporting. Everybody knew the circumstances under which they took over Fiji; they had a particularly strong desire to take it, because of a large White population there, British, which they had to control. There was every reason to fear that disorder might occur, and even civil war, between the different tribes. These were some of the reasons which led to the step taken. It was not cussed; it came before the public in every possible form, and, notwithstanding the reluctance to take any step increasing the public expenditure, the course adopted was generally approved. As to the expenses, those who took an interest in colonial affairs, and who remembered the history of New Zealand and of South Africa would agree readily with him that no colony, of the value and extent of what he hoped Fiji would prove to be, had ever been acquired at so small an outlay of capital in the first instance. He believed that the Papers which were about to be presented would give a fair and accurate history of the progress of the colony during the last 12 months. It was fair for Parliament to ask for information, and he did not suppose there existed any reason for opposing the granting of information: but no proposal had been made here or "elsewhere," and it was rather unreasonable to complain of the Government not having complied with a wish which, so far as they knew, had never been expressed. If it was intended to raise a discussion upon the administration of the colonies in general it would be more convenient that the Notice should be put in such a form as to convey some idea that it was intended to take such a discussion. When Correspondence was moved for with the intention of raising a debate, it was usual to give an intimation to that effect; and under the circumstances he did not think the noble Lord could fairly expect the subject to be fully discussed.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, that it was only natural, in the absence of other information, that his noble Friend should have referred to the speech of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies. There were many and great reasons why the annexation of Fiji should take place, and the question should not be left as it were floating about in uncertainty. Among other questions there were those of slavery and the Coolie traffic, which it was desirable to settle. He assured the noble Earl that neither he nor his noble Friend formerly at the head of the Colonial Office had any objection to make to the policy of annexing these lands, but what they wanted to know was the actual state of the case. They were not desirous of acting with parsimony, or to complain that a few thousand pounds voted by the House of Commons had been spent on the colony for the purpose of doing what was necessary.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON suggested to the noble Viscount, whether, as the Papers would be shortly produced, he would not withdraw his Motion.

VISCOUNT CANTERBURY said, he would accede to the noble Earl's suggestion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

NOTICES TO QUIT (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Lord O'Hagan.)

[No 165.] SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD O'HAGAN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the measure had passed the Commons without discussion or division. The object of the 1st clause was to extend to Ireland the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act which was passed for England last year, extending notices to quit a tenancy from year to year from six months to twelve months. The principle had been admitted by their Lordships, and he therefore supposed there would be no controversy with regard to that point. The rest of the Bill he believed was the result of representations made on the part of the proprietors rather than the tenants. The 2nd clause provided that no notice to quit other than what was now required by law should be necessary in the case of a tenancy at will. The 3rd clause enabled a landlord who wanted a particular portion of land for certain specified purposes to give notice to the tenant as to that particular portion, and did not require notice as to the whole; and reciprocally the tenant was enabled, on receipt of notice as to a part, to give notice that he accepted it as applicable to the whole holding. It might possibly happen in certain cases that the landlord might take such portions as to render the rest useless, or greatly deteriorate it, and the clause provided against that possible mischief to the tenant. The 4th clause was one of considerable importance, and he should be very sorry if anything occurred to prevent its being passed. Everybody who was acquainted with the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland knew that if a tenant died intestate, and no administration was out, recovery of the land by the landlord was attended with great difficulty, because there was no machinery for serving a notice in the absence of a tenant. This clause proposed that it should be sufficient service if a notice was addressed "to the representative, and all persons claiming to represent the deceased, and left at his last place of dwelling, or posted in some conspicuous part of the holding, and sending another copy addressed to the townland in which the holding is situate."

This Bill would settle the law equally for the benefit of landlord and tenant in this and other respects, and he hoped their Lordships would give it a second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord O'Hagan.)

LORD INCHQUIN generally approved of the Bill, thinking it was highly important to settle the question of the determination of a tenancy in Ireland. He pointed out at the same time that if the Bill passed in its present form it would not quite assimilate the law with that of England; because it enacted a fixed time for the determination of the tenancy—namely, at the end of the year. He also thought that some further safeguard should be put into the Bill for the protection of the landlord. It was a very serious question the advisability of interfering with landlords in Ireland.

LORD LIFFORD said, that instead of having 15 months' notice, as tenants had at present, the Bill proposed to give them another six months. He thought the measure, on the whole, would have a most mischievous effect on Ireland, and he therefore begged to move that the Bill be read a second time on that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now,") and to add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months.")—(The Lord Lifford.)

LORD WAVENEY said, that the Land Act of 1870 had upon the whole worked well in, and been of great service to, Ireland, and he should support this Bill because it filled up some blanks which were left in that Act. It would, however, be quite impossible to make the systems of tenure of land in Ireland like those which were in existence in England.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, this was a Bill the principle of which, so far as the second reading was concerned, was to assimilate the law of England and Ireland with regard to notices to quit. Many of the points of the Bill would obviously be the subject of discussion, and he was far from saying that it would not need alteration in Committee. But no Notice had been given of its rejection, and it was unusual to offer opposition without Notice to a Bill which had passed through the other House of Parliament without discussion. Under these circumstances, he hoped their Lordships would not assent to its rejection.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he did not believe in those dangers which some noble Lords thought would happen to Ireland if this Bill were passed into law; but whatever these supposed dangers were, the Bill could be amended in Committee if necessary.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the affirmative; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

House adjourned at half-past Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 21st July, 1876.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Francis O'Beirne, esquire, for the County of Leitrim.
PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (Bath, &c.) * [264].
Second Reading—Bishopric of Truro [185]; Legal Practitioners * [43] [House counted out].
Committee—Elementary Education [155]—L.P. Committee—Report—Ardglass Harbour (re-comm.) [200]; Erne Lough and River (re-comm.) [187]; Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (Cardiff) * [243]; Metropolitan Board of Works (Loans) * [251].
Third Reading—Exhausted Parish Lands * [252]; Metropolis (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Confirmation * [241], and passed.

The House being met at Two of the clock, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, on account of indisposition:—Whereupon Mr. Raikes, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table as Deputy Speaker, and after Prayers counted the House, and, Forty Members being present, took the Chair, pursuant to the Standing Order.

UNITED STATES—THE INDIAN WAR.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If Her Majesty's Government can render any information with regard to the conflict waged between the United States Government and the Sioux tribe of Indians, many of which tribe are subjects of Her Majesty; whether the origin of the conflict has not been a breach of Treaty as regards reserves of land and subsidies, which may probably provoke widespread antagonism between the Indian and white races both in the United States and British territory; and, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to offer any good offices in the interests of the Indian subjects of Her Majesty and of humanity?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, that no information had so far been received by Her Majesty's Government respecting this conflict; he was equally unable to give any information as to what the possible consequences might be; nor had any information yet been received which tended to show that any subjects of Her Majesty forming part of the tribe in question were connected with the conflict. As at present advised, there was no intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government in any way to interfere in the matter.

TURKEY—ALLEGED ATROCITIES IN BULGARIA.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Secretary to the British Embassy at Constantinople has been sent to Bulgaria, and what is the object of his mission?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that on the 17th of the month Sir Henry Elliot was directed to send a member of his Embassy to assist Vice Consul Dupuis in inquiring into the alleged atrocities in Bulgaria, and Her Majesty's Government had heard that Mr. Baring, one of the Secretaries, had been sent upon the mission.

EGYPT—COURT OF SUMMARY JUSTICE.

QUESTION.

MR. RALLI asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the statement which appeared in the newspapers on Thursday evening is true—namely—

“That, the Egyptian Government refusing to permit the execution of the judgment pronounced against them, Mr. Hachmann, the President of the Court of Summary Justice, declared in open court this morning that he would refuse to accept any actions whatever, and that he now closes the court.”

MR. BOURKE: The Government, Sir, has received no official information on the subject whatever.

ARMY MOBILIZATION—THE SECOND ARMY CORPS—THE IRISH MILITIA.

QUESTION.

MR. J. C. BROWN: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, in pursuance of private Notice, Whether he will state to the House what has been the conduct of the North Cork, the South Cork, and Galway Regiments of Militia, now in camp at Aldershot, and respecting which some disparaging statements have appeared in The Times newspaper?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I am much obliged to the hon. Member for asking a Question upon the subject, as it happens that a good deal has been said about it, and a great amount of misconception has arisen respecting the conduct of the Militia regiments. If the House will allow me, I will read a letter addressed to the Inspector General of Reserve Forces by the general officer in command. In consequence of the statement which appeared in The Times, a telegram was sent to this officer, and I will now read his reply—

"Dear Wolseley—Your telegram just received. I have read the article in The Times to which you refer, and am very glad to have the opportunity of refuting the charge of misbehaviour and riotous conduct against the Irish Brigade while encamped at Horsham. It is a fact that I telegraphed to the General Officer commanding the 3rd Division, 2nd Corps, at or near Dorking, and that in that message I suggested that the troops of Hussars which were billeted in Horsham, on the march from Hampton Court to Brighton, should be retained for a day or two as a measure of precaution under the following circumstances:—On Friday, the 14th, the Galway Regiment of Militia arrived at my camp. On the 15th, Saturday, the North and South Cork Regiments arrived. I issued orders that the rule laid down in Her Majesty's Regulations, relating to soldiers not being permitted to go beyond one mile from camp would be in force, and that the town of Horsham was 'out of bounds.' It is very doubtful if these orders were thoroughly made known to the men of the several regiments. Small pickets were sent out to patrol the roads in the vicinity of the Camp at 'Retreat' (sunset). One of these pickets on the direct road to Horsham attempted to turn back a party of Militiamen bent on going into the town; and when their numbers became considerable, they or a portion of them passed through the picket, and a mounted policeman (military) came at once to camp and reported the facts. Pickets of 50 men, under an officer, were sent at once under the field officer of the day, who reported to me on his return that although he found a considerable number of men in Horsham, they all returned to camp at once, without opposition on their part, and that nothing approaching riot or disturbance occurred during the night. Feeling assured that exaggerated reports would be spread abroad, I determined to telegraph to the General commanding the Division to that effect, and saying that 'nothing serious had occurred; but as I was aware that the fair was to be held in Horsham on the Tuesday and Wednesday following, it occurred to me to suggest that as a precaution the troop of Hussars might well remain for a day or two. The event has proved that precautions were entirely unnecessary, and I assert, with immense satisfaction, that no troops, not the highest disciplined Regulars, could have conducted themselves more admirably than the North Cork, South Cork, and Galway Regiments of Militia did during their period of encampment at Horsham and up to the present moment. The Brigade marched from Guildford this morning to this camp, after a rail journey, the whole to my entire satisfaction. I mention this circumstance in corroboration of my statement regarding the good order and good feeling that has prevailed. It is due to the able and excellent officers who commanded these regiments that I should make as full an explanation as possible of what has been so grossly misrepresented. Although I may hope that what appears here may remove any doubt regarding the good behaviour of the regiments of my brigade, and assist in correcting opinions formed or misrepresentations, anything I have said will be weak in comparison with a letter which I hope will reach Mr. Hardy in sufficient time from the Special Commissioners and magistrates of Horsham, Colonel Aldridge, of St. Leonard's Park, Mr. Dickens, and others, who intimated to me their intention of addressing the Secretary of State for War, out of simple justice to the officers and men who had passed many days in their midst without a single complaint against them from the country people or anybody else and without a single 'police case,' and moreover that this year's 'fair' was the quietest known for some years. I have entered at great length into this subject, not more so, I hope, than the subject demands. I have not time to copy this letter, otherwise it would afford me satisfaction to show my opinion to Colonel Aldworth, Colonel Sir Augustus Warren, and Major Daly, who have so successfully commanded their regiments, and whose powerful influence could alone produce such a result.

"Yours faithfully,

"JULIUS GLYN, Major-General."

I am quite sure that even the length and fulness of this statement will not make it at all the less satisfactory to the House, and that it will render it unnecessary for me to say more.

[BILL 155.]

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Ascheton Cross.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 20th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

New Clause—

(Dissolution of School Board under certain circumstances),—

("Where application for the dissolution of a School Board is made to the Education Department by the like persons and in the like manner as an application for the formation of a School Board, under section twelve of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' and the Education Department, are satisfied that no school and no site for a school is in the possession or under the control of the School Board, and that there is sufficient amount of public school accommodation for the district of the School Board, the Education Department may, after such notice as they think sufficient, order the dissolution of the School Board.

"The Education Department by any such order shall make provision for the disposal of all money, furniture, books, documents, and property belonging to the School Board, and for the discharge out of the local rate of all the liabilities of the board, and such other provisions as appear to the department necessary or proper for carrying into effect the dissolution of the board.

"The Education Department shall publish the order in manner directed by 'The Elementary Education Act, 1873,' with respect to the publication of notices, and after the date of such publication or any later date mentioned in the order, the order shall have effect as if it were enacted by Parliament, without prejudice nevertheless to the subsequent formation of a School Board in the same school district. All bye-laws previously made by the School Board shall continue in force, subject nevertheless to be revoked or altered by the local authority under this Act"—(Mr. Pell), brought up, and read the first time:—

Question put, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the action of the Government last evening in accepting the clause had taken hon. Members by surprise, and made it necessary that it should be carefully examined. He should be glad of a little information as to the extent to which the clause would be immediately applicable and how many school boards there were which would be likely to come under its operation. The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council was under a misapprehension as to the number of school districts and school boards the clause would effect, because the immense majority of those school boards had got no schools, having not yet had time to provide them, and he expected it would turn out that a very large proportion of those 541 school board districts mentioned in the Return had been not voluntarily, but compulsorily formed.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he did not think the question of the number, whether it was 530 or 540, was at all of the importance which his right hon. Friend attached to it. The Department had no means of knowing the number of those districts which had or had not schools at present. A large number had been compulsorily formed. As he understood the clause, its meaning was that school boards could be dissolved only where they had no school and no site for a school, and where the Department was satisfied there was sufficient school accommodation. It was not a question of number, but an act of simple justice to put the whole of the country in the same position and to give it the option of saying whether the law for securing that all the children of the country received proper instruction at school or elsewhere should be carried out by means of school boards or by the new authorities to be established under the Bill. He demurred entirely to its being considered that the question of the numbers of boards to be affected by the Amendment affected its desirability.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he very much doubted whether there were 40 school boards in the position described.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he did not assent to that number.

MR. W. E. FORSTER was rather surprised that the Education Department had not for their own satisfaction obtained some reliable information as to the number of school boards that would be affected. If there were only a small number of school boards that would be affected by the clause it was a great change to make for the attainment of a very small purpose. The great object of the Act of 1870 was to provide sufficient school accommodation in every school district. With that object an inquiry was made throughout the kingdom, and where there was a deficient school accommodation it was the duty of the Department to issue orders for the compulsory formation of school boards. The noble Lord had stated that up to the 1st of June, 1876, 870 compulsory Orders for school boards had been issued; many more would in all probability be required—probably double that number—and in almost all these cases there had been opposition in the district to the compulsory formation of school boards. The noble Lord proposed that the school boards should be dissolved in every district where they had not done their work well. School boards were sometimes remiss; and if they were not remiss, it might happen that in certain districts influences would be set to work, and temptations would always be held out to those who disliked school boards to get up cases for inquiry year by year in order eventually to get rid of the school boards altogether. But it was the desire of the House even now—certainly it was the strong desire of 1870—where there was not sufficient school accommodation, that the district should be made to provide it, and he warned the noble Lord that he had no idea of the immense trouble he would be bringing on his Department by the passing of the Amendment. In many localities parties had been forced to establish school boards against their will, and those parties would be very glad of any opportunity by which they could have a chance of getting rid of them. It was not to the credit of the school boards that they should be reluctant to do their work. It should be further remembered that if they got rid of the school boards and further school accommodation was hereafter required, it would take three or four years before it could be accomplished. He wanted the Committee to understand that if the clause passed, a bonus would be held out to every one who disliked to have a school board in his district, to be constantly getting up fresh agitation against having a school board. This clause would apply in the enormous majority of cases to those who had been forced to have a school board, and who, in the opinion of both sides of the House, ought to have been so forced, and there would be immense administrative inconvenience in re-opening the question of school supply. He did hope that even yet the clause would not be allowed to pass.

MR. FORSYTH said, he could not understand why so much warmth had been evoked on the other side by the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). So far from the Amendment being unfavourable to the cause of education, it would, he believed, afford an immense stimulus to it. He denied altogether the idea of any insidious attack on school boards. He believed that hon. Members on his side of the House were as much disposed to advance the cause of education as hon. Members opposite, and he said with all sincerity that he had never expressed a word of hostility to school boards where they were wanted and where they were working efficiently; but when they were proved to be useless and opposed to the preponderating voice of the ratepayers, they ought not to be continued. That was all that was required, all the Amendment proposed, and he denied that in asking for it they were open to the charge of being re-actionary. On the contrary, it was strictly following up the leading principle of the Act of 1870, which recognized the opinion of the majority of the ratepayers with reference to the establishment of school boards where they were not wanted. If there was sufficient school accommodation what reason was there for continuing school boards, because at any time when there was a deficiency the powers of the Act of 1870 applied, and the Education Department could force the district to establish a school board. What possible functions could a school board have to discharge without board schools and with sufficient school accommodation for the district? He should support the Amendment.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, he wished to explain the reference which, he understood, had been made by the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council to a school on his (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen's) property where it was stated that the school board had been discontinued. He certainly could scarcely recognize the case from the manner in which it was described. What occurred was this—In the parish in which he resided, the greater part of which belonged to himself, a school was built and carried on upon the principles of the Church of England. There were two or three other considerable ratepayers in the parish not connected with his estate who declined to contribute any more to the National School. It was, therefore, proposed to have a school board, so that all might be rated alike. A school board was established, and matters went on; four Churchmen and one Nonconformist minister were elected. The Nonconformist minister, he feared, had not perfect confidence in the incumbent belonging to the Church of England, and the incumbent did not appear to have been altogether pleased with the conduct of the Nonconformist minister. Expenses were also much increased, and it was therefore unanimously agreed that the school board should be discontinued, and the school was re-transferred to the old managers, there being a clause in the original transfer to the school board which enabled them to do so. There was a British School within a quarter of a mile, so that everybody was satisfied. The difficulty then arose that the school board could not be abolished, and his noble Friend got rid of that difficulty; the members of the school board became in default for non-attendance; the Education Department appointed the new school board, who were the same persons as the old managers; and now, whilst they carried on the schools in the latter capacity, they remained a dormant school board, without expense, able to frame compulsory bye-laws if they should deem fit. Therefore, by the kind action of his noble Friend, they had everything which this clause would give them. It was a very difficult thing to carry on two educational systems side by side, but the House must remember how this had arisen. We found in 1870 a number of voluntary schools existing which had been doing the educational work which the State had not undertaken. It would have been unfair to sweep them away, and therefore board schools were only established where efficient voluntary schools did not exist. But it was a very different thing to give facilities and encouragement to those who wished to abolish board schools now that the latter had been deliberately established by Parliament. He feared that this—which would be done by the clause—would create strife and discord throughout the country, whereas the action of the Education Department, in the few cases which might arise similar to that of Smeeth, would give all that was wanted without any such danger.

VISCOUNT SANDON pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen's) illustration rather confirmed the policy of the Amendment, and expressed his obligations to him for having given it to the Committee. The House wanted this new compulsion to be carried into effect effectually. His right hon. Friend's little board, which he must remind him, he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had himself asked him shortly after he took office, to abolish, had had all the powers possessed by school boards in general of carrying compulsion into effect, but as they had not thought proper to make any bye-laws, it was an argument in favour of the scheme now proposed. The Smeeth School Board had for a long time done nothing, it had transferred its school back to the Voluntary Managers—all its members had been declared in default because they had not attended the requisite number of times. It had not passed bye-laws to provide for the regular attendance of children at school, and it was considered so useless, and had so little support in the locality, that his right hon. Friend, the leading person in that locality, had requested him to abolish it. Surely, this board, and those similar to it, were not the authorities to whom it would be wise to entrust the working of the new proposed Educational Law. He must consider the question from the point of view of the Government Bill. He wanted the Bill to work well, and under boards in the position of Smeeth he could not think that that object would be attained, and he must totally object to the treatment which the Department had been obliged to adopt to Smeeth—namely, to nominate a school board—owing to the Act of 1870 having made no provision for such cases—being considered to be at all a course which it was desirable to pursue.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that was not the fair conclusion to be drawn from the words of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), and he warned the Committee against giving its sanction to a system which would prove costly and injurious in practice, and which would go far to destroy the good results they had already obtained. He feared that if the noble Lord had trouble now, he would have exactly the same difficulty under the Bill. One of the arguments of the noble Lord was, that they would get rid of a constant cost, and also the inconvenience to the Department. But if the noble Lord would adopt the recommendation that had been made, there would be absolutely no inconvenience to the Department when the election took place. When an election was appointed it would take place, and the only trouble to the Department would be simply that of sending down an answer to the letter they would receive.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU denied that the clause would attack one of these schools, because the Education Department would have to satisfy itself. It was said that this clause would cause an agitation throughout the country; but was not that the first object of the right hon. Gentleman in proposing the establishment of school boards in 1870? The clause, however, would not apply to school boards which had built schools, or to which schools had been transferred. The second object in establishing school boards was compulsion, but it was now admitted that school boards were not wanted to carry compulsion into effect. The country had too much of compulsion under the Bill. He supported the clause because he was for the liberty of the people and local self-government, and he demanded that no Old Man of the Sea should be placed round the neck of the ratepayers in the shape of a school board. The noble Lord now proposed to cut the school boards in half. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster), in raising his voice against the proposal, reminded him of the judgment of Solomon, because he said, "Do not cut the child in two," and thereby proved that it was his own child. This clause should be supported by those who were favourable to the liberty of the people; and he called upon the Liberal Party in that House to be in favour of liberty, and to knock an odious yoke off the necks of the ratepaying community. If a locality wished to get rid of a school board, they would do so if they were unanimous, and they might attain the object by transferring the school to a denominational body.

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, it was remarkable that one line of argument had run all through the present discussion—namely, that the ratepayers had a right to decide for themselves whether they should have a school board or not; but that argument had not been carried to its proper issues. If it was the right of the majority of ratepayers in every place to decide that point, what was to become of the right of ratepayers in those districts where school boards existed, and where owing to board schools having been built, the boards must continue in spite of the majority against them? He regretted that the noble Lord at the head of the Education Department had not come down to the House after the night's reflection, and announced his intention of withdrawing the clause. If this proposal, which had correctly been described as a stab in the dark at school boards, became law, from that moment wherever a school board was unpopular with the minority, all the discontented would set to work to turn the minority into a majority for the purpose of getting rid of the objectionable school board. The effect upon the boards themselves would be most discouraging, because they had already a mass of prejudice to encounter, and their opponents would now say—"We will get rid of you before long."

MR. A. MILLS intended to give his vote in favour of the clause, but trusted his doing so would not be interpreted as a censure on his part of school boards generally. He denied that the clause was re-actionary. Progress had been made in public opinion since 1870 with respect to the working of school boards, and there was now a strong feeling that localities should exercise their own judgment as to the most suitable and efficient educational machinery. He believed the clause would greatly improve the present school boards, and he repudiated the notion that it could in any degree be regarded as a censure on those institutions. The question was simply whether ratepayers might not disencumber themselves of school boards which, having been in existence for five years, had created to themselves no schools, and had done no act in fulfilment of the purpose for which they were intended.

MR. HERSCHELL said, that the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council had said that the Amendment was a very simple one, and that it was one which had been pressed with great force upon the Education Department. If that were so, and if the clause were likely to prove of such benefit and advantage as the noble Lord predicted, why had it not formed part of the framework of the Government Bill, rather than have been first brought under the notice of the House as an Amendment of a private Member. He opposed the clause on the ground that it would prove injurious to the cause of education. A school board, if it did its duty, was sure to make enemies, and in the event of the clause being carried the result would be to keep a sword constantly hanging over the heads of school boards, which would paralyze their action and prevent them from working with their usual efficiency, from the fear of raising up enemies among those who wished to see them abolished. Many hon. Members opposite were supporting the clause on account of the religious difficulty, but he wished to point out to them that that difficulty would not be got rid of, but increased, if the control of education were transferred to the Town Councils, which were not elected, like school boards, by the cumulative vote, and in which, therefore, those religious bodies which were in a minority would probably not be represented at all.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY said, the religious difficulty was not raised by the clause, because it only applied to school boards which had no schools, and consequently the remarks just made by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Herschell) were altogether irrelevant. He had been surprised to hear so much wild and incoherent talk from the other side on the previous night as to the clause being dangerous and re-actionary. The amount of temper then displayed could only be excused by the lateness of the hour. He considered that the clause did not touch the principle of the Act of 1870 in the smallest degree. This clause did not affect the educational functions of school boards, because those which it affected had no educational functions, but merely functions of police. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had charged hon. Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side with stimulating hostility to school boards by the course they were now pursuing. But what had the right hon. Gentleman been doing all his life but stimulating hostility to something or other? The right hon. Gentleman had said that the unpopularity of school boards was greatly exaggerated; but if he wanted to understand the feeling with which these school boards were regarded, he had only to turn to the Reports of the Inspectors. There was a catena of evidence in those Reports as to the odium which attached to school boards. Thus they were described in different passages as being "viewed with widespread dislike;" as "held in extreme dislike;" as "dreaded;" as "neglecting their opportunities;" as "doing worse than nothing;" as "injuring other schools by taking less fees;" as "soon sinking into inefficiency;" as "becoming careless in their work;" and as "soon dwindling into perfunctoriness;" and being the subject of a "general feeling of aversion as a terrible infliction." There were many other expressions to the same effect. If the right hon. Gentleman would read the Blue Books on this subject, he would not again state that unpopularity of these school-boards had been exaggerated. The fact was, that there was no institution in the country which was so unpopular, and he thought hon. Gentlemen opposite were giving themselves a great deal of unnecessary trouble in opposing such a gentle, mild, and salutary clause as that which had been proposed by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) had just been accused of introducing into the country an element of confusion and perturbation by the establishment of school boards. A certain amount of confusion and perturbation, however, was the necessary consequence of representative government, though the object of Parliament should be to reduce that inconvenience to a minimum. His hon. Friend had endeavoured to do that by proposing that school boards should be liable to be dissolved, which, however, would only add to whatever excitement and confusion now existed. The effect of the Amendment would further be to throw back that steady progress in educational matters which ever since the Act of 1870 had been going on. He demurred to the argument that because some of those school boards had as yet done nothing they would not in the future have anything to do. The fact was that many of those institutions struck at some of the most cherished prejudices of hon. Members opposite, for they provided undenominational education in the rural districts, and popular representation in the question of education, and that explained the cheers with which speeches declaring these boards to be unpopular were received. He urged that even if some school boards were doing nothing now, they might do something in a year or two. Municipal bodies were not liable to be dissolved at the request of the electors, nor could boroughs get rid of Parliamentary representation. Once they could, and there was a story at Newbury, that when Henry VIII. had been right royally entertained by the celebrated Jack of Newbury he asked what he would do for the town. To which Jack of Newbury replied—"Relieve us of the odious privilege of having to elect two Members to serve in your Parliament at Westminster." And the King granted the request. The noble Lord the Vice President would be recollected as the 19th Century Jack of Newbury. There was something to him very offensive in the way in which hon. Members opposite took religion under their patronage. Religion had existed before they were heard of, and would exist when they were forgotten; and to identify the Nonconformist party, the party of which an open Bible was the watchword, which had laboured and suffered for its sake, with secularism, was as absurd as it was unjust.

MR. GREENE said, he could not understand what had raised all this opposition to the Amendment of his hon. Friend. He was as anxious for the reading of the Bible as the Nonconformists. What he complained of was, that the money of the State was paid to a board which had power to exclude the reading of the Bible, and he would endeavour as far as lay in his power to remove that blot from the Education Act. Power was given to continue school boards, but none to dissolve them; and if the country objected to a system of that kind, although it had been established by a large majority in the last Parliament, he considered that Parliament was bound to undo the most objectionable parts of that system. A great deal of fuss had been made about re-actionary measures; but there was no re-action in the case. It was merely the recognition of the right of the majority. When he sat in that House in 1870, he had many measures poured down his throat which were most distasteful to him. The Irish Church was disestablished, and a third of her land was taken from her; the Army was destroyed, not by Act of Parliament, but by an arbitrary exercise of the Royal Prerogative. For his part, if he had the power, he would undo the work which was then done.

MR. HAYTER resisted the clause, because it would enable Town Councils, by a majority of 1, to abolish school boards. In his opinion, the effect of the Amendment would be, by means of a side-wind, to get rid of the principle of the Act of 1870. His contention was, that if school boards were to be abolished, they ought to be abolished in a straightforward way, and not by such a hole-and-corner fashion as was proposed.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON, on the contrary, said, he did not oppose school boards generally, but he contended that, where a school board had lost the confidence of the local ratepayers, or had become useless and unnecessary, it ought not to be maintained. The people of a district were the best possible judges of whether a school board was or was not performing its functions properly and to the benefit of those who had established it. Should those people feel that it was useless to maintain a board, it would clearly be wrong to force one upon them unwillingly. A board, like a crutch, ought to be thrown away when it could be dispensed with, and not saddled for ever on reluctant parishes which preferred to rely on voluntaryism. All success achieved under the Act of 1870 had been gained by consulting the wishes and feelings of local populations, and now the Opposition said they were to be disregarded.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT contended that an extraordinary change had come both over the Bill itself since its first introduction, and the temper of the House in discussing its provisions. When it was introduced there was little reason to complain of it, for it was thought to be merely an amplification of the principles of the Act of 1870, and as such was gratefully accepted on that, his own, side of the House. But the acceptance of the Amendment under discussion by the Government had entirely altered the character of the Bill. At the eleventh hour the Government had changed their whole policy, and had hoisted the standard of re-action. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen might deny the assertion, but the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's (Mr. Greene), who was one of the honestest men in the House, had let the feline animal out of the bag. Judging from what that hon. Gentleman had said, he (Sir William Harcourt) would be inclined to say that there never had been such a flag, or rather oriflamme, raised as the one hoisted by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's. He had told them quite frankly that he objected to the Act of 1870. He also told them that he objected to school boards altogether, and was prepared to destroy them and undo what he termed the mischief of the past Government. Well, that showed that the Government were only beginning their progress on the road of re-action. If the noble Lord approved of the Amendment, why had he not introduced it himself as a new clause, instead of accepting it at the hands of a private Member? The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's had been rather too outspoken. He had told them that a good many measures which he did not like, such as the Irish Church and Land Bills, he had been compelled to accept at the hands of a dominant majority, and that now the Tory Party in their turn had got a large majority they intended to use it. Well, if the Conservatives were about to make a reactionary battle-cry of education, they must expect that their Bill would be received in a very different spirit from what it was at the commencement. The policy which the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's had announced was a very serious policy. If one Party as soon as it obtained a majority were to set itself to overturn the acts of its Predecessor, a Continental state of things would be infused into English politics which it was very desirable to avoid. By so doing they would embark on a policy of reversal and re-action, and enter upon a course of proceeding of which there was no telling where it would end. His hon. Friend was a young and hale man, and his life might be protracted until there was again a Liberal majority, but when that time did arrive did he think that the cause he had at heart would be benefited by the establishment of a principle that he had been contending for that evening? The principles he had laid down were carried out on the Continent; the consequence was that no political parties were ready to accept the principles of compromise. When they found the noble Lord declaring open war, and acting up to, if not declaring openly, the principles of the Amendment, when he was accepting alterations in his Bill which would overthrow the Act of 1870, they were entering upon a war at which two could play, of which the beginning was obvious, but of which no man could see the end—a war of which the battle-field was the education of the people. Did they think that because the Government might obtain a majority that evening that it would be accepted, or that, after their defeat, they would rest one single moment until they had restored the principles which the Government would have withdrawn, or that they would desist for a single moment to repel that injustice which was sought to be thrust upon them. What was the meaning of the Amendment? The denominational schools found themselves beaten day by day in open competition with school boards, and therefore their supporters cried out to strangle school boards. The noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon) was not strong enough to resist the cry from those behind him; but, of course, the matter had to be done decently, if possible, and the first step was the Amendment of the previous day. The Government was too wise, too cautious, to propose open and avowed war on the school boards; but the party of re-action behind them wanted to bowstring the school boards at once, as was proposed in the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire. It was because of the pressure from those who sat around the noble Lord that he had thought it necessary to depart from the policy which the Government originally undertook, and to consent in an evil hour to make this war upon the policy adopted in 1870. The noble Lord, in consenting to the Amendment, had given his sanction to an attempt to destroy board schools throughout the country, and he had thereby landed the discussion of the Bill in a spirit and temper altogether different from that in which it had hitherto been conducted. [Viscount SANDON: Hear, hear!] The noble Lord said "Hear, hear;" but did he think that the Government could introduce a Bill with an avowed object, and then change it, and not change the spirit in which that Bill was being discussed? They should be utterly unworthy of the position which they held as an Opposition if they did not enter a protest against not only the substance of that policy, but also the manner in which it had been conducted.

VISCOUNT SANDON thought it was high time they should take rather a cooler view of things. He had observed that his hon. and learned Friend always came forward when there was a forlorn hope to lead, to throw in the charm of his somewhat imaginative eloquence, heated and warm as it always was, to rally the troops that were beginning to fall away. He (Viscount Sandon) had had the misfortune of sitting there for seven days, during which time he had not had the pleasure of hearing his hon. and learned Friend's voice once upon the Bill, and that fact rather accounted for the extraordinary misapprehension which he had shown as to its whole scope. If his hon. and learned Friend had been present 36 hours ago he would have heard the high testimony borne to the Bill in its great and main features by hon. Gentlemen of the greatest experience in educational matters on his own (the Opposition) side of the House. He would not then have rashly condemned the whole of the Government measure. For his own part, he (Viscount Sandon) was a little disappointed to find such warmth suddenly arise, because he had invited from hon. Members opposite that calm judgment on the Bill which was accorded to the measure of 1870; although it was notorious that it offended the feelings and opinions of many hon. Members belonging to the Conservative ranks who were then in Opposition. Up to that time, though the Bill had received the formal opposition of some hon. Members on two set occasions, and had passed the ordeal of two leading divisions on the Motions of the hon. Members for Sheffield and Merthyr, it had received very large support from the House generally, and, on the whole, a marvellous harmony had been maintained; but he supposed this state of things had been felt to be unnatural, and hon. Gentlemen opposite had said—"We must have a little excitement before the Bill passes." But it was really worth while to consider whether the clause was of such a portentous character as had been represented. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had argued that only half-a-dozen schools could be affected by it, and though he (Viscount Sandon) did not give his assent to this view, still no one supposed the number of boards to be affected by it would be really large, and if the influence of the Amendment was thus allowed by his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) to be reduced to such a small point, surely an immense amount of indignation had been wasted. The assertions of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford showed that he had not attended much to the subject. He talked of the voluntary schools rapidly decreasing, and of the necessity of bolstering them up, when, as a matter of fact, they had largely increased. Then he said they were going to strangle board schools—[Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, no!]; but he seemed to be unaware of the fact that the abolition of the reduction on the 17s. 6d. grant applied equally to board and to voluntary schools, and that it would relieve the rates in many places which were already complaining bitterly of their pressure under the school board system, and demanding that the State should, in accordance with the hopes held out by the former Prime Minister (Mr. Gladstone), give a larger proportion of aid in consideration of its higher requirements from the schools. It would give a fresh life to board and voluntary schools alike, and set them free in the race to bring the children forward as much as possible, so as to earn to the schools as large a grant as they could under the Code without fear of the present discouraging deductions. In proof of what he said he must remind his hon. and learned Friend that the most important School Board in the country—the School Board of London—had specially urged the exemption as desirable for the promotion of education. His hon. and learned Friend also said the Amendment desired to make voluntary schools purely denominational.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that what he did say was that under the operation of the Amendment such would be the tendency.

VISCOUNT SANDON: Yes; that they should destroy the voluntary character of the schools, and make them purely and simply denominational. Was the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that a considerable number of the Nonconformist schools were supported by fees and by the Imperial grant only, and did he not call them voluntary schools? He was taunted with having accepted the Amendment from his own side without giving previous Notice that the Government intended to take that course; but he received no taunts when he accepted without Notice important Amendments from the noble Lord the Member for the West Riding, and from the hon. Member for Newark. He remembered that in 1870 very considerable Amendments were accepted by the Government of the day from their own supporters, which altered the character of that Bill more seriously than the present measure could be affected by this comparatively trifling alteration as to unnecessary school boards; and he must remind his hon. and learned Friend that when, on going into Committee, he announced various leading Amendments which the Government proposed to bring forward, principally in the early clauses of the Bill, he stated distinctly that the Government must be held quite free to introduce any other Amendments, as well as to accept any Amendments from either side, and the Committee would remember that this particular statement was received with assenting cheers, specially from the Opposition benches, in a full House. The right hon. Member for Bradford, who spoke of the proposal as a great blow to school boards, seemed to forget that the Education Department, the moment a deficiency was proved, could and must, if the deficiency was not duly met, order a board to be formed just as much under the new system of this Bill as under the old system of the Act of 1870. And the districts which the Education Department forced to have school boards, just as much as every other part of the country, would be obliged to carry out fully the Act of 1870, as well as the provisions of this Bill, if it became law. He could not therefore see the bearing of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. On the contrary, he thought it was quite possible that the Amendment would tend to promote rather than to discourage school boards, for this reason. At the present moment many localities would not dream of putting their heads in the noose of a school board, because they knew it was an indissoluble tie, whereas if it was felt that it was a mere temporary connection, it was not impossible that a great number of places would be willing to try the experiment. He was unable to discover any further arguments in the speech of his right hon. Friend, who, he hoped, would on further consideration be led to support the proposal on account of the strong educational advantages which he had mentioned. The hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell) was mistaken in supposing that the new authorities would have educational duties. As a proof that the Government felt no hostility to school boards, he must remind the Committee that they had strenuously resisted the proposals of the noble Lord the Member for Bury St. Edmund's (Lord Francis Hervey) and the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Hamond), when they offered Amendments which would prevent a locality from having a school board, unless there was a deficiency of school accommodation, because their schemes were opposed to the principles of the Bill, which was perfect freedom to the country to adopt whichever scheme it liked best, whether that of a school board, or of using the existing authorities as provided by this Bill. The course, he repeated, of the Government showed no hostility to school boards; but, when the proposal was once brought forward, it must be felt that it could not be resisted, as, if they considered the Bill, it certainly followed logically that the country should have perfect freedom to get rid of school boards where they were unnecessary. He was quite sure that the change would be held, on calmer consideration, by hon. Gentlemen opposite, to be a trifling one, entirely consistent with the spirit of the Bill. If he was asked again why the Government supported it, he had simply to say that when they looked at the Amendment they were unable to find any valid arguments which they could assert against it. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee, after that full discussion, would consent to put this matter to the test.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, the noble Lord had omitted to reply to some observations of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter) with regard to the operation of the clause upon Town Councils, which was an important one.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, it was obvious that the same authority which had the power of asking for a school board must have the power of asking to get rid of it. In that respect the clause would follow the lines of the Act of 1870, and upon those lines the Government meant to take their stand.

MR. A. BROWN said, it was clear from the noble Lord's answer that Town Councils would be able by a bare majority to petition the School Department to dissolve school boards. Was the noble Lord prepared to abolish the school boards of Manchester, Stockport, and other places? ["No, no!"] Hon. Members said "No, no," but abolition was the logical conclusion of his hon. Friend's Amendment. That Amendment placed in the hands of municipalities a power which would be extremely dangerous. If a proposal were made to abolish Town Councils, or Boards of Guardians, or Highway Boards, it would be scouted by hon. Members on both sides of the House. What had been done by school boards having no schools? According to Returns laid upon the Table of the House, 510 of them, out of 541, had appointed attendance officers and visitors, and were enforcing the principle of compulsion laid down by the Act of 1870. He therefore hoped that they would not be interfered with or disturbed in the good in which they were engaged, and that the noble Lord would pause before he accepted the Amendment. They were all grateful for the courtesy and kindness shown by the noble Lord when he introduced the Bill, but now he said that he would accept an Amendment which they must regard with extreme hostility.

SIR HENRY JACKSON remarked that hon. Members on his side did not seem to have even yet succeeded in making the noble Lord understand the ground upon which they so strongly objected to the Amendment. The noble Lord seemed to treat it as a mere matter of administrative detail, and called it a small affair, whereas the Opposition considered that a most important principle was involved. That principle was the continuation or the abolition of school boards. The noble Lord disclaimed all intention of attacking school boards, but he put it to the noble Lord, did he seriously think that the effect of the Bill would be to encourage them? On that side of the House they felt that the very opposite would be the result. The adoption of the clause would be a departure, not only from the principle of the Bill, but also a departure from the representations made to the House on the second reading. Did the noble Lord think that he would have had the majority that he did had it been known that there was to be a direct attack upon school boards? If the noble Lord did not actually provide for the extinction of school boards by the action of the Department, he at least provided the means of self-extinction known in Eastern countries as the "happy despatch." It was stated by hon. Gentlemen opposite that the clause would apply only to school boards which had no schools and no property, and the noble Lord asserted that he had much sympathy with school boards which had done their work well and were efficient. But was the division of school boards into those which were efficient and those which had property an exhaustive division? What about such school boards as those of Burnley and Stockport, which had no schools? He feared it was an attempt to reverse the policy of the Act of 1870. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side had not yet forgotten the metaphors used by the noble Lord in introducing his first Endowed Schools Bill, when he spoke of leading on the forces of the Establishment against the entrenchments of the enemy, by which term he referred to Nonconformists. That language of the noble Lord had united as one man what was then a divided minority, and in that contest they were victorious all along the line. He would now tell the noble Lord that, by every constitutional means, they were determined to oppose the passing of the clause. He hoped that the Government would all remember the lesson of their Endowed Schools Bill. Possibly the Prime Minister might repent himself on this occasion and be induced to read the proposed Amendment. If he were to do so, and to find now as he did then that it was perfectly unintelligible, he would materially expedite the passing of the Bill. But the noble Lord had himself found that there was no necessity for the clause, and that all that it could effect might be done by resorting to the simplest legal fiction, so that surely he might persuade the hon. Member for South Leicestershire to allow this bone of contention to be taken away, by which means, he believed, that business would be greatly facilitated, and that a soreness would be removed from the minds of many which was quite incommensurate with any advantage which hon. Members opposite could expect to gain from the passing of the clause.

MR. ANDERSON said, the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) had pointed out the contrast between the somewhat animated aspect of the debate at present and the happy calm which pervaded the House only 24 or 36 hours ago; but he must remind the noble Lord that, in the words of a very high authority, "a great deal had happened since then." Since then the Government had shown the cloven foot, for since then the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire had been proposed and had been accepted by the Government; since then, to adopt the metaphor of the noble Lord, the Government expressed their willingness to scout the honourable and permanent matrimony of the school board and prefer a questionable temporary connection. He congratulated the noble Lord on the appositeness of his metaphor, but still more he must congratulate hon. Members opposite on the excellent speech of the hon. Member for

Bury St. Edmund's (Mr. Greene). There had been a frank honesty in the policy expressed in that speech which was quite refreshing, accustomed as they were to the reticence of Conservative Members generally, and it had therefore won those approving cheers from the Liberal Benches which seemed to delight the hon. Member. He (Mr. Anderson) had himself for a couple of years been doing his best in a humble way to show the country that the policy of the Conservative Party was always retrograde; that they were always ready to go backward when they could, and as far as they dared; but his utterances had been weak indeed compared with the bold avowal of the hon. Member. The House knew the honesty of the hon. Member, and that when he denounced all that the last Parliament had done and declared he wanted to undo it, that really was what the hon. Member and his Friends meant; and it was well that the country should know it, for he was very sure it was not for that purpose the country had sent a Conservative majority to occupy those Benches. He only wished to say a few words to the Committee regarding this Amendment, from a Scotch point of view. He wanted to know if the noble Lord succeeded in carrying the Amendment would he venture to introduce a similar measure for Scotland? As the House was aware, in Scotland they had universal school boards. He was not prepared to say that, in all cases, those had worked to the entire satisfaction of the people. In some cases they had not; in some cases they had been unnecessarily hasty in building expensive schools and spending too much money; but even that error was only excess of zeal in a right direction, and though many ratepayers might complain, he did not think there was a parish in Scotland that would not reject with contempt any proposal to disband themselves. And why should it be different in England? He would be apt to think it was not creditable to the intelligence of Englishmen, if he did not know that there was a strong sectarian element underlying the proposal, which accounted for the anxiety of hon. Members opposite to adopt this retrograde measure. The House fully believed in the honest intentions of the noble Lord, but if the Amendment contained a point which he deemed of real importance, why was it not in the Bill?

Why did it appear now as a new discovery? Why was the 13th clause postponed to the very end without a word about their intention of so changing it? The country would be very apt to think that this blow at school boards was the real principle and raison d'être of the Bill; that all they had previously done so complacently was only introductory to this Amendment. They would conclude that it was kept out of the Bill lest it should unduly alarm their sensibilities and rouse a general opposition. Hon. Members opposite said it was only an attempt to give effect to the popular voice as expressed by majorities. He had been much amused at the sudden appreciation of the popular vote thus shown by hon. Members opposite. It was a tenderness quite new to Conservative opinion. He would like to know how far they were willing to go in that direction. If a narrow majority wanted to abolish a municipality as well as a school board, would they be equally willing, or would they consent to a Parliamentary burgh voting its extinction, or when his friends of the Home Rule party pointed to the large majority across the Channel in favour of a Home Rule Parliament, would they equally defer to those majorities? They knew they would not; they knew they supported this particular retrograde measure only because it seemed to suit their Party views, and now that it had been made apparent that the Bill was intended as a thoroughly retrograde measure, the Opposition were bound to resist it by every constitutional means, and to that end he was willing to give his assistance.

MR. D. DAVIES opposed the clause. He believed it would have a most injurious influence throughout the country. It went entirely to condemn the Act of 1870. He was not so much afraid of the disestablishment of school boards as of the mischief that would be done to education. If the clause succeeded, it would be said by a certain section of the working classes—"We thought you were wrong at the time you passed the Act establishing school boards, and now you see Parliament is of the same opinion too." He was of opinion, further, that there had been something like indecent hurry in this matter. The Government should have waited till they had gained some experience as to how school boards under Town Councils and Boards of Leicestershire would have led the right hon. Gentleman to the conclusion—whatever his own private opinion or the private opinion of his Friends might be—that it was not worth while to encumber the passage of the Bill by accepting this clause. He doubted whether, among his numerous avocations, the right hon. Gentleman had had time to make himself master of the clause. A day had been unfortunately and unnecessarily wasted in this discussion. It had, however, been wasted, not by the discussion of the clause, but in consequence of the adoption of the clause by the Government. If the clause had not been adopted by the Government he believed the Committee on the Bill might have been concluded that day. But although the day had been wasted, he did not think it was too late, even now, to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it were absolutely necessary to force the clause against what he must feel was the unanimous opinion of that side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman could not believe that the clause was essential to the Bill which the Government had introduced, for if it had been essential it would have been proposed by the Government. The Government had had an opportunity of considering the question for a long time, and they had deliberately introduced a well-prepared and well-considered measure which did not contain this proposition. Again, as the hon. Member who proposed the clause had informed the Committee that day, the proposal had been on the Paper for a considerable time, and consequently the Government had had ample opportunity of considering it. It was not included, however, in those important Amendments in regard to which the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council made a statement the other day. For those two reasons, he thought he was justified in coming to the conclusion that the Government could not deem it to be a matter of such vital importance as to consider it necessary at all hazards to insist upon introducing it. After the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman last night it was impossible that he could regard the expenditure of two or three days at this period of the Session as a matter of no concern. The convenience of the House and the prospect of many of the measures

Government becoming law must be involved in the decision of the Government on this point. He trusted that before the discussion was resumed, the right hon. Gentleman would carefully consider whether it were necessary to force on the divided opinion of the House a proposition which the Government did not think it necessary to introduce, and which, if the right hon. Gentleman had been present last night, he would have heard supported by the Vice President of the Council in a hesitating manner and really as a matter of small and trifling importance.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

THE TURKISH DEBT—THE LOAN OF 1854.—RESOLUTION.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which the Turkish Loan of 1854 was subscribed for; and to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will direct that a communication may be made to the President of the French Republic in order to ascertain whether the French Government will unite with the Government of Her Majesty in pressing upon the Government of Turkey the complete fulfilment of the conditions upon which the Turkish Loan of 1854 was subscribed for,” the circumstances involved in is Motion occurred upwards of 20 years ago. It was perfectly well known how great was the anxiety that prevailed in his country at the time as to what was called then, as now, the "Eastern Question," although it was at this moment presented to them in a different form. Twenty years ago it was not a contest between Turkey and any of her provinces, but a struggle between Turkey and Russia as to whether the latter should have any such domination over the internal government of Turkey as might lead to the dismemberment of the country, and the substitution of the rule of Russia for that of Turkey over, at any rate, some of her provinces. That anxiety continued for a considerable part of 1853, whilst negotiations were going on at Constantinople; and it was in the summer of July, 1853, that the first act of hostility was committed by the crossing of Russian troops into, and the occupation of, Turkish territory. That was spoken of as not being intended as an act of war, but simply in order to obtain material guarantees for the claim made by Russia against Turkey. Turkey, however, protested against that act of aggression, and having protested in vain, war was declared in October, 1854, and from that time hostilities proceeded. During this time negotiations were continued between the European Powers, great attempts being made to put an end to hostilities. These negotiations, however, failed, and in the spring of 1854 it became clear that war-like measures were about to be taken. A Convention was then framed by which England and France undertook to afford support to Turkey, and in April war was declared against Russia. The resistance which had previously been offered to the Russian troops after they had crossed the Pruth was one for which the European Powers were scarcely prepared in the face of such overwhelming odds, especially when it was remembered that Turkey at the time experienced one want—the want of money to supply her soldiers with arms, she being at the time amply supplied with men. It was not to be expected that any nation engaged in a war of that description should be able to provide the funds for carrying it on out of the ordinary revenues of the year, and France herself had to raise a loan of £10,000,000. Turkey attempted to raise a loan of £6,000,000, and the matter was placed in the hands of the Messrs. Rothschild, a house which very seldom failed in carrying such transactions to a successful issue. Something, however, was rumoured of a loan which Turkey had endeavoured to raise before, and of a supposed repudiation on her part, and it became impossible to obtain the money which she wanted in the English market, and the proposal for a loan in the instance of which he was speaking was withdrawn by the Messrs. Rothschild. Still it was felt to be absolutely necessary that money should be obtained, and negotiations on the subject went on, though what was the exact form of those negotiations he had not been able to ascertain from the Papers which had been laid before the House. The results, however, were perfectly clear, for shortly afterwards it was announced that a Turkish Loan had been placed in the English and French markets, and which was so placed under what could not be otherwise described as the "auspices" of England and France. It appeared, too, from the prospectus which had been issued in connection with it, that it was not only charged on the general revenue of Turkey, but was specially secured, principal and interest, by the assignment of 30,000,000 piastres (£282,000 sterling), tribute payable by the Pasha of Egypt to His Majesty the Sultan, by virtue of the Treaty of 1841, contracted under the sanction of the great Powers of Europe. "This tribute," it was added, "is to be remitted half-yearly direct from the Pasha in Egypt to the Agents in London." Then came the following paragraph:—

"The undersigned have the satisfaction to acquaint the public that they are authorized by the Earl of Clarendon, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to state that this Loan is negotiated with the knowledge of the English Government; that Her Majesty's Government is satisfied that the Loan and the appropriation of the above-mentioned 30,000,000 piastres (£282,000 sterling) per annum of the Egyptian Tribute are duly authorized by His Majesty the Sultan; and further, that the representatives of the Sublime Porte at Paris and London are empowered by virtue of the Imperial Firmans, to ratify the contract for the Loan in the name of His Majesty the Sultan, and Lord Clarendon relies with confidence upon the Turkish Government fulfilling with good faith the engagements they have entered into. The undersigned are assured that a similar declaration will be made by M. Drouyn de L'huy, " the French Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

“J. HORSLEY PALMER.

“London, Aug. 16.”

There was also a letter signed by Lord Clarendon, which was as follows:—

“Messrs. Black and Durand are duly authorized by the Sublime Porte to negotiate a loan of £5,000,000 sterling, all expenses included, and to offer as a special guarantee 30,000,000 piastres of the annual tribute of Egypt. The representatives of the Sublime Porte at London and Paris are authorized, in virtue of Imperial Firmans, to ratify the contract of the Loan in the name of the Sultan. The contract between Messrs. Black and Durand and Messrs. Goldsmid and Palmer has been concluded with the knowledge of Lord Clarendon, who has confidence in the good faith with which the Turkish Government will fulfil the engagements they have entered into.

“Foreign Office, Aug. 15, 1854.”

That appeared from the bond and firman deposited in the Bank of England and the Bank of Paris. A letter also was published precisely in the same words, signed by M. Drouyn de L’huys, the Foreign Minister of France. It was important to see what the engagements were, the fulfilment of which was thus vouched for by the Foreign Ministers of England and France. They stated—

“On the security of the mortgage of the tribute which the Sultan had reserved out of the revenues of Egypt, in re-appointing, in 1841, Mehemet Ali Pasha of that province, and rendering its Pashalic hereditary in his family, and on the encouragement given to the Loan by the allied Governments, the money sought by the Sultan was furnished by English subscribers, and the Loan constituted part of the history of the war. Subjoined to and made part of the prospectus was the following notification:— ‘The undersigned have the satisfaction to inform the public that they are authorized by the Earl of Clarendon, Her Majesty’s Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to state that this Loan is negotiated with the knowledge of the English Government; that Her Majesty’s Government is satisfied that the Loan and the appropriation of the above-mentioned 30,000,000 piastres (£282,000 sterling) are duly authorized by the Sultan; and further, that the representatives of the Sublime Porte at Paris and London are empowered by virtue of the Imperial Firmans to ratify the contract for the Loan in the name of His Majesty the Sultan; and Lord Clarendon relies with confidence upon the Turkish Government fulfilling with good faith the engagements they entered into. The undersigned are assured that a similar declaration will be made by M. Drouyn de L’huys, the French Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Isaac L. Goldsmid, and J. Horsley Palmer.— London. 16th August.’ As usual in loans, a general bond, dated August 24th, 1854, was deposited in the Bank of England. This general bond contained the following irrevocable pledge:—‘Be it therefore known that the undersigned, deeming it most for the interest and advantage of His Imperial Majesty’s Government to raise the said Loan on the terms and conditions hereinafter contained, do, in pursuance of the powers and authorities vested in them for that purpose, hereby bind and oblige the Government of His Imperial Majesty and the revenues of the Ottoman Empire and Government to the payment of the said Loan, principal and interest, as hereafter stipulated, and in particular do specially and irrevocably charge forthwith as the additional guarantee 30,000,000 of piastres or £282,000, part of the tribute payable to His Imperial Majesty by His Highness the Pacha of Egypt, and in order that the said 30,000,000 of piastres, or £282,000 sterling, may be more effectually and irrevocably pledged and appropriated to the payment of the interest and redemption of the said Loan, the undersigned engage that the necessary Firmans and authorities shall be issued without delay for the due and punctual remittance to the Bank of England or the Bank of France, so that the same may be at the disposal of the Agents of the Loan for that purpose.’ This general bond bore the signatures of J. N. Black; the Ambassador of the Sublime Porte at Paris, Vely; P. Durand; the Minister of the Sublime Porte in London, C. Musurus.”

From that it appeared that this sum of £282,000 was to be perpetually charged with the interest upon the Loan, and that one-half of the interest was to be paid on the 10th of April and the other on the 10th of October in each year. And then followed a rather curious provision, which might be a small matter, but what appeared to him not unimportant, as showing how complete was the concert between the three Governments, for in October, 1854, the Sultan issued a solemn decree in which he stated—

“That the suitable partition of this sum of sixty thousand purses between the two Banks shall be discussed and settled on the spot between the two Allied Governments and my Imperial Ambassadors in London and Paris.”

He could not conceive anything showing more plainly that it was under an arrangement between Turkey, England, and France that this money was to be obtained in the English market. The money was at once obtained; but had it been merely on the assurance of Turkey that these engagements were proposed, the Loan would have fallen as flat as the Loan of Baron Rothschild had fallen a few months before. It was subscribed for because the name of Lord Clarendon was security for England, and that of M. Drouyn de L’huys for France, and all parties looked to the engagement being fulfilled on that account. He must, however, go a little further on in the financial history of this matter, and look at what occurred in the following year. The money, obtained as he had described, was employed in all that was necessary for the carrying on of the war. Lord Palmerston declared that great as were the efforts of England and France, it was in vain that these efforts should be made unless they were seconded by the efficient support of the country most materially interested. His declaration showed how strong were the feelings which the Ministers entertained of the importance of the money being obtained in order that the Turkish Army might be brought into an efficient state. Still the war continued, and it was necessary in the following year that more money should be raised. The money was raised in this way. It was very much discussed in the House of Commons, and Lord Clarendon distinctly stated what was the security on which the money was advanced, in order to show how perfectly safe the English and French Governments were in joining in that decree. The first security was this—The tribute money at that time was £282,000, and all that was required for the Loan of 1854 was £210,000, leaving £70,000 surplus still open to any lien that might be laid upon it. Accordingly, the first security offered for the Loan of 1855 was this £70,000. For the remainder they looked to other revenues of Turkey, which would more than pay the interest and provide a sinking fund. From that time the payments had continued to be made every half-year in April and in October upon the order of the Turkish Ambassador upon the Bank of England and the Bank of France. For 20 years this went on, without a question being raised, and the pledges of Turkey were fulfilled. But now came a time when a difficulty first arose. In the Autumn of last year the Turkish Government came to the conclusion—and it was a correct one—that they could not pay the whole of the interest upon the various loans and the immense floating debt which existed, and it was proposed at once to reduce the interest one-half, the rest to remain for five years upon the security of certain stock. This was

^{and} to apply to the whole of the debt unsecured, for which no revenue was pledged, and for which 18 or 20 per cent had been asked and given on account of there being no security. It was supposed that the pledge with regard to the Egyptian tribute was irrevocable. For the first time, however, a few days before the 10th March, application was made to the Turkish Ambassador in the usual way for an order upon the money pledged to the bondholders, and which was lying in the Bank of England. The Ambassador refused, unless they would agree to take the half offered to the other creditors and which they had been obliged to take. It was thus proposed that a very large sum—about £100,000—of the surplus should be left at the disposal of the Turkish Government. For what purpose? In order that the Guaranteed Loan might be paid in full out of the very money pledged to the bondholders of 1854. It was utterly impossible for the Government to take a single sixpence of the stolen money—it would be stolen money and nothing else; and it could not be supposed that an English Chancellor of the Exchequer would countenance it; indeed, it was an insult to the Government to suppose that they would be in any way parties to the reception of money under those terms. It might be asked what was the course he thought the Government ought to take. Application had been made to the Foreign Minister for assistance, and while he expressed considerable sympathy for the bondholders, he declared that anything he could do must be done, not in his official, but in his unofficial character. That was making a distinction which ought not to be made. The pledges were made not by Lord Clarendon, but by the Foreign Minister, together with the English and French Governments; they were not unofficial, but official, and he could not understand on what conceivable ground it could be said that the support to be given must be unofficial, when all that had been done by the Government previously was in their official capacity. They had been referred to the South American loans. But this case was different, and it could not be said of this as it might of some Spanish or South American debt, you must take your chance upon the credit of the country you deal with. At the request of Turkey, the Foreign Ministers of England and France had given these pledges and had stated their confidence in the good faith of the Ottoman Government to fulfil the various pledges contained in the firman. Our Government had a right therefore to call on the Turkish Government, at any rate to make good the pledges that that Government had asked them to give. But for this money the Turkish Army would have been an unarmed multitude, but being thus supplied with the sinews of war their forces were enabled to offer a stout resistance to the enemy. It was therefore for the interests of England and France to give this guarantee, but apart from that we had a right to call upon Turkey to observe her promises. He did not ask Her Majesty's Government to send the Fleet to Besika Bay; but he thought that Sir Henry Elliot, as the Ambassador of Great Britain at the Porte, might very well be instructed to remind the Turkish Government of the assistance they had received from Great Britain and France, and to call upon them to fulfil their pledges. Without anything like a declaration of war, a moral support might be given by our Ambassador to the claims of the bondholders. He was sure the present Government would not repudiate the action of their Predecessors, and so he would not say a word as to their responsibility in the matter. One word he wished to say on the form of the Motion with which he intended to conclude. He might state that his original intention was to pray Her Majesty to direct Her Ambassador at the Porte to use his just influence in order to secure the fulfilment of the conditions on which the Loan was raised; but it had been suggested to him, very properly, that it would scarcely be respectful to France for England to take action alone, and therefore he had adopted the form of words which appeared on the Paper. He had said nothing of the miseries inflicted upon those who, trusting to the declaration of our Foreign Minister, had advanced their money to the Turkish Government. He felt strongly upon the matter, but there was one thing which, as a Member of the House of Commons, he felt more strongly, and that was regard for the national honour and deep regret that any British subject should be suffering the calamities now experienced by the subscribers to the Loan of 1854, in consequence of the faith they had placed in the declaration of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will direct that a communication may be made to the President of the French Republic, in order to ascertain whether the French Government will unite with the Government of Her Majesty in pressing upon the Government of Turkey the complete fulfilment of the conditions upon which the Turkish Loan of 1854 was subscribed for,"—
(Mr. Russell Gurney,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. FRESHFIELD, in supporting the Resolution, said, he coincided in the reasons assigned by his right hon. and learned Friend for bringing forward the Motion. His right hon. and learned Friend had conclusively shown that the Loan of 1854 was raised on principles less speculative and less sordid than was usual in such cases; that, in fact, patriotism had something to do with it. The Loan of 1854 was a loan raised upon a special security at a time when Turkey was not in debt; it was made with the knowledge and sanction of two European Governments, in the interests of Europe, not less than of Turkey, and it was perfectly successful, the security being the annual tribute of Egypt, which amounted to £282,000. But that was not all; for the Government, following up and endorsing the policy of 1854, sanctioned a second loan on the security of the Egyptian tribute, or rather of the £70,000 of it which remained unmortgaged. There could be no doubt that the Government were well acquainted with all the circumstances of those loans, and he thought it was clear that the bondholders had a right to appeal to Her Majesty's Government to use their best efforts to secure the due payment of the interest that was promised. The security was still in existence—namely, £210,000 of the Egyptian tribute, which was set apart for the payment of 4 per cent interest. Up to the last two years that interest had been duly paid by the remission of the tribute to the Bank of

England, and its payment by the order of the Turkish Ambassador to the trustees appointed under the contract as representatives of the bondholders. After the lapse of 20 years the Turkish Government now found itself in some difficulties, and it had suggested that all the loans contracted, including the Loan of 1854, should be paid into a new general loan upon the hotch-potch principle, the special appropriations in particular cases being forgotten or ignored, the interest on one-half of the amount being deferred for five years, all past engagements being forgotten. But Turkey had no right to take away or appropriate to other purposes the money which had been appropriated to the payment of the interest on the Loan of 1854; and, looking at the position taken up by Lord Clarendon and the Foreign Minister of France at the time, there could be no doubt that Her Majesty's Government were entitled to interfere for the purpose of making the Turkish Government keep faith with respect to this particular loan. But for that loan, none of the subsequent loans which had been placed upon the Exchanges of England and the Continent could have succeeded. The contract was so clear, the conditions so distinct, and the security by which the payment of interest was guaranteed so complete, that he thought his right hon. and learned Friend might very easily have made his Motion a great deal stronger than that to which he gave his earnest support. On going through the printed Papers he had been much struck by a telegram from the Turkish Government to the Turkish Ambassador in London, dated the 16th of October, 1875. It was in the following terms:—

“The late financial measure will not be applied to the Loan of 1855, guaranteed by England and by France; and the service of the interest will continue to be made as heretofore.”

He looked upon that communication from the Turkish Government as in effect suggesting to the two powerful Governments of England and France—

“We are not going to cheat you, or to take away either the interest or principal of the Loan of 1855, we are only going to defraud your helpless and hopeless subjects; we have got their money, and we mean to misappropriate their security.” He said that that communication made it imperative on our Government to give it an answer, protesting that they would not have their interest or their principal paid at the expense of the helpless bondholders, but that Turkey must honourably fulfil her engagements towards the subjects of Great Britain and France.

MR. HAMOND said, he was sorry the Motion had been brought forward, as he had hitherto believed it was the characteristic of Englishmen always to have forbearance towards a foe when he was sorely pressed. He regretted to hear the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Freshfield) attribute fraud to the Turkish Government. The Irade of the 6th of October last was not in the least intended as a repudiation, or as an amalgamation, or as a throwing into hotch-potch of the entire Debt of Turkey, but it merely meant that the payment of half the interest and sinking fund was to be suspended for five years, hoping that at the end of that time Turkey would be able to resume payment in full and go on as she had done previously, the interest of her Debt and her sinking fund being far too heavy for her to bear. That was not attempting to defraud, nor was it holding out to the Governments of England and France that Turkey would pay them in full, but would rob their subjects of half their due. The loan guaranteed by England and France had only £42,000 of the Egyptian tribute appropriated in payment of its interest, the remainder being secured to the Customs of Smyrna. Neither had there been a proposal made by Turkey to the Foreign Office that they would appropriate a greater sum than £42,000 from the Egyptian tribute, as they were entitled to the surplus from the £280,000 hypothecated to pay the Loan of 1854. He doubted very much the propriety of pressing a country like Turkey, under present circumstances, to pay any loan, or interest on a loan, which she had contracted, seeing she was now struggling against a rebellion fomented and encouraged by those who were called her allies, and also fighting for her very existence as a European Power. That was not a time for the British House of Commons to tell Turkey, in her hour of dire necessity—“Pay what you owe me, pay what you owe your foreign creditors—to the last fraction of a pound.” Let them be fair to that much-maligned country. The 1854 Loan was the first foreign loan Turkey ever contracted.

She then had a large revenue, and her expenditure never exceeded her income. True it might be that in the throes of her then struggle for her independence, assisted by England and France, the Ministers of those countries went rather out of the way—he allowed this for the sake of argument—and encouraged their respective peoples to lend Turkey their money. But when men entered into a contract the terms of that contract must be looked to. He held in his hand one of the bonds of the 1854 Loan, and in it he saw no engagement on the part of the English or the French Government to pay interest or guarantee either the interest or the redemption money; but the Porte made a contract with the bondholders to hypothecate £282,000 of the then Egyptian Tribute, to be remitted to England to pay the interest and sinking fund. The Porte had done so; and even while he was speaking he believed that condition was being honestly fulfilled by the Khedive, who made the arrangement with his Sovereign and with the assent of Turkey. He did not think that the bondholders of 1854 had a right to call for the special interference of the Government of this country or of France to help them out of their difficulty, because while they had the advantage of the Egyptian Tribute being remitted direct by the Khedive to the Bank of England, the Porte held the sole control over that remittance; and it was only released from being the property of the Porte by the order of the Turkish Ambassador, who directed the Bank of England from time to time to pay the interest and the sinking fund. If there was any Turkish Loan which had a claim on our Government it was that of 1858, which was the first loan contracted after the war; and the Governments of England and France, which had shed their blood and spent their treasure for the independence of the Ottoman Empire, encouraged that loan. Both Lord Clarendon and Lord Russell, he believed, interfered and took active steps to impress on the Turkish Government the necessity of fulfilling their engagements in respect to the Loan of 1858. Moreover, by a distinct hypothecation the Customs of Constantinople were irrevocably pledged for that Loan, and could be received by the contractor of the Loan to pay the dividends. There was no withholding of them, until an order came from the Turkish Ambassador, as in the case of the Loan of 1854. The loans contracted by Turkey subsequently to 1858 stand upon the same footing as the loan of that date, because certain taxes had been hypothecated irrevocably for their payment. But, he asked, was this the time at which to press the Turkish Government? He had every reason to believe that this insurrection or rebellion, if it could be dignified by the name of rebellion—being what he himself would call a disturbance of a few of the provinces of Turkey—had been instigated and encouraged by one who professed goodwill towards her and to be her honourable ally. He believed when this question came to be discussed, that it would be found beyond a shadow of a doubt this disturbance had been brought about, not because the subjects of Turkey were dissatisfied and disaffected, but by a universal system of foreign intrigue, which had been carried on persistently for the last nine or 12 months with the view of ruining Turkey financially as well as politically. When the Papers were laid before the House he believed that would most certainly be its opinion. He, therefore, earnestly asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman not to press the Government upon this matter at the present juncture of affairs. He was in constant communication with the Porte—humble individual as he was—and he had every reason to believe that in a short time, as this political question was settled, a proposal would be made by the Turkish Government—that, in fact, the Turkish Government were entertaining now proposals of a very important character, which within a month must culminate in some point or other, and that that culmination would be a fair and honourable proposal on the part of the Ottoman Government, which would, he believed, place everything fairly and honestly before its foreign creditors, without any reserve or secret whatever, in regard to the financial position of the country. There could be no advantage derived from pressing her at the present moment. What was her position? Unable to borrow a single penny, her credit utterly gone, her interest upon her foreign Debt unpaid, her provinces in rebellion—was it right, under such circumstances, for Englishmen to press her? He trusted that it would not go forth from the House of Commons that the Irade of the 6th of October was put forward by Turkey merely with the view of defrauding her foreign creditors. In the Circular of the 16th of October Turkey repeated the terms of the Irade of the 6th in the most solemn manner, and expressed her willingness to appoint a syndicate of foreign bondholders, and to hand over to them the revenues hypothecated under the different loans, which would be sufficient to pay the interest and the sinking fund under the Irade. Did that look like an attempted fraud? If a person could not for the moment pay 20s. in the pound, what more could they do than say—"That is my all—take it?" He earnestly asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman, after the observations he had made in reference to the Loan of 1854, not to press this matter to a division unless he included in his Motion all the loans, but that we should wait quietly and patiently, and we should soon have an opportunity of judging Turkey. If she was able to stem the present torrent—and he had not the least doubt that she would—then he believed that she would make every possible arrangement consistent with reason to satisfy her creditors to the best of her ability, and prove to the world that she had no desire or intention to defraud them.

MR. GLADSTONE confessed himself at a loss to comprehend or to reduce to any tolerable consistency the several parts of the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Hamond). The larger part of the hon. Gentleman's speech recalled that age of chivalry which Mr. Burke told us long ago had altogether vanished, and appealed in touching and pathetic tones to the lofty and high-minded sentiments and to the warm-hearted feeling of Englishmen, and entreated them not to press Turkey in her hour of difficulty. But how did the hon. Member close his speech? The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder for the City of London had made a special appeal to the Government to press upon the Porte, upon grounds which he would presently consider, the necessity of discharging its obligations with regard to £2,000,000 of its Debt, and the hon. Member who had just sat down said "how cruel to press Turkey at the present moment to pay the interest upon those £2,000,000 of Debt," and he requested the right hon. and learned Gentleman to withdraw his Motion unless he would consent to include in its terms the whole of the other Debt. In that case the hon. Member was content to forget that he was an Englishman, and put aside all his high-flown principles, and was willing to go into the Lobby with the right hon. and learned Gentleman, if he would only not insist upon getting these two payments. [MR. HAMOND: Permit me to explain that I never said so.] He believed that he had stated accurately the relative positions of the hon. Member's speech, and if he were in error the hon. Member would have an opportunity at the proper time of correcting him. He himself, on the other hand, wished to take a course exactly opposite to that of the hon. Member. The purpose of the hon. Member's speech was to mix together the whole of this immense question and to justify the course pursued by Turkey with regard to her Debt of £200,000,000. He, on the contrary, treading in the path of the right hon. and learned Mover and of the hon. and learned Seconder of the Motion, wished to separate absolutely and completely the case of the Debt of £2,000,000 from that of the Debt of £198,000,000. The Debt of the £2,000,000 was entirely isolated from that of the larger Debt. In itself the smaller Debt was a very insignificant matter, because it only involved a sum of some £50,000 or £60,000 per annum, and therefore the whole amount at issue was very trifling, and in a financial sense, perhaps, trumpery compared with the larger sum at issue. And it was a still more trifling affair, because the sum which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder for the City of London asked to have paid over to the bondholders was not at present under the command of Turkey. It might, perhaps, in a negative sense be at the command of Turkey, because nobody else could get at it without her consent. That was what the hon. Member called being under the sole control of Turkey. If £10,000 was in a bank, and a man had power to prevent the bank paying it over to a third party, but was unable to get it himself, it could not be said that he had the sole control over it. Turkey herself could not touch a single shilling of it. The Bank of England did not understand this Irade as the hon. Member had understood it. He said it was a proposal to the bondholders, on the part of Turkey, to forego half their dividends. It was a proposal of much the same sort as the executioner made to a criminal to be hanged, after his sentence had been pronounced. There was no choice of any kind whatever left to the bondholders. But this money was laid up in a particular coffer, and although it was perfectly true the Turkish Ambassador held one of the keys on behalf of his Government, the coffer could not be opened except for the benefit of the bondholders. And as this matter was isolated with regard to the Turkish main Debt, so also was it isolated as regarded the general policy of Her Majesty's Government. It was clear, from the quarter from which the Motion under discussion proceeded, and from the speech of the right hon. and learned Mover, that Party feeling had no relation to the question, and he was therefore sorry and surprised that the matter had not presented itself in what he took to be its true view to the eyes of Her Majesty's Government. At the same time, he felt it would be his absolute duty to avoid saying a word which could, in the slightest degree, make it difficult for the Government to listen to an unprejudiced view of the case. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder of the City of London had given to the bondholders the valuable aid of his high character, long experience, and judicial mind, and it was on the part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman a perfectly gratuitous service. He (Mr. Gladstone), on the other hand, stood in a wholly different position. He bore an obligation which he could not but discharge, for he was the sole Representative in that House of those Ministers who were responsible for the transactions connected with the Crimean War. He did not know that either he or Lord Granville had any personal share in the particular transaction under discussion; but regarding the question in the concrete he admitted to the full, and absolutely, the responsibility of the Government of which he was a Member, and was prepared to defend it to the utmost on its merits. To him it seemed that this was neither more nor less than a question of honour, and that it was impossible for them to remain as they were, silent and inert on the subject of this loan, without dishonour to this country. Of course, he did not wish to say that those who hitherto had not adopted so strong a view as that which had been forced upon himself were less sensible of the importance of maintaining the honour of the country than he was; but he felt convinced that, on repeating the true character of the facts, that would be the general feeling and opinion of the country. This being so, the first proposition he wished to place strongly before the House was that the money was obtained from the bondholders of this country and elsewhere entirely and exclusively in consequence of the letters written by Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys. Until they were written the money was refused, and when they were written it was given with promptitude. His next proposition was that it was a mistake to suppose that the effect of the letters was to induce the purchasers of bonds to place reliance on the general credit and revenues of Turkey, although it might be perfectly true, as had been stated by the hon. Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne, that that case might have happened, for Turkey at the time had no foreign Debt and a revenue considerably above her expenditure. But, as a fact, the security upon which these gentleman trusted their money was not worse now than it was then, for if every shilling of the general revenue of Turkey dwindled away and disappeared, their security would remain the same. The Egyptian tribute was their security, and it was irrevocably and absolutely devoted to the purpose up to a certain sum until the loan was liquidated. Nothing could be clearer than the evidence on the point, for it was stated in the contract, which was quite sufficient to fix it upon the British Government, and was likewise in the firman of the Sultan, in different words, but the effect was exactly the same. The Sultan desired that the liquidation should continue till the liquidation of the loan, both principal and interest, was complete. The only question that could arise was, what might happen if the Pacha were to fail in his duty; and taking the circumstances as they stood, the impression made on his own mind was that the Khedive, in the midst of his great difficulties, had a very great anxiety to discharge his obligations. Nothing could be more improbable than that he would make himself a party to that which was regarded as an

ct of repudiation, and had all the aspects of repudiation, whether so intended by Turkey or not. The power of Turkey to pay was complete. It was not as if she were money she had power to apply to other purposes, for she had not that power. Every shilling requisite for the fulfilment of those obligations was ready, although it was in the power of Turkey to prevent its being employed for its legitimate ends. It was, therefore, wide of the question to suppose that Egypt could assist Turkey in any scheme of repudiation. These letters of Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys were so strong and firm, and even solemn in their character, that even if they thought these letters ought not to have been written, they could not say that they were sorry their prestige had suffered, but they could not help it, without being guilty of an act of dishonour. He did not enter into the question whether Turkey issued that Irade with the intention finally of liquidating everything, but the question was, whether England was to use her influence with Turkey to allow this fund to go to its proper purposes. He had seen it stated and imputed to Lord Derby that these letters were very much to be regretted, and were not to be considered as binding. If they were part of the most foolish measure ever passed, they must be fully and absolutely supported, for he maintained that the only principle on which government could be carried on was to accept fully the consequences of all official acts. But he maintained that these letters were no discredit to the prudence of the Governments which caused them to be issued. At that time England and France were about to enter on enormous expenditure to prevent an invasion of Turkey by Russia, and they accordingly made it clear to the Turkish Government that they could not undertake the whole responsibility of defending Turkey against Russian conquest. The Turkish Government replied that, although they had endeavoured to do it, they had found it impossible to provide for the expenses of a war such as that which was impending out of the ordinary revenues of the country. They did attempt to raise the money, and the effort having failed, it was impossible for England and France to stand by and leave Turkey in a condition in which she would neither have revenue to support a war nor credit to borrow money. England might certainly have allowed Turkey to borrow £3,000,000 under a letter of recommendation; or was she to have guaranteed the loan? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No, no.] Well, he would not enter into that question. He did not think it would have been wise, because it might have become the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come to Parliament and ask for the means of discharging that guarantee. The remaining course was that England might have given Turkey the money. Well, he did not agree with the system of guaranteeing the loans; and if he did not mistake, his right hon. Friend had in 1855 joined in a protest against that system. That, however, had gone by. What he said was this—that what Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys did was the least they could do. The question was not whether what they had done was the right thing to do, but whether it was not the least and the best thing they could do. If they had not done that, they must either have paid the money or guaranteed it, and either of those things would have been a great deal more stringent. They engaged this country to the minimum that they thought it necessary to go, and under these circumstances it would indeed be strange of them to object to what Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys did because it was of an insufficient character, and said that they ought to have paid the money outright or guaranteed it. Well, in 1854 the obligation of our Government to these bondholders became complete, and it was even strengthened by what took place in 1855. The Convention of that year was an absolute Treaty between Turkey on the one side, and England and France on the other; and in that Treaty they found embodied the very words that a certain sum of money was to be available for the interest of the guaranteed loans after a sufficient sum had been appropriated for the payment in full of the loan of 1854. It was no extravagant construction of that Treaty to say that Turkey was bound to this country and to France by the words of that Treaty to the full discharge of those obligations. Everyone would have observed the very peculiar form of the proceedings of the Ottoman Porte on the subject. In 1854 the English and French Governments pledged their honour to a loan; they gave an honourable assurance that the Porte could and would fulfil its obligations. In 1855 they pledged the credit of the nation, and made the money receivable at the Bank of England. What was the language of the Ottoman Porte? The hon. Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Hamond) treated it as if it had been complimentary to us. He (Mr. Gladstone) must confess that it appeared to him, on the contrary, to be disparaging in the highest degree, for what the Ottoman Porte said was—"We will not cheat you; we will only dishonour you. The loss of money, we know, you could not stand; the loss of credit and reputation is a matter which in these times of modern philosophy you are much better able to bear with." Let them remember that when the loan of 1855 was made there was a distinct recognition of it under the Treaty. What were the declarations of those who dealt with the subject as it passed through Parliament? Lord St. Leonards used the remarkable expression that by this transaction we had become assignees of the Egyptian tribute for the benefit of the creditors. Lord Clarendon and Lord Palmerston, in the most express and clearest manner, spoke of the loan as coming behind the previous charge upon the Egyptian tribute—were these empty words? On the contrary, they acted at once upon the Money Market, for the security was not a speculative one. It had, on the one hand, the full support of the English and French Governments, and, on the other hand, they had prudently arranged for keeping the money out of the Turkish Treasury altogether, and took care that it should be brought direct from Egypt to this country. The result was the loan went to 94½, whereas he believed that the people, if they wanted to sell their securities, could hardly get £30 per £100. He really could not say what constituted a strong case if that was not a strong case. He was not prepared to say that there was any limit to the rights of the British Government as against Turkey with regard to this matter. He only said that it was not for them to enter into the question whether it was desirable for the Government to push those rights to an extreme point. The Motion of the right hon. and learned Recorder was drawn with great moderation and great judgment. It simply stated that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to press upon the Government of Turkey the complete fulfilment of the conditions upon which the loan was subscribed for. Was not that a very moderate statement? Was it possible to deny the leading proposition that the loan was subscribed for in consequence of the letters of recommendation, and could they now proceed as if those letters never existed? Everybody knew that that if it were a far larger question it was in the power of the English and French Governments to insist, and that by a very moderate exercise of their just influence, that Turkey had no right to make them sharers in dishonour. She had no right to parade them before the world as people who deluded the innocent holders of capital in their own countries, and induced them to go into bad security by representing to them with solemnity that it was a good one, for that was what they had done. If it was a bad security, it was one with the joint assurance of the two Governments that it was not. For his part, he thought it necessary to wash his hands of all part in such a transaction, and therefore of the responsibility of being a party to opposing the Motion. He had never known a clearer case submitted to Parliament, considering the manner in which it had been received and the quarter from which the Motion came, and deeply should he be disappointed if, in the judgment of Her Majesty's Government, or by the decision of the House, it should appear that those much injured parties were to remain without redress.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that before he proceeded to make any remarks upon the Motion, he wished to set himself right in reference to an interruption of his during the speech of his right hon. Friend opposite the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). His right hon. Friend was speaking of the course taken by Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huy in 1854, and stated that in recommending the loan then about to be recommended on behalf of Turkey, they adopted upon the whole the best course that could be taken in the circumstances. His right hon. Friend compared that course with the alternative of guaranteeing the loan, and asked the House in defence of the policy acted upon, whether it was not a better mode of proceeding than guaranteeing the loan. He interrupted his right hon. Friend by saying, "No," while following the argument in his own mind that the letters of Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys involved us in some obligation equivalent to a guarantee. His right hon. Friend reminded him of the part he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) took in 1855; but in that year he voted against guaranteeing the loan, and he had no doubt that had the question been discussed in 1854 he should have given a similar vote. The reason for his interruption was this—it struck him that, if instead of encouraging the loan of 1854, we had acted as we did in the following year, then, instead of finding ourselves in 1876 under some kind of obligation, unexplained and indefinite in its character, we should be absolutely clear of any obligation whatever. His right hon. Friend said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have had to ask Parliament for money to pay the sum so guaranteed, but on that point he took issue with his right hon. Friend. He begged to call attention to this rather simple calculation. The nominal capital of the Turkish Loan of 1854 amounted to £3,000,000; but it was issued at 80, and therefore the lenders paid only £2,400,000. In January, 1876, there remained unpaid a sum of about £890,000, representing £1,117,000 nominally. Now if the lender had perfect security, he would not have received more than 4 per cent, because in the following year the loan was raised at 4 per cent. In point of fact, the amount which the lender received in 1854 was £6 on £80, or 7½ per cent. If that 7½ per cent were to be divided between the 4 per cent which the lender would receive on the guaranteed loan, and the 3½ per cent which remained over, and if that 3½ per cent were applied by way of sinking fund, he would in 21 years have got back his capital and something more. In that case, therefore, the whole of the loan would have been paid off. It was because he had that calculation in his mind, that he was induced to say that something better could have been done; that Turkey would have received more efficient help, and we should have been free from responsibility. He now wished to ask for a few minutes, the candid and unbiased attention of the House to that position in which we stood. Nobody could doubt that the position was a very serious one; and deserved very earnest consideration. No one could doubt that on any question which could by any construction be represented as touching the honour of England, we ought to be very jealous of that honour, and very careful of the course that we might take. But he was quite certain he was speaking the sentiments of his noble Friend, Lord Derby, and of the Government, when he said that the importance of watching jealously over the honourable obligations of England in this matter was as much present to their minds as it was to the mind of his right hon. Friend, or any hon. Member of this House. His right hon. Friend spoke very naturally with some personal feeling in this matter, because he represented in this House the Government by whom that obligation had been incurred. Well, he entirely accepted the proposition laid down by his right hon. Friend that the Government of England was not the Administration in power at any particular time, and that where the Government of one day pledged the national faith in any particular, succeeding Governments were bound in honour to take up the engagement and redeem it. But let them not attempt to say that the present Government, as their Successors, had any greater obligation than they would have had. When his right hon. Friend asked, were not Her Majesty's Government to consider the letters of Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys binding? his answer was that they did as far as they would be binding on Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys, but Her Majesty's Government did not say that the Successors of Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys incurred any greater obligation. Now, what was the nature of that obligation, for by the answer to that question, the position of Her Majesty's Government was to be measured. And here he would call the attention of the House to the very great delicacy of dealing with matters of this sort. We must not allow hard cases to lead us to the adoption of false general principles. We must bear in mind the proper principles upon which to proceed in relation to the debts owing to British subjects by foreign Powers, and that there was nothing that would be more dangerous to the interests of this country, or to those whom he might call the leading classes, than that the Government should give a fictitious support to their transactions by holding out to them a sort of indefinite hope that in some way or another the money that they might lend to foreign Governments would be looked after for them by the British Government. If there were cases in which British subjects had advanced money to foreign Powers on the full conviction that those Powers were offering good security and fair interest, they must take the risk. But if we led the lender to think that in case the Power to which he lent money made default, he would get the aid of his own Government to recover his money, we should be encouraging him to believe that he had got a security which he had not. It was all very well to say that we were not to be driven to the use of force in these matters. It was all very well for his right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder for the City of London to say—"I do not ask you to send your ships to Besika Bay;" but, in point of fact, if they did begin to acknowledge an obligation, and undertook to press it on a foreign Power and that power treated us with contempt what was the ultimate resort? Were we to go as far as we could, but when the moment for action came were we to say we did not intend to go quite so far? If we acted in that way we should place ourselves in an unworthy and ludicrous position. A half support was a very awkward thing to give, and that remark he would apply to the letters of Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys, because those letters, falling short of an actual guarantee, did encourage the belief that a considerable amount of support was given by the two Governments, and we were now disputing what was the amount of obligation incurred by those letters. It would have been far better if we were going to do anything at the time, to have come forward frankly and said that we would give a guarantee. But what we did fell far short of that. Instead of the loan having been raised on the favourable terms on which the loan in the following year was raised when we gave the guarantee, it was raised on unfavourable terms; Turkey did not get what she expected, and it was suggested that we were in some shape or other to assist the bondholders. His right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, in conjunction with the right hon. and learned Recorder, stated that the loan was obtained entirely and exclusively in consequence of the letters of Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys, and the former right hon. Gentleman justified the statement in this way, that when Turkey first began to make efforts to raise a loan, not having that support she failed; but when the support of Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys was given she obtained the money. Now he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) did not know precisely all that occurred before the loan, but this he did know—before the proceedings which terminated in a loan, an attempt was made by Turkey to raise a loan through the agency of Baron Rothschild, and in March, 1854, Baron Rothschild put himself into communication with the Foreign Office with respect to it. Baron Rothschild had an interview with Lord Clarendon, and the result was that he wrote to the Foreign Office and he received from the Foreign Office a letter informing him that—

"The best exertions of Her Majesty's Government would always be used to secure on the part of the Turkish Government the strict fulfilment of the conditions on which the loan was made."

He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) took the position of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich to be as nearly as possible defined by those words. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] Then he did not know what his right hon. Friend meant. His right hon. Friend did not ask the Government to come forward and say—

"Inasmuch as we misled you, we are ready to give you a Vote out of the national Exchequer;"

but he said—

"You ought to come forward, and use your best exertions in order to secure on the part of the Turkish Government the strict fulfilment of the conditions on which the loan was contracted."

That he took to be the position of his right hon. Friends the Recorder and the Member for Greenwich. That was precisely what the Foreign Office told Baron Rothschild—that the moral support of the Government would be given, and yet he failed to raise the loan, but subsequently the object was attained—

and how? Not by giving any greater pledge, but by something rather short of that—by the hypothecation of the Egyptian tribute as a special security. It was when that arrangement, conducted under the auspices of the French and English Governments, was completed, and the Government were enabled to announce the fact to the public that the loan was issued. It was not upon any moral obligation, but on a material arrangement, by which so much money was to be paid into the Bank of England in the shape of Egyptian tribute—it was on that basis, when they changed from the moral support to the material guarantee, that the loan was actively carried into effect. That led them to examine the position of this Egyptian tribute. His right hon. Friend said this money which Turkey was called on to apply to the payment of her debts was not under her control; she could not make any other use of it than pay it to her creditors. To a certain extent that was true; but not without certain limitations. She must pay the Egyptian tribute into the Bank of England, and the Bank would not allow her to apply it to any other purpose. That was true; but if Turkey only authorized the Bank of England to appropriate one-half in payment of the loan in February, there would remain the other half standing over, and that might be used by Turkey in the next half-year. At the present moment there was lying in the Bank of England a considerable sum of money paid as Egyptian tribute in February, which was held subject to the orders of the Turkish Government. The Bank of England would not allow it to be appropriated to any other purpose, but it would be available for the interest. He thought these things ought to be known, because it ought to be understood exactly what our position was. But while he said these things, qualifying as they did some of the propositions rather hastily and rashly taken up on that subject by some hon. Member and still more by persons outside, he was very far indeed from desiring to deny or depreciate the amount of responsibility which rested on the English Government to see justice done as far as they could in this matter. He was very sensible of the moral obligation laid upon them in consequence of the assurances given by Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys. The Government, indeed, were very far from denying the fact that these assurances thus given did raise to some extent an obligation in respect to those loans which would not exist in the case of other loans. At the same time they must be cautious—they must take care how far the language used by Government in respect to any particular loan was to be considered as involving an obligation to act with regard to the recovery of other loans. His right hon. Friend rather reproached the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Hamond) for venturing to introduce the case of other loans, and he said those other loans had nothing to do with this discussion. They ought not to complicate matters by bringing into the discussion other loans. Now, that was a very easy position for his right hon. Friend to take. Care must be exercised that in what we might do, or in what we might allege, we did not affect our obligations in respect of other loans. But he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would remind the House that the loan of 1862 was materially assisted by the insertion in the prospectus of a very gushing letter from Earl Russell, who was then Secretary for Foreign Affairs, as to the condition of Turkey and its ability to meet its obligations. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Will you read that letter, please?] He had not the letter at hand at the moment; but his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Foreign Office (Mr. Bourke) would find it, and it should be read before the termination of the debate. He was not contending for a moment that the letter of Earl Russell in that case amounted to as much as the letter of Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huys in this; but he was saying that we must take care how far we acknowledged any action on the part of the British Government, as involving an obligation on the part of the British Government, going further than it professed to go. Undoubtedly, these letters by acknowledgment did not go the length of a pure guarantee; but it was a question how far they actually did go. If they only went so far as to involve the statement of the belief of the Government of the two countries that Turkey could and would meet her engagements, it might possibly be felt there was difficulty with regard to other loans that were issued with the same kind of acknowledgment. But this was not to be treated quite in the way his right hon. Friend proposed. It must be remembered that when we were calling upon the Government of Turkey to make any particular arrangement with regard to any portion of its Debt, this arrangement to a certain extent, it might be a limited extent, did affect the position of the other creditors; and it was not unreasonable that we should at least consider in what we did, whether it affected the interests of other creditors. He was far from saying that the interests of other creditors had an equal claim upon us with the interests of those connected with the Loan of 1854. He was far from saying that anything like the same obligation rested upon us; but we must be careful we did not treat these matters as if we could shut out or put on one side every other consideration except this particular case of the Loan of 1854. With regard to that, after all the bondholders had some advantages over the other creditors, because they had at least a material guarantee that the Egyptian tribute, as at present arranged, must come into the Bank of England, and was there held for their ultimate, if not for their immediate benefit. Therefore, they were not so wholly left without security as some other creditors might possibly be, and he was quite prepared to admit, in the interests of these creditors, that there was a special obligation to consider and have regard to. His right hon. Friend, he would admit, might fairly say it was a matter in which we were not alone; it was a matter in which the position of the French Government as well as of our own had to be considered, and he thought it would be unfortunate if by any vote or hasty action of the House we were apparently to take any step without placing ourselves in communication with the French Government on the matter. Negotiations had been going on with a view to effecting arrangements, and at one time he was in hope they might lead to a more satisfactory result than they had. He did not know how far they were to accept the consoling assurances of the hon. Member for Newcastle, which he had heard with great pleasure, though for the first time, to-night; but he was prepared to say, on behalf of the Government, that they were not insensible to the case that had been brought forward, that it was one which had engaged their attention for a considerable time, and they were prepared to place themselves in communication afresh with the Government of France on the subject. He did not feel justified in saying more than that at present; but he wished to remind the House of the extreme delicacy of their position, and to express an earnest hope that his right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder would be satisfied with having called attention to the subject and eliciting the expression of opinions he had done, and would trust to the effect the expression of those opinions might have, rather than to a formal vote of the House upon the subject.

MR. J. HOLMS admitted that that was a delicate subject to discuss, and said that its importance arose from the expressions of opinion in favour of the Loan of 1854 that were given by Lord Clarendon and M. Drouyn de L'huy, although other loans seemed to have derived some support from the letter of Lord Russell that had been referred to. The Loan of 1854 was a large and important one, and that of 1862 partook much of the same quality. The letter of Lord Russell, alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, dated March 15, 1862, stated that if the Sultan's Commissioners succeeded in obtaining the loan, Her Majesty's Government, anxious for the well-being and prosperity of Turkey, would be prepared to send one or two gentlemen in whom they had confidence to assist the Turkish Minister in the due application of the proceeds of the loan to the extinction of the paper money, and the funding of the floating Debt. He stated that Her Majesty's Government would take an interest in the operation from feelings of friendship towards Turkey, and the contractors for the loan might see in such a mission further security against the misapplication of the loan and the loss of credit that would ensue. The effect of the letter was that the loan, which up till that time was in disfavour, was not only accepted by the public at large, but it was subscribed for five times over in consequence.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said the guarantee by Lord Russell, in 1862, was entirely different from the recommendations of the Government as to the 1854 loan. That was a promise to send delegates to Turkey to see to the extinction of paper money. That measure was carried out, and thereby the obligation of the English Government was entirely discharged. It was far otherwise in the case of the 1854 Loan. In 1854 it was impossible for Turkey to raise money unless she was backed up by England and France. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer argued that it would have been much better if the English Government in 1854 had actually guaranteed the loan. He wished, however, to remind him that when in 1855 they did guarantee a Turkish loan, the proposal was only carried in that House by a majority of 2. This Loan of 1854 stood upon an entirely different footing from any of those to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred, and in which the credulity of the English public might be said to have been manifested. It was not a loan brought forward by some semi-bankrupt State, with a prospectus to induce the public to lend money in the hopes of receiving an extravagant interest, but it was raised in a time of war, in which England and France were the allies of the borrowing Power; and the English public paid for the bonds a far higher price than they would have brought if the loan had been brought out without the recommendation of the English and French Ministers. He was sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer must be fully alive to the necessity of the Government intervening in the matter, and it was his firm belief and hope that he would persuade his Colleagues to listen to what he conceived to be the unanswerable speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich; so that they might recognize the duty of the Government in not leaving in the lurch those who had subscribed to this Loan upon the faith of the promises, explanations, and assurances given by Lord Clarendon.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that the position of this Loan of 1854 was complicated by what afterwards occurred in 1855. Turkey obtained a new loan with an English and French Government guarantee in 1855, the security for which was the margin of the Egyptian tribute which had been already pledged to cover the Loan of 1854; but the proceeds of the tribute were not now applied to pay the first charge upon it, whilst nevertheless Turkey was at present making good her obligations to England and France by the payment of the interest and instalments of the latter loan; and he would therefore appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the matter was not further complicated by the neglect of Turkey to fulfil her obligations in regard to the prior loan of 1854?

LORD ESLINGTON said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had rather overlaid his speech with reservations and qualifications. The matter was, indeed, so clear, and the honour of this country was so unmistakably involved, that he should have liked to hear a little plainer language from the Treasury Bench. The right hon. Gentleman had led the House away from the real question by an elaborate argument of what would have happened if there had been an absolute guarantee of the Loan of 1854. But we did not guarantee that loan, and it was, therefore, of no use to calculate what would have happened if we had done so. We did guarantee the Loan of 1855, and it was the duty of the Government to take care that the Egyptian tribute money, which was partly a security for the Loan of 1855, and partly a security for the Loan of 1854, was punctually paid. The two questions were very much mixed up together, and the English taxpayer had a deep interest in knowing that Government were preparing to insist upon Turkey's fulfilling her obligations. They had nothing to do with other loans. He regretted that the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Hamond) should have gone into other loans that had no connection with that under discussion. The hon. Gentleman had, in fact, tried to start a new hare.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present—

LORD ESLINGTON said, that he would not detain the House further than to say that he hoped that the attention of the Government would be directed to the matter, especially when it was seen what were the words which had been used by the Minister of the day when the loan was raised. They all knew the Egyptian tribute was specially appropriated for the payment of the interest of that particular loan, and if that was not secured, all promises of the kind would be as worthless as the paper on which they were written.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, it was a curious feature of the question, that whereas those who were interested in the particular result of the Motion only held the position of creditors to the extent of between £1,000,000 and £2,000,000, there were other creditors to the extent of £196,000,000 who were wholly uninterested in it. What was the position of the creditors of the Loan of 1854, which entitled them so largely to the sympathy of the House? He believed from the first that those gentlemen had made a very good bargain, and that so far from their being in a position to lose anything they had in the 22 years during which the loan had been running, received both their capital and interest, if that interest had been calculated at the reasonable rate of 3½ or 4 per cent. He did not believe that they entered into the loan in consequence of the words used by Lord Clarendon, but from sympathy with Turkey when she became our ally. Lord Clarendon did no more than express his entire confidence in the good faith of the Turks; though it must be admitted that subsequently their conduct was inconsistent with honesty. The Turks therefore were not entitled to the confidence that had been expressed. Lord Clarendon's words could not in any sense be construed as a guarantee; and the rate at which the loan was raised plainly showed that they had not been so understood.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, his mind had been exercised as to how he should vote; but after listening to the debate he had come to the conclusion that the weight of argument seemed to be rather in favour of accepting the Motion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Russell Gurney). With regard to the question of interference on the part of the Government, if it were simply to be determined on general principles, he should say that it was not their duty to interfere for the protection of those subjects who had chosen to enter into incautious contracts with foreign creditors. The present, however, was an exceptional case, and if he might give advice to those who lent money to imppecunious States, he should tell them to use their own discretion and to observe some plain rules for their guidance. One of these was never, under any circumstances, to lend their money to a borrowing State unless the subjects of that Power were willing to lend their money to their own Government also. It should be remembered that in the case of this loan to the Turkish Government the hypothecation of territory for the payment of the interest was not an ordinary one. The Khedive became a party to the arrangement and the British Government approved of it. The sum of £280,000 a-year produced by the hypothecation did not form a part of the general resources of Turkey; it was to be applied to the payment of the interest on the Loan of 1854, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not look to that tribute to pay the Loan of 1855—that was to relieve the Government of their guarantee—and ignore the rights of the bondholders of 1854, who were in the position of first mortgagees. Assuming that Lord Clarendon pledged his word in this matter, we must keep that pledge, and it was not now a question of policy, but a question of honour; and all that the Government could be asked to do, was to use its moral influence in urging on the Turkish Government to keep the promise which they made, and which Her Majesty's Government ratified.

MR. SANDFORD approved the caution with which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken on the subject, and expressed a hope that the right hon. and learned Recorder would rest satisfied with the discussion which he had elicited, and would not think it necessary to bring his Motion to a division.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, he had been in considerable doubt during the right hon. Gentleman's (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) speech what course he should take; but just at the close of his observations, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Government recognized their responsibility, that they were willing to communicate with the French Government, in order to consider what course should be taken, and to make use of their moral influence with the Turkish Government to make it fulfil its engagements. On that understanding he should withdraw the Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had not given utterance to all his right hon. and learned Friend had represented, and in order to prevent any misunderstanding on the subject, he would repeat the observation he had made, which was that Her Majesty's Government were not insensible to the gravity of the responsibility that rested upon them in the matter, and that they would place themselves in communication with the French Government in reference to the course which should be pursued.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

BISHOPRIC OF TRURO BILL.—[BILL 185.]
(Mr. Assheton Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [4th July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Assheton Cross.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. DILLWYN resumed his speech in opposition to the second reading of the Bill. Last year they created one new Bishopric, and now they proposed to create another, and if 500,000 population was to be the condition on which new Bishoprics were to be created, he did not see where they were to stop. For his own part, he would much rather increase the number of working clergy. He felt bound to enter his protest against the proposal, his opinion being that it was not desirable to create an additional number of Bishops throughout the country. The Bishops were at present numerous, and it was not desirable to multiply them. The hon. Member concluded by moving the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the Opposition of the hon. Member would not be persisted in. His hon. Friend knew, averse to any increase of the Episcopate. The question was whether there was any necessity for an increase of the Episcopate. He would not enter into that question now, because it had been fully discussed before that Session, and the general feeling was that an increase was desired. It was fully shown that the diocese of Exeter had grown too large to be worked by one Bishop, and that was why the Bill had been introduced. Further than that, the necessary funds were to be secured by voluntary subscription, one person guaranteeing no less than £1,200 a-year and the Bishop of Exeter giving £800 a-year during his life.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 23: Majority 52.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

ARDGLASS HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT
(re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 200.]

(Mr. William Henry Smith, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR opposed going into Committee on the Bill, on the ground that past experience had shown that the harbour was not required as a harbour of refuge, or for any other purpose worth the money it was proposed to expend upon it. No one was more anxious than he was to have harbours formed along our exposed coasts, especially harbours of the description of Ardglass, intended for boats employed in the fisheries, but no course was more likely to delay the construction of such harbours than the attempts now made to re-construct the harbour of Ardglass. It was upwards of a third of a century since the works of Ardglass Harbour were swept away in one of the storms that prevailed on that coast, and the present date we were still wanting in that useful knowledge what was so much needed in order to guide our engineers in the formation of harbour works. His opposition to the proposed expenditure on this harbour merely rested on the conviction that it would be wise for the Government, before risking the large sums which were needed to form the many harbours required for our coasting fisheries' trade, to acquire that information what might give a far greater prospect of successful results than the country had yet had for the millions which had been uselessly spent on the many harbours that had proved disastrous failures.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that very great care had been taken to ascertain the sufficiency of grounds upon which the proposal was made. Ardglass Harbour had no doubt suffered from storms; but he believed it had suffered still more from the neglect of those who ought to have repaired it. The harbour was necessary for a refuge to the fishing vessels and the general trade of the country. The appropriation now asked for was a wise and good one, and would be beneficial to the fishing trade of the country.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he did not concur in the view taken by the hon. and gallant Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour). He thought that the House was well entitled to take the proposal of the engineers, which was made after minute investigation, and advance the small sum of money asked for.

CAPTAIN NOLAN thought the harbour was necessary for the trade, and hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not press his opposition.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Bill reported; without Amendment, to be read the third time upon Monday next.

ERNE LOUGH AND RIVER (re-committed)
BILL—[BILL 187.]

(Mr. William Henry Smith, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR protested against the Bill on the same

General Sir George Balfour

grounds as he had already urged in regard to the Ardglass Harbour.

MR. DILLWYN moved the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH hoped the Motion would not be persisted in. The Bill was for the purpose of making a great arterial drainage in the North of Ireland, which could not be done without the aid proposed to be given.

CAPTAIN NOLAN thought the Bill ought to be allowed to pass.

MR. ANDERSON asked what proportion of the money was paid by the locality?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that £15,000, which was half the cost of the navigation works, would be the subject of a Vote. The other half of the cost of the navigation works, and the whole of the drainage works, were to be a charge on the county and barony.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 8; Noes 53: Majority 45.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS BILL

[BILL 43.]

(Mr. Charley, Mr. William Gordon.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Charley.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at half after One o'clock till Monday next.

-THE EASTERN QUESTION— THE PAPERS.

FRANVILLE said, the Blue aining the Correspondence on n Question had only been is-day, although their Lordships the advantage of reading a of its contents in The Times
lay. Some references were the Blue Book to documents
e found in that publication.
very puzzling, and he trusted

the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would give some explanation on the subject.

THE EARL OF DERBY explained that he had originally intended to include in the general Correspondence the Papers relating to the Salonica Massacres; but, finding that the latter documents were already formed into a separate collection, and in order to avoid delay, he resolved to issue them in another volume.
The references mentioned by the noble Earl were to these Papers, which would, he trusted, be in their Lordships' hands in the course of the next 24 hours.

IRISH CHURCH ACT, SECTION 25—IRISH NATIONAL MONUMENTS.—QUESTION.

LORD TALBOT DE MALAHIDE
asked the Lord President of the Council, Why certain ancient buildings in Ireland are not made national monuments under the provisions of Section 25 of the Irish Church Act, particularly as regarded the churches and round towers of Holy Island and Scatterry Island on the Shannon, of Kilmacduagh, Clones, Pertagh, Killishin, Ullard, Tullow, Kilree, the ancient churches of the Isles of Arran, and many others? The noble Lord stated that there was in Ireland a very strong feeling in favour of the preservation of those monuments, in which he cordially participated.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had received a communication from the Irish Church Commissioners on the subject of the noble Lord's Question. The section of the Irish Church Act to which he referred provided that any ruinous ecclesiastical building which it might appear to the Commissioners desirable to preserve as a national monument might be vested in the Board of Works in Ireland; and they had accordingly so handed over a number of ecclesiastical buildings to the Board of Works, together with a sum of £22,554 to place those structures in a proper condition to resist the action of the weather and to preserve them from decay. The Commissioners had applications made to them from every part of Ireland in favour of a great number of ruins the owners of which were desirous should be preserved at the public expense; but they thought it right, having regard to the large sum of money they had already given, that they should act with great caution in taking upon themselves the preservation of other ruins. They added that any communications with respect to such ruins should receive their best consideration.

LORD TALBOT DE MALAHIDE explained that all that was wanted was that there should be sufficient expenditure to prevent the ruins from getting into a worse state—and particularly they wished to guard against anything like restoration.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Government had nothing to do with the matter, which rested entirely with the Irish Church Commissioners.

PARLIAMENTARY AGENCY—REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

Report of the Select Committee considered (according to Order).

LORD REDESDALE, in drawing attention to the Report of the Select Committee on Parliamentary Agency, said that the matter was one of considerable importance in connection with the Private Business of Parliament. It was most desirable to secure the proper performance of their duties by Parliamentary Agents, and to prevent the employment of persons who were not very competent to undertake those duties. The Committee which had been appointed recommended that there should be a recognized body of Parliamentary Agents. It was obvious that such Business could not be properly transacted unless it were undertaken by men properly acquainted with the course of Parliamentary Business; and there should be a due scale of fees, so that those who discharged the work should be properly remunerated. He moved that the Report of the Select Committee be received.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was not aware that the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees intended to move the reception of the Report, which had only been presented a week ago, and related to a matter of a most important character, and he did not think their Lordships ought to agree to it off-hand. It was proposed to create a class, an exclusive body, and that ought not to be done until after Notice and after grave and careful consideration. The Report provided that the fact that a person was a solicitor or called to the Bar was not sufficient to qualify him for the duties of Parliamentary Agent; he must pass a special examination. He should like to know what the examination was to be about.

LORD REDESDALE: It would relate to Parliamentary practice.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he wanted to know what was Parliamentary practice. He maintained that any person enrolled as a solicitor or called to the Bar was fit to practise as a Parliamentary Agent, and in a few weeks could obtain all the special knowledge that was necessary. He hoped his noble Friend would not press their Lordships to come to any decision that day—he thought it was a matter which might very well stand over.

LORD REDESDALE said, he should not press the Motion; but if anything was to be done, they had now but a short time to do it in.

Further consideration adjourned to Friday next.

NORTH AMERICA—EXTRADITION.

ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

EARL GRANVILLE, in calling attention to the Correspondence lately presented by Her Majesty's Government respecting Extradition, said:—The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, while asking me last week to postpone my Motion for a few days, seemed to agree that the subject of the Papers to which I am about to call your attention is one worthy of the notice of Parliament. By the difference between the Governments of this country and that of the United States as to the construction of the Treaty of 1842, a position of great inconvenience has been created for both countries. It is a position from which both countries must wish to extricate themselves, and I hope we shall learn this evening that by the delay asked for last week some progress has been made in that direction; but, in any case, I believe that Parliamentary discussion, and possibly Parliamentary action may be useful and requisite; and if it be carried on in the same moderation of tone, with some slight exceptions, as it appears to have been done by both parties in the Diplomatic Correspondence, no harm can be done. Though the subject of Extradition is one on which ers on International Law have ly differed, yet as to the obligation rendering the fugitive criminals of dly foreign countries, I believe the t at which all civilized nations have ed is this—First, that it is an act mity in itself; second, that it is an ntage to both countries; third, that ation has a right to make this del without a previous arrangement the other; and fourthly, that in no ought persons to be so surrendered ne country to another merely for ical offences. No country has been strenuous in the assertion of the important principle than have Great in and the United States—it is a re of their policy which has com-led remarkable attention. Two tions are involved in the Correspon-e upon which I am about to com-—they are distinct questions, algh they have been somewhat mixed They have reference—first, to the ation by Her Majesty's Government he existing Treaty—which I fear now be treated as a dead letter; second, to the negotiations for a new

ty. I will deal in the first instance the second question; and with re-to it I am not aware that Her Ma's Government are open to any ism apart from the difficulties which arisen out of the refusal to sur-er Winslow, and the possibly unsary stereotyping of our position in ast despatch. The facts regarding negotiation for a new Treaty are as ws:—In 1870, while France and the ed States had each more than 50 ties of Extradition with foreign tries, we had only three—namely, the United States, with France, and Denmark. This fact was due to a usy on our part—which I trust will r be abandoned or weakened—as to maintenance of the rights of asylum political offenders. A Committee appointed in 1868 to consider how Extradition could be combined with maintenance of this right; and, ded upon the recommendations of Committee, a Bill was introduced, h passed in 1870. This Act exed the number of offences for which adition might be made, facilitated machinery for the purpose, and at ame introduced new provisions for ring a person from the danger of g tried for any political offence. I succeeded to the Foreign Office after the passing of that Act, and it was my duty to circulate to our Representatives abroad a copy of the Act, and soon afterwards a model draft Treaty. The result was that I was able to conclude Treaties with Germany, Italy, Austria, Belgium, and Brazil, and other important countries—a list to which the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) has made useful additions. Negotiations on my part immediately began with the United States—with whom we had already a Treaty—for a new Treaty. A good deal of correspondence passed between the two countries on the subject, and at length, during the last month of my tenure of office, information came from Sir Edward Thornton that the difference had been reduced to one point—the objection of the United States to accept any authority but that of Her Majesty's Government to decide what constituted a political offence. This proposal appears to have been objected to by the present Government, as it had previously been by the late Government. But negotiations under the Act of 1870 have been continued up to the present time. I am bound to say that nothing could be more conciliatory than the spirit in which these negotiations have been conducted by our Foreign Office, and that it has been more consistent than the United States, Mr. Fish having withdrawn concessions which he had previously made.

But I am sorry to say that as regards the execution of the Treaty Her Majesty's Government do not appear to me to stand so well, either as regards their law or their policy. It may be presumptuous in an unlearned person to criticize the law of the Government, with all the high professional assistance which they can command; but I am encouraged—first, by the points raised not appearing to be very abstruse; second, by the knowledge that very high legal authorities take my view; and, third, by the fact that the Government have in the Correspondence constantly changed their ground. The whole question arose out of the solicitors of a Mr. Lawrence having in July last year informed the Home Office that their client was about to be tried for a second offence in addition to his trial for the offence for which he had been surrendered. At the instance of the Home Office the noble Earl opposite, the Foreign Secretary, protested on the grounds that such a course would be contrary to the 3rd section of the Extradition Act (1870), by which Act alone (Section 27) the American Treaty is kept alive; and contrary also to the law which governs the practice of the United States Government in Extradition cases as laid down in the Act of Congress, 1848, chap. 147, sec. 2, and contrary to the general practice of all countries. I believe that not one of these grounds is tenable. What has the Act of 1870 to do in an argument with a foreign country about a Treaty concluded 28 years earlier than the passing of that Act? It either agrees or disagrees with the Treaty. If it agrees, there is no need to refer to it. If it disagrees, in what position are we placed? During the French and German War, the Russian Emperor declared that he would no longer consider himself bound by a particular provision of the Treaty of 1856. But although France, Germany, Austria, and Italy, had previously intimated that Russia ought no longer to have this particular provision forced upon her, which was of a galling character, we indignantly and successfully resisted the assumption that the Emperor, by his own act, could free himself from this obligation. Supported by the unanimous voice of Europe, we obtained from His Majesty a distinct retraction, and a declaration that it was "an essential principle of the law of nations that no Power could liberate itself from the engagements of a Treaty, or modify the stipulations thereof, unless with the consent of the Contracting Powers by means of an amicable arrangement;" and in that declaration we ourselves unreservedly joined. After that solemn declaration how could we pretend that the Treaty of 1842 was affected by our Municipal Act of 1870? Fortunately, however, it is quite clear that it was the intention of the Legislature in 1870 to maintain inviolate the Treaty of 1842; and I could show that, in the opinion of the highest authorities—although the language of the 27th section might have been more precise—the Legislature were successful in their intention. But the question of the Act of 1870 as regards the United States is irrelevant, and has been admitted by the Government to be so in later parts of the Correspondence. As to the second point, I will refer later to the construction of the American Act of Congress. W...

Earl Granville

regard to the third point—as to the general practice of all nations—these Papers show that in America, in Canada, and in Great Britain the practice has been as the Americans state it to have been. As to European nations, I doubt whether any evidence which is exact is forthcoming; and it must be remembered that all our Treaties with European Powers excepting France date since 1870. It appears from the Papers that it was in August that the protest founded on the irrelevant grounds suggested by the Home Office was sent to the United States, and that in the following month, September, the Law Officers were consulted. The substance of their opinion is not given in the portion of the Foreign Office letter which is given to Parliament, and they are not again referred to—so I do not know what their advice may have been. In answer to our protest, the Government of the United States repudiated our claim, gave their view of our argument, but took proceedings to prevent a second trial of Lawrence, and gave us some assurances to that effect. These assurances, however, are not quite consistent with subsequent declarations of non possumus made by them. The Extradition of a certain Winslow was demanded by the United States Government, and refused by us, excepting on the condition that the United States Government would give an assurance that this person should not until he had been restored, or had an opportunity of returning to Her Majesty's dominions, be detained or tried in the United States for an offence committed prior to his surrender other than the Extradition crimes proved by the facts on which the surrender would be granted. The demand for this assurance was placed solely on what had passed in the case of Lawrence and the Act of 1870—that Act which I have already shown was irrelevant, and which ground Her Majesty's Government subsequently abandoned. The United States Government again reply on the 31st of March at great length, and with arguments which are not easy to meet. A rejoinder dated the 4th of May is sent by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) to Colonel Hoffman; and in this despatch a new line of argument is adopted—whether upon the re-considered opinion of the Law Officers or based upon the opinion of a still higher authority I cannot say—but I incline to the latter opinion; and if I am right I cannot help thinking that that high authority has in this and in some previous cases found himself in the same position as great consulting physicians are not unfrequently placed. The physician finds the patient ill; he is determined to save him. He thinks the treatment must be changed, but he also wishes to do nothing which may endanger the reputation of the family doctors. In this despatch of May 4 it is explained that the Act of 1870 imposed no new condition on the Treaty of 1842, and it is argued that the Treaty contains within itself provisions for which Her Majesty's Government contend, and it is for the first time distinctly stated that the provisions of the Act of 1870 have no force or effect in any foreign State. And, again, on the 7th of May the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) tells Sir Edward Thornton that Her Majesty's Government do not rest their case on the Act of 1870, but on the general principles of extradition, the language of the statutes of both countries putting the Treaty of 1842 in force, and the care taken to specify in the Treaty the particular crimes for which extradition can be granted. The additional Papers which have been presented contain two more important documents on the execution of the Treaty of 1842—a very long despatch of Mr. Fish, giving the whole views of his Government; and a very able, but not, to my mind, convincing rejoinder from the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby). In this rejoinder the argument founded on the practice of all nations is omitted, and the Act of 1870 is only mentioned to be dropped. But the Foreign Office is again good enough to explain to the Government of the United States the construction of their own municipal law—the Act of Congress of 1848. Though a little rash, it may have been a natural thing to do at the outset of the controversy; but, after an answer had been received from the Government of the United States to the effect that not only the Government and their Law Officers, but also their Judges in Court take an exactly opposite view of the right construction of that Act, it does appear to be a strong and (I will not say ridiculous, but) an anomalous thing for us to continue to explain to them the meaning of their own laws. Then the cardinal question of the case is stated—namely, that it is an essential principle of extradition as permitted or practised by this country that a person surrendered on an Extradition Treaty can be tried for the offence for which he is surrendered, and for no other offence previously committed; and this is the proper construction of the Treaty of 1842; that it is the meaning which was attached at the time, and which has since been continued to be attached by this country to that Treaty, and that it is the meaning which they had understood was attached to that Treaty by the Government of the United States. It is possibly from the want of legal acumen on my part, but I cannot find a trace of this condition in the Treaty of 1842. It is certainly not there in words; and if it was understood to be there, why was it not expressed in words? The Act of 1843 confirming that Treaty was warmly debated in this House and in the House of Commons. Mr. Macaulay and others expressed great alarm lest false charges should be made and false cases got up merely to get possession of a slave; Lord Aberdeen, the late Lord Derby, Sir Robert Peel, and the Attorney General repudiated the insinuation against the Government of the United States that they would lend themselves to getting up such a false case. But how comes it, if there was an understanding that a surrendered criminal was only to be tried for one offence, and could not be tried for any other, that none of them explained that this safeguard was in the Treaty, although it was not expressly stated. If the condition was in the Treaty, why did Sir Thomas Henry, in his evidence before the Committee of 1868, say that it was a provision in some Treaties and not in others? and why, I should like to know, if the provision was in the Treaty with the United States—in which Treaty it was not—should he recommend it to be expressly inserted in all future Treaties? and why was it necessary so to insert it in the Act of 1870? An ingenious argument is urged to show that the provision was so necessary to the Treaty that it must be in it. I do not see any great force in the point as to the surrender of criminals being limited to a specified number of offences—the chief object of that specification is to prevent a friendly Government having to put all its administrative and judicial machinery into motion for any petty and trifling misdemeanour: but when that specification is accompanied by a provision that the crime for which extradition is demanded must not only bear the same name in both countries, but must constitute the offence called by that name in the country called upon to surrender, it may in some cases be a useful safeguard against proceedings for a political offence. But when you proceed to argue that the safeguard is incomplete without a provision that no fugitive criminal can be tried for a second offence, it may be a very fair and good argument in itself, as the Committee of 1868 and the Parliament of 1870 evidently thought. It may or may not be a conclusive argument for the future; but no one can pretend that it is such an axiom as could not have been disputed by the negotiators of 1842, who might have thought it a very great impediment to the administration of justice if the condition had been proposed to them—still less that from the mere fitness of things it must have necessarily been of the essence of a Treaty in which nothing is said about it. I see nothing to make me believe that this condition is in the Treaty of 1842. Her Majesty's Government state what has been their understanding, and what they believe to have been the understanding of the Treaty of 1842, and what they believe to have been the understanding, of the United States. The United States Government declare exactly the reverse as being their understanding, and what they believe to have been our understanding. Here we have assertion against assertion. What proofs does either side bring forth? Sir Thomas Henry is the first in these papers to make the assertion that has been adopted by Her Majesty's Government. It is hardly consistent with what he stated to the Committee in 1848, and he brought forward no proof whatever in support of his belief. It remains, therefore, simply an expression of his belief—a statement which no one who knew Sir Thomas Henry could for a moment doubt; but yet only a statement of his own belief. What other evidence does the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) adduce? A statement made 10 years ago by himself as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and one made on the same occasion by the noble Lord now on the Woolsack as Attorney General. These statements were obiter dicta during a debate when the two noble Lords were arguing against a provision being introduced which the noble and learned Lord said added a new term to the Treaty of 1842. The statement of the noble Lord—then Lord Stanley—though not quite so clear as he usually makes them, is perfectly consistent with the theory he now holds. The Attorney General's statement is not inconsistent with that theory; but, at the same time, it is also not inconsistent with the opposite theory to which I will presently allude. The words are—

“We should certainly have a well-founded complaint against any country that demanded a man to be given up for one offence, and then proceeded to try and punish him for another.”—
[3 Hansard, clxxxiv. 2122.]

This is not inconsistent with the view of the noble Earl nor with my own. I also hold that we should have ground of complaint if a foreign country, on receiving a man extradited for one offence, instead of trying him for that offence, should substitute another, or should proceed to try and punish him for that. The difference between us is this—while I believe we should have a right to complain of this proceeding, I contend that under this particular Treaty we should have no right to complain if another country, having bond fide tried the man for the offence on which he was surrendered, should then proceed to try him for a second offence; and the words of the Attorney General do not necessarily go further than this. But be that as it may, there remains no proof on the side of the Government excepting these two sentences uttered in the heat of a debate. What proofs are alleged on the other side? First the dicta of text writers. Such dicta are always quoted on international controversies, and I should therefore have thought had some weight. But as they are summarily disposed of in the despatch of Lord Derby as of trifling importance, I will not trouble your Lordships with the quotations, which you can find in Mr. Fish's argument. But there is another witness entirely in their favour whom the United States quote, who is treated with as little reverence as the text writers. It is the noble Lord behind me, who, as Mr. Hammond, was 50 years in the Foreign Office, and who during half the time the Treaty lasted was the head of the permanent staff of the Foreign Office. He is one who knows all the traditions of the Foreign Office, good, bad, and indifferent—absolutely by heart, and who was lately so gracefully alluded to by Lord Derby as his teacher in foreign affairs. If Mr. Hammond had merely stated his own opinion on the construction which had been accepted by the Foreign Office as to a particular Treaty, I can imagine no stronger witness in Great Britain; but Mr. Hammond expressly stated in his evidence before the Committee of 1868 that his opinion was in accordance with that of the Law Officers. There is another witness, Mr. Mullens, an eminent solicitor, who has been more engaged in extradition cases than anyone. He not only gave his opinion as to the understanding of the Treaty by this country in the opposite sense to the present contention of the Government, but he mentioned a case—that of the Heilbronn, who was tried for a second offence after having been tried for the offence for which he was surrendered—a case concerning which the Government can only answer that they were ignorant of it, and were not concerned in the case. To sum up the evidence given before the Committee of 1868. There were six witnesses. Of these Sir Thomas Henry, Mr. Hammond, and Mr. Mullens gave the opinions that I have quoted, and not one of the other three witnesses gave an opposite opinion. What other evidence is there in favour of the United States Government? As to the understanding which existed in both countries, they have the decisions of Courts in the States, and the cases of persons actually tried for a second offence. There are also the decisions of the Courts of the Dominion of Canada in the same sense—and from what I hear the Government of the Dominion are much concerned, and entirely repudiate the position which Her Majesty's Government have taken. But what appears in the last batch of Papers which have just been presented? Those Papers show three things. In the first place, they show that 11 years ago Mr. Seward informed our Government of the construction which the United States then put on the Treaty, which is diametrically opposite to that now held here, and which disposes of the assertion of the contrary understanding on the part of the Government of the United States. Secondly, they point to the case of Burley before the Act of 1870, on which the Foreign Secretary, Lord Russell, gave his opinion in communication with the Colonial Secretary, Lord Cardwell, and upon advice of the Law Officers—who I believe were the late Lord Chancellor, who is sitting behind me, and the present Master of the Rolls—that it would be a breach of faith to substitute another offence for that for which Burley was surrendered; but that if Burley were bond fide tried for the first offence it would be difficult under the Treaty to question the right of the Government to try him for any other offence, whether such offence was or was not a ground of extradition, or even without the Treaty. Does the Burley case prove that the present contention has always been maintained by the Government of the United States and by Her Majesty's Government? In my opinion it proves diametrically the reverse. Well, what does the Caldwell case prove? The Caldwell case is summed up in the following letter:—

“Downing Street, May 16, 1871.

“My Lord,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's despatch of the 20th of February relating to the case of Richard Caldwell, who was surrendered to the United States Government under the Extradition Treaty on the charges of forgery and uttering forged paper, and who is alleged to have been subjected to legal proceedings in the United States for an offence against the laws of that country for which he was not surrendered, and for which he was not liable to surrender under that Treaty. I have been in communication with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as to this case, and the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown has been taken upon it. Her Majesty's Government are advised that this is not a case in which they would be justified in claiming the surrender of the petitioner from the United States Government. The obligation of Great Britain under the Convention of 1842 is qualified by no other condition than that evidence of a definite kind shall be forthcoming of the fugitive having committed one of the crimes enumerated in the Convention. It appears that such evidence was produced to the satisfaction of the Canadian authorities, and the petitioner was therefore surrendered to the United States Government. It further appears from the decision of the Judge of the Circuit Court of the Southern District of New York, upon the demurrer of the petitioner, that he has been duly indicted for the offence by reason of which he was surrendered, and it seems that he is to be tried for it. Her Majesty's Government are further advised that there is nothing in the Convention which would preclude the indictment of the petitioner in the United States for an additional offence which is not enumerated in the Convention, so long as such proceedings are not substituted for proceedings against him on the charge by reason of which he was surrendered. The original inclosures which accompanied your despatch are herewith returned in compliance with your request.

"I have, &c.,

"KIMBERLEY."

—[C. 1529, p. 6.]

Unless I have committed some great blunder, it appears to me that I have shown that the different legal positions which have been taken by Her Majesty's Government in this matter are not unassailable. It appears to me that the Papers themselves demonstrate that it is absolutely the reverse of the fact that Her Majesty's Government have always maintained the doctrine which it has been attempted to hold by Her Majesty's present Government. I presume that my noble Friend will hasten to assure the House—if he has not already given that assurance to the United States—that this last declaration was made per incuriam, and I believe that any such declarations would pave the way to more easy negotiations for a future Treaty. I do not know whether he will attempt to defend the conflicting assertions as to law which he has been advised to make. But he has one complete answer as regards the Foreign Office—it is in no sense a legal Department. Until this month there has never been a professional lawyer in the Office, and I am not quite sure that the introduction of the legal element into the Office may not be productive of more embarrassment than advantage. Whenever a legal question has arisen, the Foreign Office has been advised by the highest authorities on it—in the case of extraditions the Foreign Office has always acted Ministerially for the Home Office; and therefore if the noble Earl defends the Foreign Office on the grounds that the legal opinions have been taken from others, although it does not clear the Government at large, the answer is complete as respects the Foreign Office. But how about the policy, for which the Foreign Office is clearly responsible? Would it not have been better to delay protesting till the occasion arose, and thus postpone till it was necessary that which committed us, and obliged the United States to commit themselves—and this more especially as there was not the slightest chance as regards this particular Treaty of danger to the principle of affording an asylum to political offenders? This was the course Mr. Seward took 11 years ago, when, assenting up to a certain point to Lord Russell's doctrine, but going beyond it, he said with good sense—"But this is an abstraction, and I will not deal with what does not arise." But what was the view of Lord Derby? The following letter in reference to the case of Charles L. Lawrence was written in November last by his instructions:—

"I am directed by the Earl of Derby to transmit to you, for the information of Mr. Cross, a further despatch, which was received on the 16th instant from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, from which it appears that the United States Attorney General has instructed the United States District Attorney at New York to the effect that the trial of Lawrence is to be proceeded with on the charge of forgery, for which his extradition was granted, and that if he should be acquitted of that charge the District Attorney is to await further instructions. Under these circumstances Lord Derby would suggest, for Mr. Cross's consideration, whether it would not be advisable that any representation to the United States Government on this subject, should be, in any case, postponed until after the trial of Lawrence for the extradition crime for which he was surrendered, and that any instructions to Sir E. Thornton should be framed accordingly. His Lordship's reasons for this suggestion are that, in the event of Lawrence being convicted of this crime, and not being indicted for any other offence, no representation to the United States Government would be necessary, and that in the event of his being acquitted of the extradition crime, and then indicted for other offences, the opportunity for making a representation to the United States Government would be a more fitting one than at present. In the latter case, also, Her Majesty's Government would be acting with a full knowledge of the course which the United States Government intends to pursue, and would therefore be in a better position to protest, if necessary, than they are at present, as it still appears doubtful whether Lawrence is to be tried for offences other than the extradition crime for which he was surrendered."—[C. 1482, No. 54.]

No opinion could be more judicious, and I am perfectly convinced that if this judicious advice had been adopted we should have heard no more of the question, and we should have avoided all the irritating circumstances which now make the negotiation for a new Treaty so difficult. On the other hand, it must be admitted that if this opinion had prevailed we should now be deprived of the society of three American citizens whose surrender has been demanded but not granted, and who will remain with us for the remainder of their lives or until they shall have been detected in murdering, robbing, or cheating in this country. But the Home Office would not hear of this; they were in such a hurry that their only rejoinder was a direction not only to send off a protest, but to send that protest by telegraph, and they only forwarded their reasons at a subsequent period. Mr. Disraeli announced to the Commons the other day that the Home Secretary is the Chief Secretary of State. He is no such thing. The Secretaries of State are of equal rank, taking formal precedence according to the date of the creation of their respective offices. But in this case the Home Office appears to have assumed some such authority, for not only does it overrule the Foreign Office in a matter which belonged to the latter, but a little later we find the Home Office scolding the Foreign Office for not having made its points with sufficient clearness. The one fault for which I think the Foreign Office is responsible was yielding to the Home Office on a matter on which the latter—perhaps naturally enough—only took the one-sided view. But, whoever is to blame, this question of Extradition has come to a dead-lock. I believe the Treaty has not been put an end to; but it remains a dead-letter. It is clear that neither Government will ask for or grant the surrender of any criminal under it. I hear already of cases where criminals have openly boasted of their safety. We have already this year secured for ourselves the society of three persons against whom very grave charges have been made. The late Lord Derby told the House of Commons that an Extradition Treaty was of much greater importance to us than the United States—especially with regard to Canada. I do not care to enter into the proportionate share of inconvenience which each country—the commercial communities above all—will have to bear, but we must not conceal from ourselves that the evil is not to be measured by the number of Extradition cases which have occurred. It is rather to be gauged by the amount of crime which will be augmented by the increased chances of impunity to the criminal. In these circumstances I trust that the Government will see their way to some mode of extricating ourselves and the United States from this difficulty. Is there no hope that the delay which was asked for last week may result in our being told this evening that the United States are conceding the differences that still exist as to the terms of a new Treaty? The difference which remained when the late Government went out of office was so small that some arrangement ought to be arrived at on it. The Act of 1870 was a good Act, and has produced much good; but can any one say that it had attained the perfection of human wisdom on this matter? It is certainly the opinion of many competent persons that it could be made more elastic as regards the Extradition of ordinary criminals, without in the least degree affecting the right of asylum to political offenders. The two countries have hitherto been prominent in the discharge of the sacred duty of maintaining that right. During the 30 years that the Treaty has existed—although civil war and Fenian disturbances have arisen, neither Government ever dreamed under any pretence of asking for the surrender of political offenders. There is another suggestion which I venture to throw out—it was proposed eight years ago that instead of Treaties we should have a law applicable to the demands of all countries for the Extradition of criminals, without troubling ourselves whether the other countries responded or not. It was considered at the time, and it was decided, that it was better to proceed by Treaties under a general law. But times are now changed. We have Treaties with nearly all the principal countries in the world, except Russia and the United States. If we passed such a law, being of a reasonable character, and somewhat more elastic than the present, it is almost certain that the United States would avail themselves of it, and would, as has already been suggested to them in America, pass a law on their side. It is for the interests of both countries to obtain their own fugitive criminals, and it is not in their interest to monopolize the possession of the fugitive scoundrels of other countries. I should prefer a new Treaty cordially agreed to; but I throw out this suggestion in case Her Majesty's Government find difficulties arising in negotiation for a Treaty, which would not occur in separate legislation. But whatever the course may be which Her Majesty's Government think fit to pursue, this House will agree with me in the conviction that the Government will not be satisfied with having written a smart argumentative despatch to conclude the discussion; but will apply themselves heartily to the work of changing a state of things which Sir Robert Peel eloquently denounced more than a quarter of a century ago as a public disgrace—namely, that two such countries as Great Britain and the United States should each consent to remain a refuge for the criminals of the other.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, before I go into the main question which the noble Earl (Earl Granville) has raised, I may be allowed to refer to the request I was reluctantly compelled to make on last Friday night for a postponement of this discussion until to-day. I had up to the present time hoped to be able to make a statement this evening material to the actual condition of the facts. I was entitled to entertain that opinion from a communication made to me from a quarter which I could not doubt. Since Friday, however, I have received no communication on the subject, and I am not at present in a position to make any such statement to the House as I had hoped to do. My only justification, therefore, for asking for delay on Friday last is that I did not ask it for my own convenience, or in the interest of the Government, but for the interest of both countries. The question which the noble Earl has raised has been so long and so often before the public that all the facts and the arguments on both sides, embodied in the Correspondence lately laid before the House, are presumably familiar to your Lordships and to all who have cared to acquaint themselves with the subject. I propose, therefore, in explaining the course which the Government has taken, to confine myself as nearly as possible to a general statement of the principles on which we have acted. Putting it briefly, the controversy between the American Government and ours is this: We take different views of what is meant by Extradition and of the construction which is to be placed on the Treaty between the two countries. The American contention is that when the forms prescribed by Treaty have been gone through, and when Extradition has once been effected, the person so extradited is for all purposes in the hands of the Government which has received him, although he may have been acquitted of the charge on which the Extradition was granted—although in the original demand for his surrender no mention was made of any other imputed offence—and even although the offence for which he is put on his trial a second time may be one not included in the list of Extradition crimes. They argue, in short, that, once in their hands, and having been tried for the Extradition offence, he remains in their hands for all other purposes. We, on the other side, contend that a person who has taken refuge in England and has been surrendered after certain legal proceedings for the purpose of being tried on a specific charge, is only lent, so to speak, to the Government which claims him for the purposes of that trial; and if upon the charge so brought he is not found guilty, then we say he is entitled to his freedom and cannot be claimed again, except after a repetition of the preliminary inquiry which is necessary before Extradition is granted—which, of course, implies that he must have an opportunity of returning to England. These are the two opposite views which are represented in the Correspondence, and which each side has endeavoured to support by argument. The American Case seems to rest mainly on this—that the Treaty contains no express stipulation on the subject—that it simply provides a method by which the accused person shall be surrendered to the Government claiming him; and that, in the absence of anything said to the contrary, the Government or the Courts of Law, once legally in possession of the man, are personally entitled to deal with him, subject to restraint except that which is imposed by its own laws. The Americans further argue that on certain occasions the right which they claim has been exercised—no objection made, and that it has been exercised in England, by English Courts as well as in the United States. I admit that the Treaty contains no stipulation on the subject—the case, as we conceive, not having been provided for by those who framed it. But, on that part of the case, our answer is that the right which they claim is contrary to the general spirit and intention of the Treaty; contrary to what has always been understood as the practice; contrary, also, to the principles laid down both by the British Parliament and the American Congress. We contend that the Government surrendering an accused person does so only after having satisfied itself by means of a judicial inquiry that there is a reasonable prima facie case which justifies the putting him on his trial for an offence named within the Treaty—just as no man can be tried here without first being committed by a magistrate, or, in some cases, without a true bill being found against him. It is also necessary that it should be shown to the satisfaction of the magistrate so committing the person for Extradition that the offence of which he is charged is included among Extradition offences and is not political in its character. Now, we say that both these safeguards are absolutely done away with if it is understood that a man extradited for one offence can be tried for another without a fresh extradition being made. A man is charged, say, with forgery. Extradition is granted. He is tried in America, and acquitted. It is clear that if all the facts which came out on the trial had been known to the committing magistrate he would not have been extradited at all on that charge. What right, then, has the State, which has only got hold of him as presumably guilty of that offence, to deal with him on another charge in a way that they could not have done if he had not been in the first instance unjustly accused? They are, in such a case as I have supposed—I use the phrase in a legal and not in a moral sense—taking advantage of their own wrong. They have already subjected him to a forced deportation across the Atlantic and to the inconvenience of a trial which has ended in his acquittal, and they then take advantage of having him in their possession—which, as the facts have turned out, they never ought to have had—to try him for something else as to which, if he had remained in England, it is quite possible that extradition would never have been granted. If we admit, as we must, that the Treaty is silent on the subject—that it includes no express words to meet this class of cases—it seems to me that we are fairly entitled to contend that this is not a proceeding contemplated when the Treaty was framed or reconcilable with its general spirit. The Treaty says—“Before a man is surrendered to take his trial there must be a preliminary inquiry in the country which gives him up.”

The American construction of the Treaty says—“He is entitled to such preliminary inquiry in regard to the first offence for which we put him on his trial, but for any other offences, however many or of whatever kind, there need be no preliminary inquiry whatever.” Now, that is just the one position which seems to me at least logically untenable. You may argue for the necessity of preliminary inquiry in all cases; you may argue on the other hand that such investigations are an unnecessary form, because if you trust the Government to which you surrender the man, you may be assured, without such inquiry, that they will try him fairly, and if you do not trust the Government to deal fairly, you should not surrender him at all. Either of these alternatives, I think, is fairly defensible; but it is not consistent with either theory to say—“We will give the accused the security of a previous inquiry in regard to the first offence for which he is tried, but we will not give it him in regard to any other charge subsequently brought against him.” But as regards the intention of our Government and Parliament we are not left to mere abstract reasoning or inference. We know by the Act of 1870 what was and is the mind of the Legislature on the question of principle involved. The Act of 1870 provides that no surrendered fugitive shall be tried in the country which has demanded his extradition for any offence other than the extradition crime proved by the facts on which the surrender is grounded. Words cannot be plainer. Now, I do not quote that Act, as I have been understood to do in America, as having a retrospective effect on Treaties previously concluded. I fully admit that there is a proviso which, though obscurely worded, seems to except, and no doubt was meant to except, the case of Treaties actually in force. I have a right to say that it is obscurely worded, for three Judges who endeavoured to construe it expressed doubt as to its meaning. It could not, in fact, be otherwise; because if the provisions of the Treaty of 1842 had been retrospectively affected by the Act of 1870, it would have been a matter of necessity either to alter the Treaty or to modify the Act. But I do quote the Act as showing what is the principle which Parliament has laid down, and also as showing that that principle was not considered inconsistent with the Treaty. If it had been so considered, does anybody suppose that the two would have been allowed to remain side by side? We could not maintain—the Government of the day never surely intended to maintain—in a question affecting the administration of justice, one rule for countries which had made Treaties with us before 1870 and another for those that had not. If, therefore, we left the Act of 1870 to stand side by side with the Treaty of 1842, it could only have been because we did not think them inconsistent in principle the one with the other. But I do not rest on that alone. In the English Act of 1843, passed immediately after the conclusion of the Treaty, the Secretary of State is authorized to order the delivery of the person committed to an officer who is “to convey such person to the territories of the United States to be tried for the crime of which such person shall be so accused.” And not only that, but the United States Legislature adopted almost identical language. The Act of Congress of 1848 follows the very words of ours, and says that the accused person who is extradited from America shall be delivered up to be tried for the crime of which such person shall be so accused. Now, without wishing to lay too much stress on a phrase, that seems to me very nearly equivalent to saying that he is not to be tried for any other crime except that of which he is so accused. The words are not required, and, indeed, have hardly a meaning, if you put any other construction upon them. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) says—“The United States do not put that sense upon it, and you are very bold if you question their construction of their own statute.” But it is written in English, it is following the words of the English Act, and surely an Englishman may venture to construe plain words in his own language? Sir Thomas Henry advised that in a new Treaty, words should be inserted to make the meaning plainer, and the noble Earl wants to know why he did so if they were plain already? But surely there is nothing inconsistent in saying that certain things are laid down in a Treaty, but that it would be desirable that they should be more clearly expressed. It is contended, however, that it is no longer open to us to maintain the construction of the Treaty for which we argue, because we ourselves have on various occasions accepted a different interpretation. Now, I do not want to go into more detail than I can help, but I will take these various cases one by one. There is the case of Heilbronn. He was surrendered by the United States on a charge of forgery, and tried in a British Court for that offence. He was acquitted of forgery, but convicted of larceny. He never appealed against the conviction, nor did the United States take the matter up; and, as a matter of fact, there is no reason to suppose that the circumstances of the conviction were even known to the Government here. It cannot be said, therefore, that in this case there was any admission on our part. The Court was not able to take into consideration the question of Treaty, and it does not appear to have been ever before the Court. The question, in fact, was never decided, because it was never argued or raised. The case of Bouvier was a case which arose under the Extradition Treaty with France. In that case again no action was taken or required to be taken by the Government, the French law making it impossible that the man should be tried for any offence except that on which he was extradited. The only noticeable point in this case is that the Attorney General for the time being, in the year 1872—that is in a Government of which the noble Earl opposite was a Member—is reported in the newspapers of the day to have said that—

“It was the law of France, and of every civilized country, that a man given up for an extradition offence should not be tried except for the offence for which he was given up. For this Government to give a man up otherwise would be a most serious infringement of the right of asylum.”

We have never laid down the principle more strongly. I do not see how it is to be reconciled with the language held in the Canadian cases—but that is not my business. The Canadian cases are six in number. In two of them the prisoners had been surrendered by the United States, and were tried in Canada; and the Courts seem to have held that being in custody they were liable to be tried for any offence which the facts might support. In two others, application was made by the United States for the surrender by Canada of prisoners who had taken refuge there, and the Canadian Courts held that they were not justified, by the mere fact that the new Act of 1870 did not secure these against trial for any other offence, in refusing to give them up. That is not a decision on any other point except the wording of the Act of 1870. It does not bear, as far as I can see, on the question of Treaty construction at all. In all these four cases, if I am right, there is absolutely nothing to show that the Home Government was consulted at all; and I need not say that the decision of a Canadian Court of Justice cannot bind the Government here, which probably knew nothing of the matter. The two remaining cases were those of Burley and Caldwell. Burley was surrendered by the Canadian Government to the United States on a charge of robbery. It was represented to the British Government that there was an intention of trying him on a charge of piracy, which had not been mentioned in the demand for his Extradition. Upon that the Law Officers were consulted; they reported, no doubt, in a sense partially favourable to the present American construction of the Treaty. But they advised that it was our right to protest against any attempt to change the ground of accusation. A protest was made accordingly; and led to a reply from Mr. Seward which is so important that I wish to quote it at length—

“ Mr. Seward to Mr. Burnley.

“ Department of State, Washington,

“ March 20, 1865.

“ Sir,—I recur to your note of the 15th of March, which relates to P. G. Burley. The honourable the Attorney General informs me that it is his purpose to bring the offender to trial in the Courts of the States of Ohio and Michigan for the crimes committed by him against the municipal laws of those States—namely, robbery and assault, with intent to commit murder. He was delivered up by the Canadian authorities upon a requisition which was based upon charges of those crimes, and also upon a charge of piracy, which is triable not by State Courts, but by the Courts of the United States. I am not prepared to admit the principle claimed in the Protest of Her Majesty's Government that the offender could not legally be tried for the crime of piracy under the circumstances of the case. Nevertheless, the question raised upon it has become an abstraction, as it is at present the purpose of the Government to bring him to trial for the crimes against municipal law only.

“ I have, &c.,

[C. 1528. No. 6.]

“ W. H. SEWARD.”

Mr. Seward, therefore, was under the impression—though I believe it proved to be a mistake—that piracy was among the charges on which Burley was surrendered. It does not seem that the Protest was renewed, and our official knowledge of the facts ends here. Mr. Fish in his recent Note says that he was tried for assault with intent to kill; but that is a fact of which, till this Correspondence, we had no information. The case of Caldwell is generally similar. He was surrendered by the Canadian Government on a charge of forgery. He was subsequently indicted in the United States for bribing a Custom-house officer, as well as for the forgery. He pleaded that the Court ought not to take cognizance of the offence; the Court overruled the plea on the ground that it was one for the Governments concerned to entertain, but which could not be dealt with by a Court of Law. He therefore appealed to the Canadian Government. The matter was referred home, and the Law Officers advised that the case was not one in which Her Majesty's Government would be justified in claiming his surrender. He had at that time not been tried for the Extradition offence; and it was intended to put him on his trial for that offence. The decision not to interfere in the matter was communicated to the Governor of Canada; and there the case ended so far as we are concerned. Now, I am not about to deny that these two cases show clearly enough that the view of our international duty taken by the then Law Officers is different from that which we have been advised to adopt. But I deny altogether that that difference of views disposes of our case. I speak with the highest respect of the Legal Advisers of the Governments of 1864 and of 1870, but they would not claim that their opinion could bind their Successors. And observe this—that though they do not advise that in certain cases a claim should be pressed—though they express doubt whether it ought to be pressed—yet in no part of this Correspondence has the claim ever been abandoned. We have never said to the American Government that we thought it one which could not be justly advanced. We have simply forborne to press it in certain cases. And it is possible and conceivable that other motives may have operated besides those of a judicial or administrative character. I can quite understand that, considering the state of things that existed between England and America, both in 1864 and 1870, reasons of a political character may have indisposed the then Governments to press any demand on the United States as to which in their minds any doubt may have existed, or as to which there was a moral certainty that they would not be acceded to. I am not attacking what they did; but I contend that to waive a right on one occasion, or on two, is not to abandon it; that the opinions of the Law Officers of one Government, however deserving of respect, are not international documents; and that as between the United States and England nothing has passed which amounts to an abandonment of the claim which we put forward in this Correspondence. I now come to the question which I have heard raised, and which has been raised by the noble Earl this evening—whether, even admitting our construction of the Treaty to be defensible, we have asserted it in the right way. It is argued that we ought to have waited until some actual violation of the Treaty, as we construe it, had occurred, and that we had no right to call on the United States Government to abandon their construction of it—that we ought, in short, to have taken no action unless some person surrendered by us was actually put on his trial a second time. My answer is, that is shutting the door after the steed is stolen. The question is not one of law, but of reason and common sense. When it is evident that an engagement is understood by the two parties to it in a different sense, the sooner that difference is cleared up the better. What would happen if we took the course suggested? Why, that the United States Government would, sooner or later, act on their presumed right, as they had given us notice that they would do; that we should dispute the legality of their action, and that we should be obliged by our expressed opinion to demand that a prisoner actually in their hands should be given back. That is a demand with which in their view of the case they could not honourably comply—and there you have a diplomatic complication ready made, and which it would be impossible to determine without the defeat, if not the humiliation, of one or the other party. Is it not better that we should deal with it while it remains an abstract question? I do not think it a wise or prudent policy to incur an inevitable and serious risk in the future in order to secure a respite from trouble at the moment. I hear it said, again, that the risk run by conceding the question at issue is trifling; that the inconvenience of passing it by is great, and that we had better have settled the matter anyhow than have left it open. My Lords, I cannot admit that, as English Ministers, we are justified in treating as immaterial a principle on which Parliament, six years ago, laid so much stress as to embody it in express terms in an Act of Parliament, passed after much inquiry and debate. Parliament might release us from the obligation which it has imposed, but we cannot release ourselves. And this principle is not unimportant. It really involves the whole question of political asylum. I have no wish to talk clap-trap about the right of asylum, but we know how strongly the question has taken possession of the public mind in this country. Now, take such a case as this—a French refugee, mixed up in the affairs of the Commune, is asked for by his own Government, bond fide, on a charge of a non-political character. He is surrendered, he is tried, and acquitted or condemned, as the case may be. But while in the hands of the French authorities on that charge, they discover that this is the man they have been looking for on account of political disturbances, and after his acquittal they proceed to try him for that. Would not that be a case which, however worthless the person might be, would excite strong feeling in England? And yet what security have you that such a case might not occur if you abandon the principle that the extradited person ought to be free to return after trial on the extradition charge? It is said, I know, that we are discussing the question only with the United States, and that there is no fear of any question of the kind arising with the United States, because their feeling in such matters is the same as ours. To that I have a double answer. In the first place, I do not think that, looking at it as a matter of business—I do not think that it is wise to rest upon the supposed good disposition of other Powers as a sufficient substitute for those guarantees which you consider necessary as private prisoners.

The Earl of Derby

We do not do our ordinary business as private persons in that way; we do not suppose everybody is going to cheat us, but when we pay money we generally take a receipt. There is another consideration. We have again and again said that the intention of the American Government is not sufficient, for the separate States may act independently of the Federal Government. It might, therefore, very well happen that, whatever the wishes of the Executive might be, they would have no power to prevent the man from being tried. Besides, we are not laying down a principle that is to govern our arrangements with the United States merely, but with all civilized countries in the old and the new world, and it would be a very invidious distinction to say you would have one law to govern your relations with America and another to govern your relations with other Powers. You are bound to consider, not only what is likely to happen in reference to America, France, or Germany, but in any one of those countries with which we have Treaties of this kind. Such is in brief our case. I will not take your Lordships through the argument in detail, as it is set out in the published Correspondence. But I may remind you of one fact—that there have been negotiations going on for a new Treaty, which extended over a considerable time. In the draft of that new Treaty we proposed an Article embodying the principle for which we are now contending, and the Government of the United States, so far from objecting, accepted the Article, and did more: they proposed to strengthen it by words which should make the meaning clearer and more precise. The failure to conclude a new Treaty turned on an altogether different point; but upon this point the Governments were absolutely at one. It is no doubt one thing to say this or that should be put in a Treaty; another to say it is there already; but I think the fact I have stated is evidence that there is nothing in principle unreasonable in the view we have taken, and also—what is quite as important—it shows that there is no such difference between the two countries as should prevent the negotiation of a new Treaty. The noble Earl concluded his address by an appeal to me that we should do what we can to put an end to the inconvenience that must arise out of this transaction. With the concluding sentences of the noble Earl's speech I entirely concur. Nobody is insensible on either side the water to the inconvenience that would be caused by an even temporary suspension of extradition. Whether the inconvenience will be greater to us than to the United States it is no use disputing. The two countries have absolutely the same interests, and the differences are not of a kind to be very difficult of arrangement. We shall at once renew the negotiation formerly interrupted; it will be an advantage to all parties, for everybody admits that the old Treaty is imperfect and unsatisfactory, and what I think we ought to aim at is the establishment, if it is likely that the negotiations will last some time, of what diplomatists call a modus vivendi—a provisional arrangement which shall prevent rascals from benefiting by the falling out of honest men. I do not think it is a disadvantage that this question should have arisen. There is an ambiguity in many respects in our Extradition Treaty with the United States, and there are many reasons for superseding it by a new one, and we shall do all in our power to see that that is done.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that as to the right of asylum there could be no dispute as to maintaining our protection to political offenders who might find their way to our shores—the only question was what would be most efficacious for that purpose? He quite agreed with the observations of the noble Earl on the duty of the Government to maintain the right of asylum; but the point in question was not whether the right of asylum should be maintained, but whether the particular mode in which the Government had dealt with the question was the right one. The argument was, that if our Government surrendered a criminal for a particular offence it was not open to a foreign Government to take advantage of its own wrong and try him for another. But it seemed to him that our duty was to refuse to deliver up any offender who, there was reason to believe, would be put on his trial for a political offence; but in the case of a person being surrendered for one crime, not political, and being tried for another of a similar kind he did not think we had any right to interfere. If a man had committed an offence why should we interfere to protect him against punishment? All that was required was that we should take care that a person delivered up should not be tried for a political offence—and, as to all other cases, that he should be prima facie an offender. The noble Earl seemed to lay down the proposition that the Government of the United States ought to conform their interpretation of the Treaty of 1842 to the Statute of 1870. But so far as the Treaty was concerned the Statute might be put aside—for a municipal Statute could have no effect on a Treaty between nations contracted 18 years before—it could neither modify terms already embraced in the Treaty nor introduce new conditions. It was the common interest of all civilized people that crime should be punished, and it did not seem to him to be our duty to scrutinize narrowly the criminal law of foreign countries: all we had to do was to guard against criminals being tried for political offences in addition to the crimes for which they were surrendered. The Treaty itself was the only document which could properly be taken into consideration in forming an opinion on the subject. Now, in the Treaty the sole condition laid down for the surrender of a criminal was that there should be sufficient prima facie evidence shown to put him on his trial, and if any other condition was intended to apply the absence of all mention of it was incomprehensible. Surely the natural presumption in this case was that no condition other than that laid down in the Treaty was intended to take effect. But if the view of the case taken by the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary was correct, the result would be that in every case in which there was a plurality of charges against a fugitive from justice who might take refuge in this country, that the country claiming his extradition would be put to the trouble and expense of bringing over to this country all the witnesses to establish a prima facie case against him on each charge; else, if acquitted or not brought to trial on one charge, he would escape from them all; and he could not see what possible interest we could have in securing him that immunity. The United States Government very justly remarked that the view taken by our Government had not always been adopted in England. Indeed, he did not understand how the noble Earl opposite, in view of the cases before him, could have asserted, as he did in one of his despatches, that one of the essential principles of extradition, as invariably practised in this country, was that an extradited person could only be tried for the crime on which he was surrendered. The fact was that two previous Governments had taken a different view, and in making the statement which he did the noble Earl certainly gave an advantage to the American Government. He (the Earl of Kimberley) could not help thinking that the error of the Foreign Secretary was due to the great haste with which the matter was considered—only two days having elapsed from the time the subject was brought under the notice of the noble Earl till he committed himself to the view, taken without sufficient inquiry, as it appeared, by the Home Secretary. The Law Officers were not consulted till a later date, and it was rather a singular fact that their views were never referred to in the Correspondence; and he inferred from that that their view was not quite in accordance with that taken by the Home Office. He regretted the haste with which the noble Earl had taken action in the matter. In his last despatch the Foreign Secretary maintained that the claim to interpret the Treaty in a particular manner amounted to a breach of contract; he could not understand how a contract could be broken until some act was done by one of the parties in violation of its conditions, and he was inclined to think that if the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary had waited until he saw what the issue would be, neither Lawrence nor Winslow would have really been tried for any other offence than the one on which they had been surrendered. And considering that the Treaty had been executed without difficulty for a period exceeding 30 years, that there was no actual breach of the Treaty, and looking to the disposition which the United States Government had shown not to press their view to the utmost, he believed that the noble Earl might, with a little more patience and forbearance, have saved the Treaty from the abrupt termination at which it had, unfortunately, arrived.

EARL GREY said, he could not help thinking that in this discussion the importance of what was called the right of political asylum had been exaggerated in a manner which was likely to lead to dangerous consequences. He admitted that it was not fit that this country should give up to the vengeance of a tyrannical Government men who had risked their lives to obtain liberty for their country; and no doubt we should be utterly disgraced if we surrendered men who had stood out against such a Government as that of the late King of Naples, or against such an act as the partition of Poland. But he thought it was a mistake to push so far as there seemed now to be a disposition to do, the principle that we were bound in all cases to take care that persons who had been guilty of political offences should enjoy a secure asylum in this country. He held that the attempt to disturb by force a settled Government which performed, though perhaps imperfectly, the duty of all Governments in maintaining peace and order, was a crime which, unless provoked by extreme oppression, was not only legally and technically, but morally, one of the greatest that men could commit. Looking at the enormous amount of evil which arose from civil war, he said that those who acted in that way were not entitled to the sympathy of mankind. Therefore, he thought it was a great mistake to say that because there was some possible danger that in some very unlikely case a man might be punished for what was in itself an offence—namely, resistance to a settled Government—in consequence of measures adopted to protect society against ordinary criminals, they were to neglect to make the arrangements with other countries which were absolutely necessary for the prevention of crime. The perils to society and to the maintenance of order would be very great if they were to push to the extreme, which had been recommended from both sides of the House, the claim to political asylum at the risk of preventing the surrender of ordinary criminals. They should take care how they established a state of things which would offer enormous inducements to men either in England or in America, who might think there was an opportunity, by some great crime, of realizing a large sum of money and then going to the other side of the Atlantic, to enjoy their spoil in peace. He found from the Correspondence that the Secretary of State contended that no man should be tried in the country to which he was surrendered except for the one offence on which his surrender had been demanded. He believed that the American Government were perfectly right in saying that there was no provision of that kind in the Treaty of 1842, and that in the absence of any such provision we had no right now to introduce that rule. But independently of this conclusive objection, as he thought it, to the course of the Government in this matter, he thought it was also objectionable on other grounds. Was it desirable, when they surrendered a man who was bond fide accused of one particular offence, that he should not be tried, convicted, or punished for any other offence which in the course of the proceedings it might come out that he had committed? He said that that was contrary to the common interests of all civilized society. A remarkable case lately occurred which proved the inconvenience of such a rule. A number of men were tried in this country for a most atrocious crime on board the Lennie. Some of them were convicted, and were most properly hanged; but with respect to the others, the evidence given on the trial was insufficient to convict them of murder, but clearly proved they had been accessories after the fact, and because this was not one of the crimes for which offenders could be given up by our Extradition Treaty with France, they entirely escaped from punishment. The inconvenient consequences which must follow from adopting the view of Her Majesty's Government were shown by the circumstances of the case which had led to this discussion. Winslow had been charged with having committed 14 or 15 distinct acts of forgery; but witnesses had been sent to this country from the United States in support of one charge only, as needless expense and trouble would have been incurred in sending more. In the event of his being surrendered he ought, in the view of Her Majesty's Government, only to be tried upon that one single charge; and therefore if, through the breaking down of the evidence, or some technicality of the law, he succeeded in escaping from conviction upon that one charge, the United States Government would be precluded from trying him upon any of the other charges, and the end might be that a notorious criminal might get off altogether. Such a result would not, in his opinion, be for the advantage of the civilized world. The subject seemed to him to have been dealt with upon a wrong principle—that of an undue anxiety for the security of political offenders. He did not mean to say that in any case persons charged with political crimes ought to be given up to be tried for them. Although he considered—as he had already said—that the attempt to overthrow by violence a settled and even tolerably good government was a very heinous crime, he quite agreed that it was not one for which a man charged with it ought to be surrendered if he had taken refuge in that country. But it was quite a different matter to contend that, having been guilty of sedition or rebellion, they ought to protect a man from being given up to be tried for murder or for forgery. This seemed to him to be pushing the principle of protecting offenders to an absurdity. By doing this we were now left practically without any system of extradition between this country and the United States, and taking into consideration the close relation that existed between the two nations, and especially the position towards each other of the United States and Canada, the evil that would result from this immunity of fugitive criminals would be enormous. He was, therefore, of opinion that the Government had made a very unfortunate mistake in the course they had taken. He must add that he thought the mistake aggravated by an excuse offered for what had been done. It was with much regret that he heard the noble Earl opposite say that our action on this subject must be largely influenced by a feeling of sympathy for political offenders. If the people of this country were unduly influenced by that feeling it was the duty of the statesmen and the leading men in both Houses of Parliament to endeavour to set them right on the point, and to show them that it was not for the sake of maintaining the freedom of political offenders, on behalf of whom, too often, an undue amount of sympathy was excited, that we should run the risk of allowing ordinary criminals to escape a just punishment. There was another and a very important point on which he wished to make an observation. He had observed with great regret that the Papers on this subject which had been laid before Parliament afforded an additional example of a mistaken system which had grown up of late years, under which the differences of opinion entertained by the various Departments were exposed to the whole world. It appeared to him that that practice was calculated to break down and destroy the authority of Government, which was one and undivided in responsibility, and it was highly undesirable that where a difference of opinion existed its existence should be exposed to the knowledge of the world. The former, and, as he conceived, the proper, rule had been to consider the Government, as a whole, responsible for every measure of all the departments of which it was composed, and therefore not to publish discussions between these departments as to what was to be done. It had always been the practice, when the course to be pursued on any subject had been settled, to embody the result in a letter from one Department to another; but it was quite a new practice within a few years, and a most unfortunate one, to include in the Papers laid before Parliament the preliminary correspondence between the Departments by which the result was arrived at. The inconvenience of the practice had been illustrated in the present case, where the United States Minister had been able to quote the opinion of one Department against that of another.

LORD HAMMOND: My Lords, I should not have troubled your Lordships with any observations on the present occasion, if the evidence which I gave before the Committee of the House of Commons in 1868 had not been so much alluded to in the Correspondence presented to your Lordships' House. I, of course, was not a Member of that Committee; but I was in constant communication respecting it with my much esteemed and lamented Colleague, Mr. Edward Egerton, who, as Parliamentary Under Secretary of State, represented the Foreign Office on the Committee.

The object for which that Committee was appointed was not to modify or set aside existing Treaties of Extradition, but rather to devise means for negotiating and concluding other similar Treaties which should not be subject to discussion and objection in Parliament, such as had proved fatal to the Treaties concluded with France in 1852 and with Prussia in 1864; and it was suggested to the Committee that the precedent of the Seamen Deserters Act might be followed, which defines the condition and the process—namely, an Order in Council, by which such deserters might be returned to their ships; and that accordingly an Act of Parliament should be passed, setting forth the terms on which this country would grant Extradition, and that then Foreign Powers should be invited to accede to its conditions, whereupon an Order in Council would be issued, bringing the Act into operation as regarded the acceding Power without further reference to Parliament.

The attention of the Committee was specially directed to two points—one, that political offenders should not be surrendered; the other, that ordinary criminals should be exempted from being tried for any other than the offence for which they might have been given up.

Six witnesses were examined by that Committee—M. Treitte, an eminent French lawyer, whose evidence bore on the law and practice of France in regard to Extradition; Mr. Farrer, the present Secretary of the Board of Trade, whose evidence was mainly, if not entirely, directed to the working of the Merchant Seamen Deserters Act; Sir Thomas Henry, late Chief Magistrate of Bow Street; Sir Henry Holland, the then legal adviser of the Colonial Office; Mr. Mullens, an eminent solicitor, fully conversant with the practice in cases of Extradition; and the Permanent Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs who has now the honour of addressing your Lordships.

As regards the Extradition of political offenders, there was no difference of opinion between the witnesses. They all agreed that it was a thing not to be thought of, as being repugnant to the general feeling of all nations; and it may not be amiss to cite a passage in the Message of the President of the United States in recommending to the Senate to adopt the Treaty of 1842, in which he says—

“The object has been to exclude all political offences or criminal charges arising from wars or intestine commotions; treason, or misprision of treason, libels, desertions from military service, and other offences of similar character are excluded.”

As regards the exemption of ordinary criminals from trial for offences other than those for which the Extradition might have been granted, there was no very material difference of opinion between the witnesses. They all agreed that it was a thing to be provided against; but two of them—Mr. Mullens, speaking from his own experience, and myself, speaking on the authority of the Law Officers of the Crown in Burley's case—expressed a decided opinion that provided an extradited criminal was bond fide tried for the crime for which he was given up, there was nothing in Treaty or in practice to prevent his being afterwards tried for any other offence. This proviso is consistent with the English Act of 1843, and the American Act of 1848. I do not think that either Sir Thomas Henry or Sir Henry Holland dissented from this opinion, though they objected to the practice, in which objection the other two witnesses concurred.

I confess I was surprised at no allusion having been made except in the American portion of the Correspondence to the fact stated by me that the opinion which I gave rested on the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

The Committee reported their opinion that provision should be made on this point; and this was done by the 2nd clause of the 3rd section of the Act of Parliament of 1870; but the Committee did not recommend that this provision should be applied to existing Treaties, and as if to guard against any supposition to the contrary, a clause was inserted in the 27th section of the Act, saving from its operation anything in existing Treaties inconsistent with it.

I cannot understand how it can be contended that an Act of Parliament which neutralized the effect of an existing Treaty is not inconsistent with it.

But Her Majesty's Government say that independently of the Act of 1870 there was a generally-received understanding on the subject such as that for which they contended. It is singular that no allusion was made to this understanding during the interval that elapsed between 1842 and 1875. The American Government distinctly deny the existence of any such understanding; which, indeed, could not be operative as against the United States, where the several States of the Union are only bound to respect Treaties sanctioned by the Senate and thereupon promulgated by the President; and I am bound to say that I never heard of its existence, which I could not have failed to do if it had been appealed to, and been resisted, as it would have been then as now, by the United States, in which case it must necessarily have come before me.

But with Lord Russell's despatch of 1865, referring to the opinion of the Law Officers in the Burley case, with my opinion in the same case given on their authority in 1868 before the Committee of the House of Commons, and with Lord Kimberley's despatch of 1871 in the Caldwell case before them, and with the fact that no reference was made to it before the Committee of 1868, I am wholly at a loss to conceive how Her Majesty's Government can contend, as they do, for the existence of an understanding inconsistent with the precise terms of the Treaty of 1842. I would, moreover, observe, that under the 7th Article of the Treaty concluded with France, on the 28th of May, 1852, and signed by Lord Malmesbury and Count Walewski, but which Parliament did not sanction, a person might be proceeded against not only for the crime for which he was specifically given up, but also for any other Extradition crime described in the Convention.

I must beg your Lordships' attention to the mischievous tendency of such a contention as that an Act of Parliament can set aside a Treaty of long standing, which had been sanctioned at the time of its conclusion by a previous Act, and acted upon accordingly. This is not a Party question, my Lords, to be dealt with on Party grounds. It is one in which we are all equally concerned, for it involves the interest and honour of the country. If, as is contended, Parliament, as the supreme legislative authority in the country, can set aside a Treaty, how can we dispute the right of the legislative authority of another country, whether exercised through a Chamber, or existing in the Chief Magistrate of the country, to do the same? and, if so, what security is there for the maintenance of Treaty engagements between States?

We all remember the indignation with which a few years ago a pretension to set aside a provision of the Treaty of 1856, by one of the Powers parties to that Treaty, was received; and we all remember the solemn Protocol of January, 1871, by which such a pretension was repudiated by all the great Powers of Europe.

As matters now stand, there is practically no arrangement in force for the Extradition of criminals between this country and the United States. This may not be attended with much inconvenience as regards England and the United States, the countries not being conterminous; but the case is different as regards the Dominion of Canada, and it may be hoped that some means may be found by which an arrangement can be arrived at.

If without offence I might offer a suggestion, I would say that under existing circumstances Her Majesty's Government would do well at once to denounce the 10th Article of the Ashburton Treaty, which they are enabled to do by the 11th Article of the same Treaty, [if the United States' Government have not already denounced it. It is hopeless to attempt to build up a new Treaty on the ruins of the old one. If in course of time both parties should feel the inconvenience of being without an Extradition Treaty, it may happen that the Government of the United States may be induced to look more favourably on the Act of 1870. They seem already disposed to accept, though in a somewhat modified shape, the condition of the 2nd clause of the 3rd section of that Act; and if they should waive the modification, a Treaty might be concluded without the necessity of having recourse to a fresh Act of Parliament bring it into operation. The other details of such a Treaty would probably cause little difficulty; as though they might not be so extended as the Act would allow, they might not go beyond the limits of the Act; and so the Treaty might be brought into operation Order in Council without further reference to Parliament.

I have to apologize for having occupied so much of your Lordships' time. My excuse must be the interest that I naturally feel in all matters that bear upon the relations of this country with foreign Powers, and the anxiety which I no less naturally feel lest any imputation of remissness in regard to such matters should attach to an Office with which it has been my pride and my happiness for so many years to be connected, and whose especial duty it is to watch over the Treaty engagements of the British Crown, and to see that they are scrupulously observed not only by foreign Powers, but also by ourselves.

Lord Hammond

LORD COLERIDGE said, he entirely concurred in opinion with the noble Earl who raised this discussion (Earl Granville). When the case of Caldwell occurred, his right hon. and learned Friend Sir Robert Collier was Attorney General, and he himself was Solicitor General. He then held the opinion—which he still entertained—that there was no ground for the view which had been maintained by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It happened, too, that the proceedings in the French case which had been referred to (Bouvet) were taken under the advice of himself, as Attorney General, his learned Friend the present Master of the Rolls being then his Colleague as Solicitor General. They were both of opinion that the view brought forward to-night by the noble Earl near him (Earl Granville) was the true view which this country ought to maintain on the subject now under discussion. He and his learned Friend had in other cases also to advise on their own responsibility the Executive Government of that day, and as to the true meaning of the Treaty of 1842 and the Act of 1870, and it never entered their minds that the Treaty or the Act bore the narrow construction now put upon it by the Government. Whether the opinions held by him and his learned Friend were right or wrong, others of course must determine, but at all events those opinions were not taken up lightly or for any political motive. He had always been of opinion that the Act of 1870 could not in any fair construction be considered to have any bearing on Treaties which under statutes previously passed themselves claimed the force of law. Indeed, his argument in the French case was that the French Treaty was in no way affected by the Act of 1870. The Treaty with France was the same, for the purposes of this discussion, as the Treaty with the United States. It was couched, as far as this matter was concerned, in substantially the same language, and it wanted the provision, the absence of which gave rise to the present debate. The argument he adduced before the Court of Queen's Bench was that we were not only justified but bound to surrender to the French Government the person to be tried without any special arrangement in the particular case that he should not be tried for any offence except that for which he was extradited. The majority of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench assented to the correctness of that argument. The only dissentient—if indeed he could be called a dissentient—was Mr. Justice Blackburn, who, however, did not doubt the intention of the Legislature, although he thought it had not been expressed with sufficient precision in the Act of 1870. His contention was that the Court of Queen's Bench had distinctly expressed its opinion that the Act of 1870 could not have any retrospective effect on the Treaty of 1842. It was clear that if we attempted to enforce upon somebody else a provision not contained in the contract we should be endeavouring to enforce something that was inconsistent with it. The argument that we had always acted on the understanding that the person delivered up should be tried only for the offence for which he was extradited, and that this understanding had been imported as an arrangement into all the Treaties made prior to the Act of 1870, appeared to him to be equally without foundation. In the first place, he denied that we had in all cases maintained and acted upon such an understanding. The contention of the Government amounted to this—that a breach of the most technical rules in the construction of a Treaty which ought to have the largest and most free construction between two great nations might make extradition in any case utterly useless. Take, for example, the case of Lawrence, who was said to be guilty of a long course of wholesale fraud. How, he should like to know, could all those charges be dealt with in a foreign country? There was a case now pending in our Courts in which there were 145 different counts, each constituting a separate offence; and was it to be supposed that every one of those could be carefully gone into on the other side of the Channel with endless trouble and at enormous expense, or that a criminal should go scot free for the fear the sacred right of asylum should be violated? He would not, at that hour, enter into the distinction which had been taken by Mr. Fish and the answer of the noble Earl opposite as to the meaning of the section of the Act of 1870. He would content himself simply had been laid before the country; and also to the fact that authentic reports had been laid before Parliament of deputations which waited upon the Government on the Barbadoes question; and that he should then answer the reflections of the right hon. Gentleman.

SLAVE TRADE IN THE RED SEA.

QUESTIONS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in view of the development of the Slave Trade in the Red Sea, and the impediments thrown in the way of British trade and navigation by local officials interested in that traffic, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to revive the Consulate at Massowah and to establish Consular agencies at other Red Sea ports?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the establishment of Consular agencies in the Red Sea ports is one of the measures in contemplation by Her Majesty's Government when an arrangement has been arrived at with the Turkish and Egyptian Governments for the suppression of the Slave Trade in the Red Sea. A draft Convention for carrying out that object is now under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and until that Convention has been signed, it would be premature to appoint Consular officers in the Red Sea for the suppression of the Slave Trade.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether instructions are given to any of Her Majesty's vessels to visit the slave ports in the Red Sea and report on the Slave Trade; if so, whether such reports can be laid upon the Table; and, if not, whether instructions can be given to Officers in command of Her Majesty's vessels to make such visits and reports?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that at the commencement of the year, at the instance of the Foreign Office, instructions were given to some of the smaller ships of war, whether outward or homeward bound, to call at the Red Sea ports, if prevailing winds and other circumstances would permit; but up to the present no Reports of such visits had been received.

Mr. E. Jenkins

THE JUDICATURE ACTS—ISSUES OF FACT IN CHANCERY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (for Sir HENRY JACKSON) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been called to the case of "Cave v. Mackenzie," in which Mr. Baron Huddleston, at the Chelmsford assizes, refused to try an issue of fact directed to be tried there by the Master of the Rolls, and in which the Court of Appeal has determined that they cannot decide between the conflicting views of the Master of the Rolls and Mr. Baron Huddleston on the jurisdiction and obligation to try such issues; and, whether the Government are willing to remove the difficulty by legislation?

MR. MARTEN asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been called to the observations of the Lord Chief Justice of England on Friday last in reference to the proposed trial at the Cambridge Assizes this week of an issue directed by the Master of the Rolls in the case of "The Local Board of Bishop Stortford v. Street and Another," and whether he is prepared to recommend any alteration of the law to prevent the difficulty which has arisen?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, my attention has been called to the case referred to in the first Question. I imagine, however, there has been some misconception, or some degree of misconception, with respect to it. It appears to me, from statements which I have received, that Baron Huddleston did decline to try the issues directed to be tried so much because he considered that under the Judicature Acts and the Rules made in pursuance of them, the Master of the Rolls had no power to direct that the trial should take place at Chelmsford, though he may have entertained some doubt on this subject, but because, owing to the state of business at the Assizes, it was absolutely impossible to dispose of the issues alluded to without interfering most unduly with other causes standing for trial, and legitimately belonging to the Essex cause list. In reply to the second Question, I have observed quite recently—I think on Friday last—the Lord Chief Justice announced his intention of trying certain issues directed by the Chancery Division of the High Court to be tried at the Assizes, if the state of business would admit of the course being pursued without injustice to other suitors. I think there is no necessity for any further legislation upon the matter. If any difficulty or inconvenience arises in consequence of causes being sent to the Assizes for trial, such difficulty and inconvenience may be obviated by rules to be framed by the Judges under the powers they already possess.

JUDICATURE ACT, 1873—THE OFFICIAL REFEREES—FEES.—QUESTION.

QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he has made inquiry into the charge thrown upon suitors appearing before the Official Referees, and whether it is proposed to modify or discontinue such charge?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, I have made inquiry into the matter referred to, and I find that suitors are charged a fee for the hearing of their causes before the Official Referees, proportioned to the length of such hearing. I think there has been as yet too slight an experience of the working of the system to say whether a modification of the practice should be introduced or not.

ARMY—MOBILIZATION—THE WEXFORD MILITIA.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CLERY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true, as reported in the local journals, that the Wexford County Militia arrived at the Salisbury Railway Station on the afternoon of Thursday, July 13, in a very exhausted condition, having been put for some time on short rations in consequence of the breakdown of the machinery in the vessel by which they were conveyed from Ireland to England; whether it is true that on their arrival at the Salisbury Station they were provided with no food or other refreshment, but were at once marched in their exhausted condition to the Camp at Horningdon Down, a distance of three miles; whether they were not so much distressed that many of them had to fall out of the ranks through fatigue; whether it is not also true that the same regiment marched at four o'clock next morning to be reviewed by the Commander in Chief at Stapleford Down, a distance of more than 10 miles; whether having suffered great fatigue, they did not return to the Camp at eight o'clock in the evening in a very distressed condition, having been for sixteen hours under arms; whether, if these facts are correct, the Secretary of State for War approves of a regiment being subjected to this treatment; and, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made on the subject?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he had endeavoured, as far as possible, to obtain full information in order to answer the Question, and he had received replies by telegraph, which were, perhaps, not as complete as they would have been had he waited for a letter. It was true that the Militia regiment referred to arrived at Salisbury Station on the afternoon of the 13th inst., but not in an exhausted condition. They had not been on short rations, and the machinery did not break down, though they had had a bad passage and many were too sick to eat. Their rations had been drawn in the morning on board ship for the whole day, and some of them had eaten the whole ration at once. They, of course, were obliged to march to their camp, which was not more than three miles. Nothing was said about any having fallen out, and he presumed that statement was not correct, as no answer was given to the question. In order to avoid the great heat of the day, the regiment marched at half past 4 o'clock next day, having had a good breakfast. The distance was nine miles, and the men marched without packs. It was an excessively hot day, and some did fall out. On the day of the review their dinner was cooked and eaten on the review ground; so it is to be presumed they had some hours rest. Before starting the men had their full rations with coffee, and they seem to have had plenty of food, as General Ingall reports that after the men of this regiment had dined he went round and found quantities of food thrown away. These were the answers to the Question; and he was anxious that the regiments should be treated fairly. This regiment seemed to have had good rations; but the sea was a little rougher than they were accustomed to; and he dared say they found their rations not exactly suited to the state of their stomachs.

POST OFFICE—THE WEST INDIA HOME
MAILS.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that during the present year the West India Home Mails have arrived too late for reply by the outgoing Mail four times; and, whether any steps could be taken to obviate such inconvenience?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, it was true that the mails had been late four times that year, but penalties were not applicable, for in no case was the Company to blame, as the delay had always arisen from causes beyond their control. Every means would be taken to prevent such inconveniences in future.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—HELMETS.

QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If some arrangement could not be made whereby the police in the metropolitan and rural districts could be provided with a lighter covering for the head during the summer months than the present heavy helmet, which fits closely, and is consequently very oppressive to the men, especially where they have to walk a considerable distance to their beats?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that some of the corps of the Metropolitan Police had already been provided with a lighter head dress, with light steel hoops, than the one hitherto in use, and that it was intended to extend this change to the rest of the Metropolitan Police; but the Home Office had nothing to do with the matter as affecting the county and borough police.

NAVY—THE MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Fleet now at Besika Bay consists of the ordinary Mediterranean squadron, or whether it has been reinforced by vessels sent from home and from other stations?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the Mediterranean squadron had been reinforced by ships from the Channel Squadron and from the Reserve and Home force.

TURKEY—THE SALONICA MURDERS—THE CORRESPONDENCE.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS asked, Why No. 4 of the Papers on the Eastern question was not among those which had been circulated that morning, although it was several times referred to in those Papers?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the reason Paper No. 4 had not been presented along with the others was that it had not been found possible to prepare it sooner, and his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs was anxious that there should be no delay in laying the other Papers relating to Turkish affairs before the House. He believed that Paper No. 4, which related to the Salonica Outrage, would be presented to-morrow or next day. He assured the right hon. Gentleman that no public servants could have worked harder than had the officials of the Foreign Office during the last three weeks in the preparation of these documents.

Subsequently—

MR. DISRAELI: With reference to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract, I beg to state that I have received a note from my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, informing me that the Salonica Papers will be laid on the Table to-day.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that in the Turkish Papers, Part 3, there were nine despatches from Lord Derby to the Ambassador at Constantinople, extending over a period of three months—that was, from the end of January to the 10th of May. On the 10th of May the Fleet was telegraphed for by the Ambassador, and he wished to ask the Prime Minister, Whether those nine despatches were the whole of the despatches which passed between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Ambassador at Constantinople during those three months, or whether there were others which had not been produced?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the nine despatches referred to by the hon. Gentleman are not the only ones which passed between the Secretary of State and the Ambassador during the interval of three months that he mentions. So far as I can ascertain, the number is about 200, beside the nine; but those despatches did not refer to the matters respecting which the Papers are now laid before Parliament. With regard to the Fleet in Besika Bay, in the new Papers which are to be laid on the Table to-day relating to the murders at Salonica, there will be despatches which have some reference to the sending of the ships to Besika Bay.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is in a position to state what day he proposes to fix for the discussion of the Papers which have just been presented? They have only been, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, in the hands of the House a very short time; but so far as I am able to express an opinion from a cursory perusal, it will not be necessary for me or any of my hon. Friends to ask the hon. Member for Portsmouth to forego the precedence to which he is entitled in consequence of his having given Notice of his intention to discuss the question. I shall presume, however, that it is the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to afford the hon. Member for Portsmouth, or any other hon. Member, an early opportunity of discussing the Papers, and I wish to know whether he is now able to fix a day for that discussion?

MR. DISRAELI: The Government have no wish but to consider the convenience of the House in this matter. Until I heard from the noble Lord what were his views and the views of those with whom he immediately acts, of course, I could make no arrangement. Inferring, as I now do, that the noble Lord and his Friends have no intention of proposing any Motion, I, of course, am willing to recognize the position which my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth has taken in regard to this subject, and I shall be happy to give him any day that the House may consider convenient. If the House thinks this day week convenient, that day shall be placed at the service of my hon. Friend and the House.

MR. BRUCE: After what has been said by the Prime Minister, I am entirely in the hands of the House in this matter. I waited until the noble Lord opposite had expressed his intention not to bring forward a Motion on the subject. I can only say that I am myself anxious to bring my Motion forward, and I am willing to do so on any day that may suit the convenience of the House. The Papers have been in the hands of hon. Members only to-day, or at least I have only seen them this morning, and other Papers have been mentioned which may bear very materially on the subject, and which are to be presented to-day. Under these circumstances I am entirely in the hands of the House, and I think it would not be desirable to bring forward the matter this week, and I doubt whether next Monday would give sufficient time to hon. Members to consider the Papers.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the hon. Member for Portsmouth had given Notice that he would call attention to the Papers and move a Resolution. It would be convenient that the House should at the earliest period know the terms of the Resolution.

MR. BRUCE said, he could not put the terms of his Resolution on the Notice Paper until the Papers were laid upon the Table, and until the noble Marquess had announced his intention not to take the precedence to which he was justly entitled. He should take care to put his Resolution upon the Paper to-morrow.

MR. DISRAELI: Considering the period of the Session, I think it is not unreasonable that the House should be able to discuss this question on Monday.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

[BILL 155.]

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 21st July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

New Clause—

(Dissolution of School Board under certain circumstances.)

("Where application for the dissolution of a School Board is made to the Education Department by the like persons and in the like manner as an application for the formation of a School Board, under section twelve of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' and the Education Department, are satisfied that no school and no

site for a school is in the possession or under the control of the School Board, and that there is a sufficient amount of public school accommodation for the district of the School Board, the Education Department may, after such notice as they think sufficient, order the dissolution of the School Board.

"The Education Department by any such order shall make provision for the disposal of all money furniture, books, documents, and property belonging to the School Board, and for the discharge out of the local rate of all the liabilities of the board, and such other provisions as appear to the department necessary or proper for carrying into effect the dissolution of the board.

"The Education Department shall publish the order in manner directed by 'The Elementary Education Act, 1872,' with respect to the publication of notices, and after the date of such publication or any later date mentioned in the order, the order shall have effect as if it were enacted by Parliament, without prejudice nevertheless to the subsequent formation of a School Board in the same school district. All bye-laws previously made by the School Board shall continue in force, subject nevertheless to be revoked or altered by the local authority under this Act."—(Mr. Pell.)

Question again proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that hon. Members had, no doubt, along with him, spent some of the time which had elapsed since the House last met in considering what was the meaning of the somewhat heated debates into which they had drifted on Thursday and Friday in last week. It was clear to him that great misapprehensions had prevailed as to the subject-matter of the clause under debate and the course taken by the Government. He was willing to take a great deal of the fault upon himself, and it was possible he did not state with sufficient clearness what was the position taken by the Government upon the new clause proposed by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). He tried to be clear; but, after a fortnight's discussion upon education, it was possible that one's language and one's head might have become somewhat muddled. Two proposals were brought before the Committee by his hon. Friend (Mr. Pell) one was to enable every locality by a popular vote to do away with its school board, even when it had a school or school sites of its own. That was a proposal which the Government said at once they could not under any circumstances adopt. The second proposal was one of a very different character. It was this —it simply said that where the locality had ample school accommodation, and where the Department was satisfied that the school requirements were amply supplied by the locality, if the authority there which had the power of creating the school board determined by the same vote that it did not want to have that school board, the power should be given to the Department to say that the school board could exist no longer, and that it should be dissolved. The reason why the Government assented to the clause was that the whole state of the case was altered by the provisions of the Bill which had virtually received the assent of the House. Provision had been taken that in every locality hereafter a good substantial school authority should be established which might be entirely trusted to administer the law as to attendance of children at school, if not receiving efficient instruction elsewhere. The whole question, therefore, was, whether the new school attendance authority which had been created under this Bill should have what might be called the Educational police power which the Committee proposed to give it, instead of the school board when one existed already in a locality, and had no schools under its control. When the Committee considered the question calmly and after the relaxation they had enjoyed, they would, he thought, agree with him, that a great number of the speeches had been made, not perhaps altogether unnaturally, under some misapprehension. One speech after another had been based upon the supposition that the great school machinery, created by the Act of 1870, for the administration of education would be put in peril by the proposal adopted by the Government. That, however, would be found to be utterly impossible under the Amendment as proposed, if they considered it with the explanations he had now given. It was, however, absolutely essential to get rid of this supposition which had prevailed—as the Committee, however, would remember that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), who they must all regret did not now address the House so often as he used to do, delivered a speech based on that supposition, and the most important speeches against the Government proposal took the same ground. Taking for granted that the Committee would agree that he (Viscount Sandon) was right in his explanation, they had surely now reduced the matter to a comparatively small point. He did not wish to allude to what might be considered personal taunts addressed to him the other day, and which he attributed to the heat of the weather and not to any unfriendly feeling. The question was of too grave a character to allow of personalities entering into it. They were told that the Government ought to have brought forward the proposal before the Committee on their own responsibility, but he did not think that the Government was bound to introduce into their Bill, which was necessarily a very heavy one, every improvement in the Education system which appeared in itself desirable. It was a different thing, however, when a point was once raised, and when they saw many Amendments placed on the Notice Paper, bearing on the point that where school boards were unnecessary the locality ought to be able to remove them. The case was put forcibly before the Government. They knew that since the Bill had been printed, meetings were held in different parts of the country, not in agricultural districts only, but also in towns, and conclusions were arrived at that the weakness of the Bill was that where a school board was unnecessary provision ought to have been made for its removal. They had likewise had a great number of communications to the same effect, not alone from clerical quarters, of which they had heard so much, but from great local interests — Boards of Guardians, and also men of business connected with towns, asking what possible argument could be urged against the proposal that unnecessary school boards might be removed. Was it not, then, in the interest of the School Board system itself that localities, where they were not wanted, should be able to get rid of the burden of school boards? That being so, although it was not necessary for the Government to add clause to clause in their Bill, still, when this question was so pressed upon their attention, they were bound to consider it, and when they had considered it they could find no argument which would really hold water against it. But even taking the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, who was naturally very zealous on behalf of the school board system all over the country, he (Viscount Sandon) asked—Was it likely to make that system popular—and, unless in the long run it was popular and had the confidence of the country, it would not work—if they refused to make provision for throwing off what he might call without offence the slough of the system? That was to say those school boards, which had lost the confidence of a locality, which had no schools to manage, and which were not securing education for the children—these, he might truly say, only brought discredit on the whole school board system—made it unpopular—and would be unnecessary under the new Bill, as local authorities were constituted everywhere who would be obliged to see that all children were instructed. The right hon. Gentleman said he feared the Department would be constantly asked to ascertain whether particular school board districts had sufficient school accommodation, and that their attention would be constantly called to school deficiencies by the party which wished to keep up a board; but surely the Department would be only too glad to be told of any deficiencies—that was exactly what they wanted. They wished to be told by the localities where there was a deficiency of schools, and if the change stimulated communications of that kind he, for one, would hail it with pleasure. Again, it was urged over and over again that the general feeling of the country was in favour of school boards. If that argument were repeated, he would be compelled to take a different course from that he had hitherto adopted in the debate. He had cautiously avoided parading before the House what he knew to be the feeling of the country as to school boards; but if it were insisted that there was no question as to their popularity, he should be obliged to go more into the details of this matter, and to call the attention of the Committee to what, as far as he had been able to ascertain, was the real opinion of the country. As far as his official knowledge went, and he had had communications from all parts of the country on the subject, the large school boards were much appreciated, but he could not conceal from the Committee that the feeling of the country as to school boards generally was just now in a very critical position, and that not only as to the small, but as to the large ones. He would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite whether they thought it wise, in the interest of the school board system, and of education itself to press this system too far, and whether, if school boards were rendered unpopular by being forced to be retained by districts where they were not required, the result would not be to render compulsion extremely difficult? If more were still said as to the popularity of school boards, he should have to quote at length the opinions of Her Majesty's Inspectors during the last two or three years on the subject. He very much preferred, however, not to enter into that question, but to confine himself to the cases of unnecessary school boards where there was sufficient school accommodation for the locality. He had quoted the case of a right hon. Gentleman opposite as to an unnecessary school board in a small rural district; he would now refer to the case of a borough of over 10,000 inhabitants, giving, however, no clue to its name, not to avoid contradiction, but to prevent unnecessary discussion. The borough in question had sufficient voluntary schools and a school board for the sake of compulsion only, and there were several towns in its neighbourhood which had not school boards. The borough had a very good municipality, in which all the leading people took part. Now did they suppose that there the burden of a school board would be tolerated, when it was seen that in the neighbouring districts the advantages of compulsory attendance were secured without the burden of an unnecessary school board? He could not but think that it was rather a bold thing for hon. Gentlemen opposite to protest against the destruction of any institution, simply on the ground that it existed; surely this was an argument, which if it could be held at the present day anywhere, would be more in keeping on the Conservative side of the House; and he confessed that he had heard with infinite astonishment such a high Tory sentiment from the other side as that an institution which was only six years in existence ought not to be touched, on the ground that it was an existing institution, although there would then exist other adequate machinery for doing its work. Well, Her Majesty's Government had observed with pleasure the number of Amendments on the clause under consideration, which had been placed upon the Paper, as they clearly evinced the existence of a kindly wish to help the Government. Among those Amendments was one which must have weight with the Committee as coming from a Gentleman of great experience, he meant the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson). As, however, it stood on the Paper it could not be accepted by the Government, because it would virtually make it impossible to allow any school board to be dissolved, and thus would frustrate the object of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire. It could only, under the Amendment, be dissolved, if it was the opinion of the Department that its maintenance was unsuited to the requirements of the education, and was of no advantage to education—and that would be a bold thing for the Department in any case to say. They considered, however, that the Amendment contained the germ of a proposal which might be accepted—to the effect that it was the duty of the Department to take all the circumstances of the case into consideration, and if they should be of opinion that the maintenance of the school board was not necessary for the purposes of education in the district, then that they should take action in the matter. That Amendment, he thought, would secure what both sides seemed to desire—namely, that if a school board was doing its work well, the Department should hold the hand of the destroyer; but that if it should be shown to be unnecessary, it might be dissolved. The proposal would tend to concentrate duties in the hands of the existing local authorities. It would enable people to choose the authorities containing the best men, and thus avoid the worry and expense of unnecessary elections. He trusted the hon. Member for South Leicestershire would agree to the proposition. If hon. Gentleman opposite would not consent to adopt the proposal, the Government would willingly assume the responsibility of the whole matter, and would have no doubt of what the opinion of the counties would be respecting it. They would only congratulate themselves if their opponents nailed their colours to the mast in opposing this reasonable proposition, and appeared before the country as the political party which was in favour of the maintenance of unnecessary school boards, and which denied to the people the right of getting rid of them when they no longer wished to have them, and refused them the privilege of choosing their own existing local authorities to do the work.

MR. PELL said, he could see no objection to the incorporation of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester with his own, and was prepared to accept it. ["Hear, hear!"] He understood those cheers, and also the ominous silence which had been observed on the other side of the House during the speech of the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council. He (Mr. Pell) regretted the irreconcilable spirit which seemed to have arisen on the question; but he could assure hon. Members opposite that his clause was conceived in no hostile spirit, and sprang merely from a desire to economize the public money arising from rates, and prevent the existence in one district of different authorities having the same object in view. He had not considered other interests in framing his clause, and he could not see that in any respect the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester interfered with the object he had in view. Where school boards were not effective, either as to the education given or the cost to the ratepayers, it was but right that the power which created them should have the power to substitute other authorities better suited to the purpose.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I observe, Sir, that the noble Lord in discussing his question never loses an opportunity—or rather, he takes advantage of many opportunities—of saying something unkind of the school boards. ["No, no!"] It is all very well to mingle here and there compliments to great boroughs and the school boards of great populations, but last year when the question was discussed, on the Motion of my hon. Colleague, who then was—he is now no longer—in the House, the noble Lord took the same course, and I am not sure he did not do the same in the year before. I have noticed it repeatedly, and I am quite sure the House must be sensible of it. He has spoken to-day of the burden of school boards and of the necessity of throwing off the slough of their system. That is quite in accordance with the opinions of some hon. Members opposite, and with the opinions which I have gathered from what he has said in preceding debates. The noble Lord has never attempted to make any answer to the real objections to this clause. The hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) on Friday said the noble Lord had not answered the arguments I brought forward against it, and he would attempt to answer them. I will not say how far he succeeded, but my own opinion is, naturally, that he somewhat failed. I should like to put to the House calmly, what are the reasons which influence me at any rate to oppose this clause. It is not because I am opposed to the Bill. I have never spoken before against the Bill, and if it had not been for the introduction of new propositions of this kind I should have taken no one step to oppose its passage through Committee. The object of this clause is to allow persons in some school-board districts to suppress the school board. We know with what great contests throughout the country school boards were first established, and we know that in many districts the majority was not very large, but that generally the school boards, even in these districts, have worked with so much success that there is no longer any anticipation or any attempt that they should be put an end to. We do know also that there is a minority in many school-board districts who would be exceedingly glad to disturb the present system. There is very likely a Church clergyman who has a great hostility to school boards; in fact, to anything but a Church school, under Church management; but it is not the duty, and it is not the interest of Parliament, and it is not for the good of the country, that any Church clergyman of that description should be allowed under a clause of this kind, with perhaps half a dozen other influential persons in his neighbourhood to start a new opposition to school boards with the view of suppressing them. The noble Lord speaks as if he was making no real change, but that the school board should go out of existence, and the Guardians or corporations take its place. But that is not true. The difference between the school boards under the Act of 1870, and the corporations of Boards of Guardians under the Bill is enormous. It is not a difference even in degree; it is a difference of kind and of nature—an essential difference to the last degree. The corporations and Boards of Guardians can do nothing but stand with the lash and drive the children to school. But the school board has a power beyond that. It has the power to build a school, or to take over any school which any managers may wish to hand over to it, and therefore it has an existing and a prospective power which by this Bill you do not give either to the corporation or to the Board of Guardians. It is idle, therefore, for the noble Lord to tell us this is a matter of very small consequence, and that really parishes and boroughs are not likely to wish to have two authorities when one would do. The "one authority" which he by this Bill is creating is an authority of feebleness and do-nothingness in comparison with the authority he is allowing the districts he supplants; and it is on that ground I object to the clause. I take one of the "burdensome" school boards which is to be got rid of. At present it has built no school, and has taken no school over, and does nothing but drive the children to school. But the population may be increasing rapidly, and next year, or the year after, there may not be sufficient school accommodation, and the school board may be required to build the school. Or there may be some clergyman of the Church of England, or some committee of a British School feeling a school to be burdensome, or believing it would be better for the school board to take it over; but if this Bill passes, that school board may be suppressed, and the corporation will have no power to take over a school or to build a new school whatever the increase of the population, and the Board of Guardians will be equally incapable of adding anything to the supply of school accommodation. There is another, and to my mind more serious, point to which I ask the noble Lord's special attention, and which I ask the House in its fairness to consider. This Bill is to compel children in all parts of the country to go to school, and in some towns and parishes—I am afraid I am not extravagant in saying thousands of parishes—there is no school but a Church school. Into that school you are about to drive every child of every Dissenting family within those parishes, and they would have no chance of choosing any board or other school. Where the number of Nonconformist children at present was only half-a-dozen or a dozen, you would think it improper to go to the expense of providing a school for them alone; but supposing these children were more numerous—say 50 or 100, or 150—surely it would be proper for the school board to provide school accommodation for them if their parents were dissatisfied with their being forced into Church schools. But if this clause were passed, there would be no power under a corporation to provide a new school, whatever be the number of Nonconformist children, and therefore until some future time, when Parliament may alter the law, and a new school board may be formed, or till the parish may have other contests and apply to the Education Department for a school board, all the Nonconformists will be forced to attend the Church school, having no defence when they so attend a Church school except the Conscience Clause. Hon. Gentleman opposite probably believe that clause works well enough, and that it is a sufficient protection. No doubt, it is so in their view of the case, but I can assure them that it is not so; for I saw quoted last year a portion of a speech spoken by the President of the Wesleyan Conference, in which it was stated that there were hundreds of parishes in England and Wales in which there was no social freedom whatever, and I know from abundant correspondence and my own personal knowledge that if the children of Dissenting families in many parishes of England were withdrawn from school, even under the protection of the Conscience Clause, a mark would be set on these families. ["No, no!"] Why, it is a matter of certainty. ["No, no!"] It was only the other day, not a week ago, I was in a parish not 50 miles from London, where there is no school but a Church school, and a good man there who was not a Churchman began to take a few children into a house to teach them as at a Sunday-school, and what happened? The moment there was a proposition to get up a little treat in the village for the children, the children who went to that school were omitted in the distribution, and they were shown at once by the clergyman's family, and those with whom he was associated, that it was considered a great evil, little less than a sin, perhaps entirely a sin, that the children should go to be taught by this poor Wesleyan man, instead of going to the Church school. That will happen, and does happen, in hundreds of parishes in England. ["No, no!"] Well, but I know it does. ["No, no!" and cries of 'Name!'] Name, why their name is region. I asked a lady two or three years ago—a most benevolent and excellent person, but very much limited by her Church notions—who was describing to me how they distributed charity in her parish—"Do you ever call and distribute your charity at the house of any Dissenter?" We were speaking chiefly of children. She said, "Well, no—no; we don't—we don't include them." I did not argue with her, but I put a very simple question to her—"You are a Christian woman, or endeavouring to be so, but do you think that Christ would have made such a difference as that?" And she hesitated for a moment, and she said—"No, I think—I think He would not." But that difference does exist in your agricultural parishes in many hundreds of cases, and under this bill which the noble Lord is now passing you will find those cases. You give the Conscience Clause as a security, but the parents of Nonconformist children may wish to have their children educated in board schools or in any other school than the school in connection with the Established Church. But by the clause you are now discussing, you may allow the school board to be suppressed, and to either of the authorities which you substitute, do you give the power to provide schools for these children. Therefore with all my disposition to help the noble Lord in anything that he may do, even in accordance with the Bill of 1870, though in that Bill I think there were great defects, it is impossible for me to give my support to a clause like this. I am certain—more certain than before the delivery to-night of the noble Lord's speech—a speech which no man in his position at the head of the Education Department ought to have made—that if this clause passes it will be widely accepted as the signal for the re-opening of a question which was settled in 1870, and it will have the effect of weakening the operation of that Act, and of weakening that which on this side we do require, and which you profess to require, and I hope do require, that our system of education should gradually become wider, broader, and deeper, and should more entirely take within its arms, as it were, the whole of the population of the United Kingdom. I think nothing could have been more unfortunate than for the noble Lord after bringing his Bill so far with a certain amount of acquiescence—for it is a great matter, in a question to which attaches prejudices and hostilities in many localities, that there should be a general acquiescence on both sides of the House—to make an attempt like that which he is now making to upset the foundations of the Bill of 1870. I believe in so doing he will stir up a degree of intolerance and hostility between parishes, and that a great deal of good he hopes to do by the Bill he will undo or poison by his unfortunate acceptance of the clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire.

MR. A. MILLS said, that the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, instead of addressing himself calmly to the question before the House, had spoken in a tone calculated to rouse controversial feelings. The right hon. Gentleman had a very limited experience of the action of Church people, and yet he had charged those interested in voluntary schools, and especially in Church schools, with habitually using the alms put into their hands by the Legislature for proselytizing purposes. He (Mr. Mills) denied altogether the charges made by the right hon. Gentleman against the clergy of the Established Church as to schools, and the lay members of the Church with respect to the distribution of charities. The right hon. Member might have heard such tales in idle gossip, but there was no foundation for such sweeping assertions. It was suggested that the issue raised by the clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, with the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Chester incorporated in it, would imperil the Act of 1870, and was intended as an attack upon school boards. He denied the statement altogether. There was no intention whatever, nor was there anything in the statement of the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council, which would warrant in the slightest degree the insinuation of the right hon. Gentleman. He would venture to say that the noble Lord had done more to promote the action of school boards than the right hon. Gentleman himself. When the noble Lord spoke of getting rid of "the slough" of the school boards, he was not alluding to the great school boards, but to those which had not yet done a single act to promote the cause of elementary education. The right hon. Gentleman talked as if this were an attack on school boards; but any one who would take the trouble to read between the lines of the Amendments of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire and the right hon. Member for Chester would see that it was no such thing. It was not an attempt at the dissolution of school boards, nor was it an attack, direct or indirect, on their action, which he, for one, was prepared to justify as most valuable in large towns. The question was, whether Parliament would enable the inhabitants to rid themselves of machinery which they had themselves created, when the Bill provided every one of the districts with the means of establishing compulsion as thoroughly as the Act of 1870. It was, therefore, intended to respect and maintain those school boards which were efficient and did their duty, while at the same time they gave back to the ratepayers the power of doing away with school boards that did nothing, and replace them by elected bodies who would meet the wants of the district. If the right hon. Gentleman and those who supported him supposed they were playing a good card, that they were raising a popular cry by insisting that absolutely useless school boards should not be discontinued, they would find themselves very much mistaken. For the last two or three years he had been a member of a school board, and he ventured to say a more unpopular office never was filled. They were told by high authority that woe waited upon them when all men spoke well of them. Then, if the converse were true, the members of the School Board of the metropolis were the most happy men alive. Parliament was not asked to deal with school boards which had done their work, but those which had done absolutely nothing, and if they would not allow the ratepayers who had called those boards into existence to dissolve them, instead of doing a popular act, they would be doing that which would meet from their constituents the reprobation which it deserved.

MR. DODSON wished, as the noble Lord had so pointedly alluded to the Amendment which he (Mr. Dodson) had put on the Paper words.

The question before the Committee was not one which called for excitement; but he could not help thinking with respect to what had just fallen from the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Mills), that he must have forgotten the nature of the Assembly he was addressing in referring to matters which in discussing such a Bill should not be brought under their consideration. He must have thought he was addressing his constituents, and not the House of Commons. It was said this was not an attack on school boards; but, if not, he most certainly failed to see what else it could be, for the speech of the noble Lord who had adopted it, the only Minister who had spoken on the subject, if not a direct and vehement attack on school boards, certainly showed no great respect or regard for them. The noble Lord had not met the point so forcibly put by his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, that in removing a school board and substituting a Town Council or Board of Guardians, as would be the result of the adoption of the clause, they were removing the body which had full power to take over schools, and do much more for education than either of the substituted authorities, and placing in lieu thereof a body which had no such powers. Look what the effect on education would be. A school board might be set up one year and pulled down another, by a majority of the Town Council or Guardians, and might be restored again in the next year. How could education be expected to flourish under such a system. It was all very well for a Ministry to have an accidental majority, but care should be taken with respect to the use made of that majority. A proper system of education never could be maintained if principles upheld by one Party were to be overturned by another as soon as they got into power. When once educational machinery was set up, they could not be too cautious in affording facilities for its removal, because it was most desirable that education should take a firm root in the soil, and not be shaken in the earlier days of its growth. It was argued that the Amendment he had placed on the Paper implied, on his part, the acceptance of the clause, but that was certainly not his intention. All he intended was, if the clause should be read a second time, that he would endeavour to amend it by inserting the words he had placed on the Paper. But the noble Lord, if he understood him correctly, by the alteration he proposed would reduce his Amendment to a nullity.

MR. GOLDNEY argued that where school boards failed to carry out the object for which they were established, facilities ought to be afforded for getting rid of them. He would mention a case in point which occurred in a parish in his own neighbourhood. A school board was elected in 1871 and re-elected in 1874. During those three years and a portion of 1875, they only discussed plans for sites, and did nothing to further the education of the district. In 1875 the ratepayers, embracing all sections of the community, joined together and subscribed a certain sum, bought a site, built a school-house for 400 children. The school was efficiently conducted; everybody was satisfied, and the only question was how to get rid of the school board. That was an instance in which a school board had ceased to be of any use, and he hoped the suggestion that had been made by the noble Lord would be accepted, in order that school boards of this description might be dispensed with.

MR. MUNDELLA said, there were only 30 or 40 school boards whose position was at all illustrated by the description just given, for of the 540 that had no schools 510 had appointed attendance officers. But, even supposing there were more, if there were 100 cases such as that quoted, he held that the school boards would have plenty to do, even where there were no schools. Under the provisions of the Bill they would have to see that wastrels and the children of poor and drunken parents were educated—a duty in itself of the utmost importance. He contended that inaccuracy ran all through the speeches of the noble Lord and the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills). Voluntary effort was not enough, and the experience the hon. Member for Exeter had acquired ought to have informed him that if a school were erected at every corner of every street in London it would be impossible to get the children to school. Thus where there were school boards without schools, it would be the duty of the former to see that children attended the latter, so that it could hardly be said that school boards were useless. He considered that the noble Lord had been very unfortunate in his speech. What was the reason of their being engaged upon this unfortunate clause, instead of the Prisons Bill? Simply because the noble Lord had broken the promise he had made, that he would loyally stand by the spirit of the Act of 1870. So far from doing so, he had accepted an Amendment which aimed at the destruction of 540 school boards, many of which were doing good in large centres of population, and which held a threat over every other school board whatsoever. He maintained that the acceptance of the clause would create an agitation in every parish where there was a school board, and would give rise to the exercise of narrow-mindedness, intolerance, selfishness, and ignorance, by parsimonious ratepayers and an intolerant parson, in order to destroy the usefulness of the boards, so that the educational progress of the country might be retarded on account of sectarian motives. Those who supported the clause simply objected to school boards because they were active and aggressive. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, aggressive against ignorance and intolerance. The friends of the clause, in fact, who had brought it forward as they had done, were—

"Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike."

They wished to use their majority, as it were, surreptitiously; but it should be borne in mind that all power in the long run came from the people, and that the House of Commons was the depository of that power. What was made by a majority could be unmade by a majority, and, as his hon. and learned Colleague had reminded them on the previous debate on the subject, the majority to unsettle a national policy must be a majority of that House. He utterly denied that school boards were either extravagant or irreligious. They talked of themselves as being a Christian Legislature. As far as he could see—speaking from an educational point of view—the only evidence of their being so was that they had a chaplain, who read prayers every day at 10 minutes to 4 o'clock. It was remarkable that the two front benches never came to prayers. He had commented upon the fact to a friend, who said in reply that the front benches of the Government at all events did not require to attend prayers, as their prayers were already answered. It was insinuated by the supporters of the clause that the school boards were irreligious bodies. He maintained, on the contrary, that they were, in some respects, more religious than some of their denominational schools, and that under the former religious education had enormously increased throughout the country. As a proof of what he had said, he would refer to the results of the examination in religious subjects of the children taught in the board schools of Sheffield to show how efficient that religious instruction had been. There was no precedent of ratepayers being either invited or encouraged to destroy any municipal institution created by Parliament. The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council seemed to have returned to his old love, and the threats which he had used in his speech reminded one very much of the threats that he uttered when he cried—"Woe to the vanquished," in introducing his Endowed Schools Bill. If the noble Lord had that feeling still in his heart, it would have been much more courageous for him to have endeavoured to carry it out. Instead of hanging the sword of Damocles over the 540 school boards that would have come within the purview of the hon. Member for South Leicester's clause, why had not the Government and their Friends the candour and courage of placing at once a Resolution before the House for the destruction of all the school boards? The noble Lord had threatened that evening to disclose the doings of some of these school boards, if provoked by the further opposition of his political opponents. He (Mr. Mundella) challenged the noble Lord to do so. Until the hon. Member for South Leicestershire had prepared his clause, the noble Lord had over and over again declared that he would stand by the principles of the measure of 1870, and resist every Amendment that departed from the lines of that Act. But at the eleventh hour the noble Lord, forgetting that policy which he had enunciated, adopted an Amendment which was subversive of the main object of the Act of 1870; and now, by a conspiracy of silence and the force of their majority, the advocates of this re-actionary proceeding sought to force it upon an unwilling people. He would, however, tell him that, though in a minority in that House, so long as the Opposition had power to resist such a dangerous measure as that under discussion they would exercise all the resources that the Forms of the House gave them to prevent its passing.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, he did not think that either the tone or language of the hon. Gentleman's speech was at all likely to benefit the cause which he seemed to have at heart, and therefore he would not follow him in his heated invective or the threat which he had thought proper to hold out. He trusted that the clause would be considered calmly and dispassionately, and would be decided according to its merits. The doctrine of "once a school board always a school board" was quite new to him, because the 24th clause of the Act of 1870 distinctly contemplated the transfer of school boards. He therefore denied that the supporters of the present clause were doing anything contrary to the Act of 1870. The hypothetical case mentioned by the right hon. Member for Chester could not possibly occur under the clause, because it applied only to districts in which there were no school-board schools or school sites; and even in the Act of 1870, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had actually, in his 24th clause, provided for the re-transfer of schools from school boards to the managers, if two-thirds of the members of the school boards desired such transfer. Was not that provision something very like what the present clause proposed? The House had no desire to interfere with the existing school boards except where they had really no work to do. What, then, could be more reasonable, or in accordance with common sense, than to provide against their continuance in the latter case?

MR. W. JAMES regretted the Government had not abandoned the clause, rather than adopt the retrogressive and reactionary policy they had at the last moment ventured upon. The result had been to introduce the element of religious bitterness into their debates, and to prolong their discussions to an unreasonable length. They would have done more wisely if, instead of giving their acquiescence to this proposal of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, they had acted upon the good old maxim Vestigia nulla retrorsum. The Act of 1870 was framed to provide sufficient elementary education to every child throughout the Kingdom by the instrumentality of the school-board system; but the new proposal tended to wholly subvert that system. He regarded the clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire as indirectly striking a blow at the principle of self-government, which was the great guarantee for the diffusion of the benefits arising from the Act of 1870. It was chiefly in the rural districts that the system was required, and no centralized system could confer so much advantage on the people so far as the education principle was concerned. In addition to those objections, he feared that in many districts Church schools formed a sort of clerical hobby, and it was to be regretted that the clergy of the Established Church had not joined with the popular feeling on this most important question, but they had joined another camp. He hoped, however, that the day was not distant when the great question of education would be entirely in accordance with the wishes of the great body of the people. In conclusion, he must say the clause was decidedly of a re-actionary character, and hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House would oppose it to the bitter end. The Conservative Party had come out in their true light in this matter; and it was remarkable how unanimous they were in supporting the clause when they discovered that it was re-actionary.

MR. MARTEN said, the question of the maintenance of school boards was put forward by hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House as if the abolition of useless school boards involved an attack upon the proposed improvement in the great work of elementary education; but surely in localities where there were school boards without schools, and without sites to build them on, it was not unreasonable to have a power in the Bill to remove such school boards. They had instances of localities wherein school boards were actually forced upon the people, where there was sufficient proper school accommodation for children, thus incurring expense for a school board which was perfectly useless. At the same time, he would admit that in the majority of cases there was no complaint with regard to their action. He thought that, considering the sacrifices made by the clergy in the cause of education, it was disrespectful to talk of Church schools as "a clerical hobby." Who erected the Church school-houses? The members of the Church. And if parents not being members of the Church sent their children to those schools, and had an objection to the religious teaching in them, there was the "Conscience Clause," of which they might avail themselves. As to the clause, it was carefully guarded, so that the interests of education might not suffer; and the argument of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) was easily answered, for if the population of a district increased after the dissolution of a school board, and it was found that the educational wants of the district could not be otherwise met, there was nothing to prevent the Education Department from calling a school board again into existence. He considered the clause important, and deserving of the approval of the Committee, and he maintained that to give the power of dissolving school boards was no new thing; for as late as the Public Health Act of last year, power was given to the Local Government Board to dissolve local government districts, and in other Acts similar authority was given.

MR. LOWE said, if he understood aright the observations of the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council in opening the debate that evening, the noble Lord treated that as a mere matter of the transfer of powers from one body to another. If that was the noble Lord's argument, some Members of the Government ought to explain a little further the real nature of the transaction. As he understood the matter, the school boards had the power of taking schools over, of building schools, and of levying rates. It was now proposed to enable the Privy Council to dissolve those school boards, and that, according to the noble Lord, acted as a transfer of their powers to the Guardians. But that was not a proper description of the nature of the transaction. He did not know that it was very important whether the powers in question should be in the school boards or the Boards of Guardians. But this was not in the real nature of a transfer at all; it was in reality an annihilation of the organizing power—a destruction of the power which Parliament deliberately provided six years ago for the purpose of creating and maintaining schools in this country. It was therefore a little hard, when Government came forward and lent its authority to such a change as that, to be told as the only excuse they had had for it, that it was a mere transfer. Why, the essential part of the proposal was that it destroyed machinery provided by Parliament for making new schools. Granting even that there were sufficient schools now, how long would that be the case? Circumstances might arise, such as a factory being established, or the opening of a new railway, which would oblige the locality, in consequence of the increase of population occurring, to call for more schools, and then, instead of having, as at present, the machinery to their hand, deputations would have to go to the Education Department, and infinite trouble would have to be taken before they could create them. Why were the Government bent upon destroying the authority which had existed from the first for creating schools, and why did they throw these obstacles in the way? They had a right to ask the Government what their policy was in the matter, and how they distinguished it from general hostility to education. He had been content to leave the question in the hands of men better competent to deal with it than he; but now that it had come to this, he must point out that, although Parliament deliberately selected the machinery, and it was the foundation of the Bill itself, yet without any reason except what he must call the excuse that it was a transfer they were to put in force machinery for the destruction of these boards. A single vote at a single election by this proposal would be able to destroy the work of many years. They must observe, too, that the noble Lord spoke in a tone very hostile to school boards, and said that, if compelled to open his lips, he had dreadful revelations to make. But the noble Lord was the person who would have to weigh dispassionately whether schools boards were to be put an end to or not, and whether new school boards were to be established. It was on the noble Lord and on his office people must rely to do justice when they got heated in these discussions; but he had given a specimen of what they had to expect in the animus with which he had spoken that evening and on other occasions. The aim of the Education Act, and of all persons pledged to education, was to direct the attention of voters to the one question of spreading education, and making it as good and efficient as possible. By the clause, however, totally new considerations would be introduced. It would not be a question of how to get the best school and the best people to manage it, but of what sort the school should be, and there might be endless elections with reference to this single question, because Parliament had chosen to throw down the apple of discord. It was turning the question of education into a question of politics, importing bitterness and heart-burning into these matters, and making the existence of every school board depend upon obtaining a majority in an election, which a little bigotry or carelessness might overthrow, and so the work of self-sacrifice and devotion might be utterly destroyed. He thought they were not asking too much when they asked for an explanation of that sudden change.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the right hon. Gentleman perfectly justified in asking for a further explanation from the Government, and that it appeared necessary for them once more to state their opinion on the subject. The Government had been much surprised by the tone which the debates had taken on the new clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire; and they feared that many of the remarks which had been made on both sides of the House had given rise to erroneous impressions, which might be mischievous in their tendency, with reference to the intention of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman had said the proposal before the Committee was not so much a transfer of certain powers from one body to another as a destruction of what was called "organizing power." But if there were any intention on the part of the Government to undertake so serious a business as to propose to reverse the policy of the Act of 1870 and destroy a great and valuable organizing power, it would have been their duty to have made proper provision in the first draft of the Bill for carrying it into effect, and to have explained the proposal fully to the House on the second reading of the Bill. The conduct of the Government would have been culpable if they had refrained until the last moment from doing what had been described by some as "springing a mine" upon the House and the country. But their answer to that was that there was no such intention, and as they interpreted the clause, especially with the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester, it would have no such effect. The reason why there had been so much heat in the discussion was, that there prevailed a great deal of suspicion on the one side that there was something behind, and the very animosity with which the clause had been attacked had created some feeling on the other. But the evil to which hon. Members had referred was an imaginary evil, for the real state of the case was this—By the Act of 1870 provision was made, not for the compulsory election of school boards all over the country, but for their adoption where they were desired, and, in certain cases, for the creation of school boards where the localities did not make proper provision for education. These school boards were to have various powers: they were to have organizing powers, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had stated, and they were also to have the power of compelling the attendance of children. In a certain number of cases the school boards had been either voluntarily adopted or ordered, but they had been adopted or ordered for the purpose of supplying defects in the educational machinery of the district which could not be supplied by mere voluntary action. But in these cases powers had been exercised by the school boards which took them entirely out of the operation of this clause. It would not affect the case in which a school board had a school, a school site, or a school under its control; it would in such a case be mere waste of paper. It would affect only a limited number of school boards, and that was the reason why the Government had not themselves introduced it into the Bill. It was necessary in some cases to have school boards, not only in order to organize the educational resources of a district, but because they were the only bodies that could exercise the power of compulsion in the attendance of children. Under this Bill another machinery was provided for the purpose of compelling the attendance of children, and it appeared, therefore, perfectly reasonable that they should say to any district which had adopted a school board for no other purpose than to compel children to go to school—“We have provided another machinery for that purpose; you may, therefore, lay aside the machinery you adopted with that view, and adopt the substitute provided in this Bill.” But then it might be said that school boards might be dissolved where they were necessary to secure the proper education of the district. Now, there were two answers to that—the Government fully recognized the importance of providing against that danger. If they accepted, as they proposed to do, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester, the danger would be avoided by placing in the hands of the Education Department the power of saying whether a dissolution of the school board would be prejudicial to the educational interests of the district. But if, in the judgment of the Education Department, it was not necessary to have a school board in a particular district, and if the locality did not wish it, how, in the name of justice, could they call on the district to continue the school board? He, therefore, thought that where they gave the local authority the power of adopting and creating a certain machinery they should also give it the power, under certain safeguards and restrictions, of dissolving it. It was said this was without precedent; but under the Highways Act power was given to the magistrates to regulate highway districts, in different parts of the country; and in the same Act a power strictly analogous to that given by this clause was given, by which boards might be altered from time to time, or dissolved by the same authority that created them. But there was another answer—in the 19th clause of the Bill, where it was satisfied, after inquiry, that any local authority had failed in its duty, the strong power was given to the Education Department to appoint other persons for a specified term to perform the duty of the local authority. The Education Department, therefore, had very strong powers to see that the educational machinery of the country was kept up to its work and did it. That was a simple exposition of the views of the Government. The matter was a small one; the clause would only operate in a few cases—to so small an extent that it did not occur to them to prepare a clause with that view; but when the proposal was made the Government could not deny its justice, nor could they see anything in it of a re-actionary character. In fact, it was in perfect harmony with the principles of the Bill. They had no right to complain of the discussion which had occurred on this subject. But he hoped that the threats which had been thrown out that opposition to the clause would be carried to the utmost limits of Parliamentary propriety were not to be taken literally as indicating the position that those who objected to the clause would be obliged to take up. There might be cases in which such a course was justifiable; but, looking to the small amount of provocation and the extremely reasonable nature of the proposal, he could not think hon. Gentlemen were serious in saying they were prepared to jeopardize what they admitted to be a good Bill. He therefore trusted that hon. Members would forego that course of proceeding, and he hoped the Government would not be accused of imaginary wickednesses which they had no intention of committing, and that they might be permitted very soon to take the opinion of the Committee on the clause.

MR. WHITWELL said, he was surprised the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had sat down without giving an answer to the objections which had been urged. The right hon. Gentleman said that on the dissolution of a school board its powers would be transferred to the local authorities, Corporations, and Boards of Guardians. But there was, in fact, no such transfer. If it were, it could not properly be a "transfer," because the powers of a school board were so much larger than those of the attendance committees. A parish once relieved from a school board need not come under the provisions of the Bill, or elect any new local authority for educational purposes, and place itself under the control of the Education Department. The introduction of the clause by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Pell) and its acceptance by the Government had been a cause of great disappointment to him and many hon. Members on that side of the House. They were up to that time highly satisfied with the Bill, and sincerely wished it might speedily pass; and they could not understand how, for such an admitted limited object, they should allow the Bill to block the way of so many important measures which had been introduced by the Home Secretary, the President of the Local Government Board, and other Members of the Government. Would it not, he suggested to the noble Lord, be better to see how the Bill would work, say, for one or two years, without the clause. If it was found that the new local authorities did the work well and effectively, it would be easy afterwards to give powers for extending the operation of the Act to districts in which school boards had not been efficient. He hoped the suggestion would be considered by the Government.

DR. WARD asked for the indulgence of the Committee while he referred to the opinions of the Roman Catholics in this country, which could not be expected to be so well represented by English Members. Many Roman Catholics would prefer to see their children go to a Church school with a Conscience Clause rather than allow them to go to a secular school under a school board. By the clause the Committee was only asked to abolish school boards that were doing no work at all, and it was opposed by hon. Members who wanted to shove the school boards down the throats of those who did not want them. As representing to some extent the opinions of Roman Catholics, he should feel it his duty to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire. The Roman Catholics had never yet given up one of their schools to a board, and in many districts the boards which it was now sought to get rid of were practically useless and involved unnecessary expense. He regarded the opposition to the proposed clause as a part of the movement led by the Birmingham League, whose scheme of education was most objectionable in point of religion, true liberty, and parental authority.

MR. BRISTOWE, whilst admitting the ingenuity of the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, could not help saying that on the present occasion they were far from convincing. He denied that the duties of a school attendance committee under the Bill were at all on all fours with the duties imposed upon school boards. He did not agree with the statement of the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) that the proposed clause would only apply to a small number of school boards. On the contrary, he considered there was a considerable number of school boards throughout the country to which the clause would be applicable, and he altogether denied the assumption that a board was unnecessary, where there was no site for a school in their possession, and where there was sufficient school accommodation otherwise. The course proposed by the Government seemed to him a retrograde step. If this clause were agreed to there might be a party cry raised at Town Council elections for the abolition of the school board in towns where such boards existed, and thus the school boards themselves would occupy a most doubtful, uncertain, and unenviable position. He had supported the second reading of the Bill, being of opinion that it contained much that was useful, but his opinion would be much modified if the clause under consideration were adopted, believing as he did that it was directed at the very existence of school boards throughout the country.

MR. STORER thought that the opposition to the clause arose from the apprehension that the hatred which existed in the country of useless, expensive, and litigious school boards would extend to the towns. One case was within his knowledge, which he believed was one of many. A village in Nottinghamshire elected a school board, and with what result? There was no schoolmaster and no school, and the only result of the election was the imposition of a rate of 4*d.* in the pound—equal to an income tax of 8*d.* being assessed upon the rental. For that the ratepayers had the pleasure of a triennial election and the payment of the clerk of the board. They would, however, now be only too glad to get rid of the board. He believed that in many districts that harmless clause would be received with pleasure by the ratepayers, and he cordially gave it his support.

MR. WHALLEY said, he was opposed to the Education Act of 1870, and while it was passing through the House he advised the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) to get together 20 other Members and die on the floor of the House, rather than let it pass. He believed the hon. Member regretted now that he did not act on the suggestion. The arguments used on the other side were not only unfair, but, speaking in a Parliamentary sense, they were not honest. He would admit that school boards were unpopular; but, in his opinion, that was an argument against the proposed clause rather than in its favour. The school boards being done away with, nothing stood between this Algerine measure of compulsion and payment out of public money towards schools supported by clerical influence. Now, clerical influence was really responsible for the ignorance and backwardness of this nation as compared with other nations in the matter of education. At Oxford and Cambridge, where the same influence was paramount, there was an utter failure to give a practical, useful education, and the result was among our country gentlemen an ignorance to which was really due the existence of our National Debt. Let them contrast it with the education given at the Scottish Universities, where it was of a quality that enabled its recipients to rise superior in intellectual power to the students of the English Universities, and become minds of mark of the present day.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the hon. Member, whether those observations would not be more germane to a debate upon the Universities Bills?

MR. WHALLEY, with great deference, ventured to think they would not, and went on to say that all history proved that if you wanted to perpetuate ignorance, or, what was worse, bigotry, you must place education under the control of ministers of religion, he did not care whether they were called priests, parsons, or preachers. The question was, what was education? Reading, writing, and arithmetic, in his opinion, were most dangerous weapons to put in the hands of any child; for what would be the result of reading if children were placed under the power of the clergy? Why, simply that they would read the Lives of Saints, or some such books, instead of penny dreadfuls. There was very little difference from his view between that kind of literature and that which had been introduced into the Church of England by her clergymen. On that ground he was opposed to the whole Bill.

MR. HERMON said, he thought that education might be carried to such an extent that the country would be tired of the expense of the whole affair. Why should they go on building new schools in districts where confessedly they had already ample school accommodation? Those school boards were objectionable in many respects, and he thought that even Roman Catholics would prefer sending their children to the Church of England schools rather than to schools where religion was altogether excluded from the instruction. The clause had been represented as intended for the wholesale destruction of school boards. If that were its object it would not have the support of the Government; certainly it would not have his support. It only gave the power to those who had created a school board to make a representation to the Education Department when they found a school board was unnecessary. School boards had become unpopular because they had set themselves against religious education, and school committees of the Guardians or Town Councils would be more disposed to carry out the wishes of the country in that respect. Under the present proposal the same power which called those school boards into existence would be able to dispense with them in districts where they had nothing whatever to do, and where they only increased the burdens of the ratepayers without conferring on them any proportional advantages. The Bill was sufficiently strong for the purpose of getting all children to attend schools, whilst it created safeguards against the establishment of useless school boards and unnecessary taxation.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT remarked, that much had been said as to the effect of the acceptance of the clause on education. He would like to ask what would be the effect of its acceptance upon the reputation of Parliament? Whatever might be the defects of the House of Commons no one would charge it with fickleness of purpose. Whatever work it did, after much or little deliberation, it adhered to with great tenacity. There were laws on the Statute Book, and there were laws, perhaps, older than any statute, which had been condemned by Committees of that House and by Royal Commissions against which there had been much agitation, yet Parliament continued to defend them. But now they were asked to abandon an Act of Parliament passed only six years ago, without inquiry, without debate, there having been no Petitions to that House on the subject, and no agitation in the country. They were asked to give up tried, for untried, methods. The school board, so far as it had been tried, had fully answered the expectation of the country, yet they were asked to give it up in favour of plans of which they had no practical experience. It might be that the new local authority—namely, the Boards of Guardians and the Town Councils, would be found unfit for the duties now sought to be imposed upon them. A few weeks ago he presented an important Petition from a Lancashire Board of Guardians. The Petitioners urged that they were unfitted to deal with the question of education on the grounds of want of experience, and the onerous duties already imposed upon them. It was said there were places that had formed school boards in great haste and which now wished to be rid of them. Might they not, under the clause, abandon them in haste, and accept some other authority which had been wholly untried and with which they might be just as much dissatisfied? For the last two years Government had been forming school boards. The number that it had established was very great. Surely if it had no confidence in them, if it believed that they were a burden to the country and that some other authority would be much more acceptable and much more useful, the Bill then before the House should have been brought in at an earlier period and the school board question should have been fully dealt with in the Bill. It had been shown in the course of the debate that nearly all the school boards which might be endangered by that clause had compulsory bye-laws. That was a proof that they were seriously engaged in educational work. They were obtaining valuable experience, and they ran the risk of being dispersed by the operation of that clause, and the work of education might pass into new hands. One of the greatest difficulties in connection with that Bill was the fact that in very many places there was only one school, and that a Church school; and children were therefore to be driven into the Church school, whatever the opinions or religious views of their parents. That aspect of the Bill had been ably dealt with in a discussion on going into Committee on the Bill raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard), and supported in an earnest speech by the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy). The difficulty they all knew was not easily met, but where-ever a school board existed it was much diminished. The noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon) asked them why they cared so much to defend an institution of only six years' standing? He (Mr. Bright) should think it the duty of the Members of a Government to defend an institution of only six years' standing on the ground that it could not have had a fair trial. There might be circumstances in which he could support the clause under discussion or even a more sweeping clause. Let the school boards be tried for a sufficient number of years, let the other educational authorities to be set up by this Bill be tried, let them compete with each other for a length of time, and then let them be judged; and if it were found that education languished where school boards existed and flourished under other management, if it were found that school boards were a burden and a disadvantage and that Town Councils and Boards of Guardians were more successful in promoting instruction, then they on that side of the House should make no fight for school boards.

MR. RYLANDS said, the strong objections which had been made from that side of the House were not in any way met by what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer). They had been told that the clause would apply in very few instances, and only have the effect of doing away with unnecessary school boards, under the sanction of the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon). On the first blush of the thing, it seemed to him that if the clause were of such an insignificant character hon. and right hon. Gentlemen would not have been prepared to make such a great sacrifice to ensure the passing of the clause. He thought that he might also say, that that remarkable courtesy which had marked the conduct of the Bill by the noble Lord, would, if it had been a matter of small or trivial importance, have induced him to willingly give way to avoid the opposition which the clause had met with from that (the Liberal) side of the House. He was unable to distinguish the meaning of the clause if so described. The noble Lord was continually speaking of unnecessary school boards, and, no doubt, if they could be persuaded of their being unnecessary, they might come to view their suppression without regret. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) had shown that there was really no such thing as an unnecessary school board. Many of the boards now constituted were called into existence by the Department over which the noble Lord presided. They were created for an object, and they had either fulfilled their object, or they had not fulfilled their object. If they had fulfilled their object, they showed that they still possessed the power of doing good work. But suppose, on the other hand, that in some districts denominational managers had raised a sufficient number of schools, then the noble Lord said a school board was unnecessary. No doubt that was and would be so as long as the district remained in the same position; that was to say, so long as the denominational schools remained the same in number, and the population remained the same in numbers and in way of thinking. But, when owing to a change in popular opinion, or any other cause, the persons having the management of those schools found that all their zeal and all their efforts failed to secure subscriptions, or to raise the necessary supplies, then it was well to have an existing education machinery like the school board to step in, and say to the managers of the denominational school which was insufficiently supported—"We (the school board) are willing to take over your school, under the school board conditions, and to levy rates upon the districts for its support, and to prevent its being extinguished." Thus, an apparently unnecessary school board became a potent influence for good, and the power which it exercised of levying rates to support its schools was of much value, and was a power for which no substitute was found in Town Councils or Boards of Guardians. To call those last authorities substitutes for school boards was to speak of what did not exist. They might exercise a compulsory power of attendance, but in no other way did they exercise the functions of a school board. The right hon. Baronet the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that school boards should not be abolished except under certain conditions; either they must have no school buildings or sites for schools, or no schools under their control, in those cases only would the clause apply. What would be the effect of the clause if passed? It would introduce an agitation to withdraw schools from under the control of the school boards, and it would check the establishment of boards when they might exercise a great influence for good, and discourage school-board operations throughout the country. The Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester was an improvement; but even that was wide of the purpose, and would do no good. With an Education Department with a staff of permanent officials entertaining a dislike to school boards, there would be no difficulty in finding good reasons to justify the abolition of a school board. The Amendment simply provided that the Education Department might judge of the propriety of abolishing a school board, and no one could doubt of the effect under the present management of the Department. He was aware the noble Lord said that school boards were unpopular, and that he challenged them on that side to venture to defend an unpopular institution. He (Mr. Rylands) was quite willing to admit that in many districts all local bodies who levied rates were unpopular in a greater or less degree. There was a prejudice against them and an ignorant impatience of local taxation. It was that ignorant impatience which was constantly complaining of rates levied for the most useful objects and constantly asking to have local rates removed, however they might be employed for local objects, and thrown upon the central fund of the nation, proposing a policy of centralization. There would always be found many willing to rid themselves of liability and responsibility in that way. Headmitted they could easily get up a cry against local rates amongst certain classes for any purpose. In the case of the Public Health Act—he was not sure whether it was upon the introduction of the Act—but in reference to that Act a cry of the kind was raised. There were deputations from all parts of the country who represented themselves to Lord Palmerston as deputations delegated by large and influential bodies to oppose the Bill. What did Lord Palmerston say to those gentlemen who told him all this? He said—

“Well, gentlemen, my experience is that in every borough you may find what I may call a dirty party, and this dirty party will offer opposition to anything, however beneficial it object, for the sake of a penny or twopence in the pound.”

Lord Palmerston shrewdly alluded to a fact they had all found in their experience. In no large body of people—he might say in no moderate-sized village—were they without a dirty party, who would protest loudly if they only told them that it was proposed to add largely to taxation. But when in addition to that matter of the cost of education the argument of religion in danger was raised, and all the religious zeal aroused against it, there was presented a powerful combination. Something of that was seen in the General Election of 1874, and it had a serious effect on political parties. The noble Lord and many hon. Gentlemen on the other side in alluding to the unpopularity of school boards and raising the objection to their rating power, in reality covered their antagonism to the undenominational character of school boards. Denominational education really meant, in other words, Church schools. He had received, and so he supposed had other hon. Members, a copy of an article which appeared in The Church Quarterly Review for January last, on the present state of education. It was written by a gentleman of great ability; he did not know the writer, of course, but he appeared to be an authority of some respectability. The article in question was published and forwarded to hon. Members to influence public opinion. He found from the article that the Church party, as represented by The Church Quarterly Review, looked with the greatest dissatisfaction on the Elementary Education Act of 1870. All through the article hostility to school boards, and to the principle upon which the Act of 1870 was framed, was undisguised, and after a critical history of the Act, it urged upon the Church party the duty of rallying together to prevent the Act being carried to its full extent in the way it had been during the past three or four years. It was quite clear from that pamphlet that the Church party entertained the strongest dislike to local rating by the school boards, because the exercise of that power necessarily meant the establishment of undenominational schools. The writer went on to explain how it was that the Act passed the House of Commons in that year (1870), and said there was then a fever of excitement, and the effect of the Bill was then not so clearly foreseen, and that now it must be stopped, before it became too late. In another passage the writer of the article said—

“So far as things have gone at present, we find that up to April, 1875, Church schools to the number of 187, having accommodation for 10,900 children, have been transferred to boards. We hope the mischief may be arrested; for let our friends know what all this means. The barest money-value of the property thus surrendered cannot be under £170,000. Of course, every school surrendered by the Church is so much capital not merely sacrificed, but made over to the other side to be used against us. It is like losing a seat in the House of Commons; it counts two on a division.”

If those words meant anything they meant that since 1870 there had been a continued absorption of schools by the boards, and now the Church party would by every means in their power resist the action of those boards and prevent their establishment in new districts, and it showed a determination to support denominational schools without reference to the general interests of education. There was not wanting other evidence, but from the article in the Review and from communications sent by clergymen it was clear that on the part of the Church party there was a strong feeling against board schools. Knowing all this when the noble Lord introduced his Bill, he (Mr. Rylands) listened with the greatest anxiety to see if the influence of that party could be traced. They believed that pressure would be put upon the noble Lord by that party, and it was with great relief they heard the noble Lord's temperate speech, which appeared exceedingly fair and candid. There was every desire to meet him in a fair spirit, for they knew the difficulty of the case he had to deal with. Not only was a favourable opinion formed from his statement, but when the Bill was in their hands, although there were some who thought the Bill wanted improvement in many ways, yet he thought that having regard as he had said to the difficulties of the position it did form a basis upon which a few Amendments might be added to make an useful assistance to the cause of national education. Some might have wished that basis to have been broader, but all were not indisposed to make considerable allowances for the difficulties that had to be contended with. But the noble Lord had entirely departed from that fairness and moderation of tone with which he introduced the Bill. For his (Mr. Rylands's) part he was driven to the conclusion that the noble Lord was now acting under the influence of those above him, and was under the control of the Cabinet. The Cabinet had decided on taking the present step. And he would say why he thought so. He could recollect the debates of 1870, as he had the honour of a seat in the House at that time, and he heard strong speeches from right hon. Gentlemen now on the front bench opposite, who then sat on the side from which he (Mr. Rylands) was speaking, and he could well recollect the strong views they expressed. Those views were still held by some, at least, of right hon. Gentlemen forming the Cabinet. On June 19 of the present year the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Hardy) made a speech directly attacking school boards. He said—

“School boards were distasteful to the country on many grounds. They were unnecessarily expensive, and they often caused conflicts of opinion which led to expense, and rose bitter questions, which when once invoked, were not easily got rid of. They were distasteful because of that direct compulsion which was placed in their hands. He did not say they had not used that power with discretion, but they had exercised it in many instances to raise a great deal of public animosity against them, and whether justly or unjustly, school boards were an institution not favourably regarded. . . . The Legislature had determined that the people should be educated, and the Government had considered that vast and most difficult question—how they could best attain that object. The school boards had not attained it. The country, indeed, would not adopt school boards with the view of attaining it.”—[See ante. p. 36.]

What right had anyone to say anything of the kind? How long had the Act been in operation? Why, it was but as yesterday;—and yet, schools were established all over the country; and no one was justified in saying that the Act of 1870 had not attained the object intended. It might cease to do so if the present clause were adopted, and especially when we found an influential Member of Government denouncing the school board system. There was also an allusion, in the nature of a sneer, to the Dissenters and Secularists—they were coupled together—as offering opposition to religious instruction. He thought it was extremely unfair to Dissenters, whose anxiety in the cause of religious education was not second to that of the Church of England; and Dissenters had done more, out of their poverty, for the cause of religious education, than the Church had done out of her riches. He knew perfectly well, that the charge of opposition to religion was one relied on to influence public opinion, and it was not without its effect. It had had its effect in the General Election—and he only hoped that it would be seen that this was, in fact, only a masked battery to protect the citadel of Church ascendancy. The change of front which the noble Lord had made in regard to the Bill, was, no doubt, due to the considerable pressure put upon the Government by the Church of England party. The influence of that party was not shown in loud demonstrations or large meetings; but it was a quiet pressure, and there was very little doubt that the effect of this pressure determined the Government to adopt this departure from the lines of the Education Act of 1870, and from the pledges which had been given when the present Bill was brought in. If that departure from the principles of 1870 had been made known upon the introduction of the Bill, he did not believe the Bill would have received the support of the House; and he thought there was good reason to complain that they had been unfairly dealt with. The Amendment introduced at the last moment had entirely altered the features of the Bill. The Bill was introduced upon the 18th of May, and there was then not a word to suppose the intention of Government was either to increase the grant to denominational schools, or to strike a blow at school boards. On June 16, and again on the 19th, there was not a word from the Government to indicate a change in their policy and in the nature of the Bill. It was true the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, expressed his strong opposition to school boards—but the House was often favoured with his opinions, and found they did not go altogether in the same direction as those of his Colleagues: they thought this was merely the representation of the strong Conservative element in the Cabinet, and so there appeared no reason to suppose such a change of policy as this;—and then followed the discussion in Committee for several days, and still no sign of the contemplated change. Thus, there had been a long debate on the First Reading—again, an adjourned debate on the Second Reading, and a long discussion in Committee; and, therefore, he maintained they had a right to say they had not been treated fairly, and that many hon. Members would not have supported the Second Reading, had they foreseen the interpolation of the clause. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen might not see the effect of the course adopted; but he (Mr. Rylands) could see it would induce a tendency on the part of the Liberal Party to consider that, if the Church of England was continually stretching out her hands for more money and more authority, the only course was—to separate Episcopalianism from the State; and if such a feeling were induced, it would be in consequence of the course taken by the Church party itself. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to convey the impression that they were offering a mere factious opposition; but it was not so. They wished to offer opposition by every legitimate means in their power; and, if the Bill came up for Third Reading with the disfigurement of the clause, he trusted it would again receive strenuous opposition.

THE O'CONOR DON thought that a great deal of time had been wasted most unnecessarily during the last few days in discussing a very trifling point. The argument on the part of hon. Members opposite was that the clause was not intended to touch any school board that was doing good work, but only those which were practically useless. The view stated to be held by those near him was that the operation of the clause would be much more extensive than its proposer admitted, and that it would affect school boards which were useful. If that were the real state of opinion, and hon. Members were really in earnest, nothing could be easier than to read the clause a second time, and to limit its operation by introducing the necessary Amendments so as to make it carry into effect the views of all parties. He, however, could not regard the opposition to this clause as a bonâ fide one. The whole of Friday and the greater part of to-night had been taken up by a repetition over and over again of the same arguments, which were intended, not to convince the House or the country, but merely to retard the passing of the measure. Hon. Members had placed their opinions before the House, and what was the use then in continuing to waste time by opposing the second reading of the clause? After the declaration of the Government that they intended to pass the Bill such tactics were unavailing, and their only result would be to keep hon. Members in town much longer than was necessary, for he could not believe that the Government would be so weak as to give it up, even if they were to sit until September. The hon. Members who opposed the clause were in a minority in that House, and were in a still greater minority in the country on this particular subject; for some of those who had opposed the clause had been elected by the votes of electors who certainly would not agree with them on this point.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: I tried, during the cool period between this debate and the previous one, to extract from the speeches of hon. Members opposite the real motives which have made hon. Members on the other side below the Gangway cheer so vehemently all efforts to support a clause which they profess to be so small and limited. In the speeches of the two hon. Members for Bury St. Edmunds, those motives were not in any way concealed. The noble Lord the junior Member for that borough (Lord Francis Hervey) openly attacked school boards in general, not the few which we are told come under the operations of the clause. He carefully gathered, from School Inspectors' Reports, all the passages which told against school boards, in order to prove their unpopularity. The youthful ardour of the noble Lord clearly showed that he viewed the clause as an advanced position to assail school boards as a whole. And the irrepressible truthfulness of the elder Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene) confirmed the re-actionary character of the clause, for he showed an eager desire to attack, root and branch, the Act of 1870, and all other obnoxious Acts which the Liberals had passed in their day of power. But I confess I found it more difficult to understand the position of the Government, for the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon) under-rated the value of the clause, describing it as a very little thing, and asked us to be calm and not excited. Formerly he cooed like a dove: to-night he has roared like a lion. He has menaced us with terrible threats, that, if we do not give up our opposition to this clause, he will repeat the exact course of the noble Lord the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Lord Francis Hervey), and will read again from the Inspectors' Reports all the passages which we have heard already to prove the unpopularity of school boards. Well, this will be a formidable infliction to the House, which may well shrink from a repetition of a second dose of extract. But if he considered that that threat appals us, he must have already found out his mistake. What his menace has done is to convince us that we were quite right to consider this clause as an advanced trench against school boards in general. What other meaning can be drawn from it than that there are elements of destruction ready to be poured out from this clause against school boards in general, if we did not surrender at discretion? And after thus imprudently showing us his line of attack, the noble Lord offered to accept an Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson), the effect of which was to enable the Education Department to have power to consider the expediency of the proposals made to abolish a school board, but the speech and the threats of the noble Lord had made this worthless in our eyes. For we no longer saw a champion of school boards at the head of the Department, but a declared enemy who told us that they were unpopular, and threatened us with future consequences if we did not give present submission. Still I find it difficult to understand the position of the Government. The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council has shown such knowledge, and displayed such skill in argument and exposition during the course of his management of this Bill, that when he gives us no information, and uses so few arguments in support of this clause, we must assume that he possesses no information which will justify its introduction, and that he has been unable to discover any forcible arguments by which it can be supported. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) has asked him various specific questions, but can get no specific answers. Perhaps, during the two days which have elapsed since the last debate, the noble Lord has got some of the information which we desire, so I will again put the question. Of the 541 school boards without board schools, how many of them would come under this clause, which requires that the district shall have no board school, no school site, and no deficiency of school accommodation? Surely, before adopting the clause, the Government inquired into its necessity. Out of the 541 school boards referred to, are there 6? are there 12? are there 20 in this condition? All that we now know as a fact is, that the Education Department has been forced to make 870 compulsory school boards, of which only 13 are in boroughs, and the rest in country districts. These compulsory boards are only formed where there is a deficiency of school accommodation, and few of them can yet have had time to apply a remedy. Well, the noble Lord refuses to give us any information to justify the clause, except the one case of the village of Smeeth, which turns out not to be a case at all, for the village is contented enough with its school board as a power in reserve for future action. It is clear why the noble Lord lets us grope our way in the dark in discussing this clause. If he told us that there were only half-a-dozen school boards in this position, he would cease to have justification for introducing such an important change in the machinery of the Act of 1870, in order to please a few villages like Smeeth, knowing that the clause would act equally on important towns like Stockport and Preston, and endanger their education. If, on the other hand, his intimate knowledge of the Department told him there were many school boards which would come under the three conditions of the clause, he would confirm our apprehensions of its far-reaching character, and would thus justify our resistance to powers which may destroy the most important parts of the machinery of the Act of 1870. And so the noble Lord prefers that we should discuss the clause in absence of all information as to its necessity. But is this mode of carrying an important clause worthy of a Government? As long as it was a clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), he might be excused for not knowing the details of the Education Department. But there is no such excuse for the Government which has adopted it, and we can come to no other conclusion than that they consented in a moment of weakness, with a view to please their supporters below the Gangway, and that they have not yet quarried out of the mass of information in the Education Department any facts to support the clause or any arguments which will justify it. The general argument of the noble Lord is—"Let us be cool and not get excited; the clause is really a small affair with few ulterior consequences: a school board, when elected by a popular vote, should surely reasonably be suppressed by the same vote, though we do not want to apply this principle to all local authorities, and the short and long of it is, the Government intend to support this clause, so why fight it?" Well, that style of argument is so entirely unlike the masterly way in which the noble Lord has supported the other clauses of his Bill, that we on this side must think that he is ashamed at having adopted this foundling, and that he desires no inquiries to be made into its history and character. The other side of the House cannot be surprised that we oppose this clause with all our might. We think it a logical but most dangerous consequence of the clause which was passed the other night for relieving denominational schools from local subscriptions. That clause, too, we were told, was but a little one, because its financial result would be limited to about £30,000. We asserted that, though now small, it would grow rapidly, and might ultimately cost the country £300,000 or £400,000 annually. Now, how does this clause follow as a logical result of that one? By it you have introduced a process of change which will in time convert the national denominational schools of this country into mere private adventure schools, with Government subventions, and this conversion will be more quickly completed when school boards have been got rid of, for the new authorities of this Act have no power to build schools of a mere national character to check the selfish operation of private adventure schools. There are many hon. Members opposite who give earnest attention to education and who do not share these apprehensions. But when you find equally earnest men on this side who do so, you should not be surprised that we opposed that clause, although you entreated us to pass it, because it was such a little one; and that we continue our resistance to this clause, although you also assure us it is so little. But it is like a grain of mustard seed which will grow into a large tree, and it is not difficult to see how it will do so. For though there are few school boards now in districts in which there is no deficiency of school accommodation, in the course of time there will be many in the condition of Stockport and Preston. If you had left them alone, these school boards would have passed bye-laws, and carried education into the universality, which you aim to attain by the new indirect and direct compulsory clauses of this Bill. Now you unsettle the whole of the 540 school boards of the country which could have carried on such useful work. The moment there is an appearance of their reaching the position of having stimulated voluntary effort in the district to supply the deficiency of school accommodation, you let loose the powers of destruction. The cost of school boards occurs while this deficiency is being supplied; there is little cost in rural districts where it has been supplied—or, if there be, it is the fault of the ratepayers. But while the cost of stimulating the flagging zeal of denominationalism to supply new schools lasts, there is a minority of persons who are dissatisfied with the cost, and this adds to the unpopularity described by the noble Lord the Member for Bury St. Edmunds. This minority will always be a nucleus for agitation. Generally, in rural parishes, this minority consists of the rich people of the district. Until school boards are done away with there will be an annual resolution for their extinction, and often a ballot, for which the ratepayers will have to pay. You complain now of the cost of triennial elections—you are about to add to them the annual expense of a sectarian war to get rid of the school boards. And as the controversy gets embittered, you, if successful in abolishing the school boards, must be prepared, in your turn, for an organized attempt to re-establish them. By the clause we have lately passed, you will ultimately force Government on the side of those who desire universal school boards. Because they form the strongest levers possessed by the Government to secure a proper supply of schools and efficient attendance, and when Government becomes the chief paymaster, and local subscriptions fail, the Education Department will do its best to obtain a uniform and organized national system of management throughout the country. And so this clause will ultimately defeat the purposes of its framers. But, in the meantime, education will largely suffer from the agitation which will be produced throughout the country in the efforts of minorities to give a constant expression to their views at a heavy cost to the ratepayers. Hitherto this House has opposed the Permissive Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) because it has feared the incessant agitations and fluctuations which it would produce—sometimes the ratepayers voting for public-houses, sometimes against them. But this clause has all the evils of the Permissive Bill in keeping up agitation, fomented and embittered by religious differences, for these, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) admitted, lie at the root of your desire for this clause. And the melancholy outcome of this new clause is, that when we were trying, with little distinction of Party, to frame an Act to promote national education, you, at the very end of the measure, introduce clauses which awaken Party hostilities, and give to the Act, in our eyes, such a Party colour as to destroy our belief in the educational objects of the Bill. When our old animosities were dying out, you fan them again into a blaze. You have committed a great political mistake. We, on this side, never divided into two camps. Below the Gangway there were strong supporters of universal school boards, but above the Gangway there were many of us who desired to give fair play to denominational voluntary schools. We have seen you pass a clause which, in process of time, will convert voluntary schools supported by subscription into private adventure denominational schools, and you ask us now to enable you to strangle school boards, in order that the schools may be more easily kept under the influence of the Church—for that is at the bottom of the clause. Well, you have made us on this side a united party on the subject of education, which most divided us. You have compelled us all to believe that it is impossible to extend education with efficiency and economy to the nation unless there is a uniform system of national management, for you seem determined to repeat the machinery of the Act of 1870 whenever you have an opportunity, and get back to the system of separate denominational schools, as much as possible under the influence of the Church, and as little as possible under that of local authority or of national influence.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if anything could tend to convince the Committee of the extraordinary waste of time to which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lyon Playfair) had alluded, it would be the speech to which they had just listened. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that they (the Conservatives) had been guilty of a political mistake which had been favourable to his Party, inasmuch as it had united them and welded them as one man. He (Mr. Hardy) confessed that he should not be sorry to see a little more union amongst that Party, in spite of the disastrous effects which it might bring about to his own side of the House. It seemed to be taken for granted in all the speeches of hon. Members on the other side that there was no opposition to the Bill until these clauses were brought before the Committee. They forgot that the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), who had made himself so conspicuous in the debate, took a division on the second reading, and that division expressed hostility irrespective of the Government's new grant clause and of this new clause. But coming to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lyon Playfair), he (Mr. Hardy) must say that he had grossly misrepresented the meaning and the intention of the clause. Knowing the candour of the right hon. Gentleman, he did not suppose that he had done it on purpose, and indeed his argument was self-contradictory. He said the intention was to abolish school boards, because when the existing deficiencies had been supplied by the exertions of school boards, then the clause would come into operation, and school boards would be abolished. [MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: No, no; denominational schools would be introduced.] Certainly he understood the argument to be that after the school boards had stimulated the supply of ample accommodation, and made up all existing deficiencies, they would be abolished, and denominational schools would be established. But if so, and if the people supplied the deficiencies by voluntary schools, boards would have done nothing; and to come under this clause a board must be a board without a school under its control. The right hon. Gentleman suggested, though he did not seem to have meant it, that boards with schools would be got rid of; but as that was not so, his argument fell to the ground. As to the question of the right hon. Gentleman, how many of the 541 school boards would come under the operation of the clause, it was impossible for his noble Friend to tell how the feelings of the ratepayers might change as to the continuance of school boards, though if he understood the right hon. Gentleman rightly, he expected that when they had supplied all existing deficiencies the community would get tired of them and their schools, which would be replaced by denominational schools. If they did, the populations which had supplied the means had surely a right to denominational schools if they preferred them. His noble Friend the Vice President of the Council had been unjustly held up to opprobrium for maintaining the unpopularity of school boards, although some hon. Members opposite, and notably the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), had admitted the fact; and as to his (Mr. Hardy's) own remarks on the second reading, he did not disguise his opinion that, if in any place voluntary schools existed, and supplied sufficient and efficient schools, it would be deplorable that a school board should be formed there. It would harden, stiffen, and destroy that voluntary action to which we owed so much; it would be attended with the greatest disadvantage, and it would introduce a dissension where harmony had existed. In certain cases a sufficient number of schools would be set up by voluntary action, and the people, seeing that there were enough schools, and being anxious to get rid of the triennial disputes and expenses of school boards, would naturally be desirous to manage their schools in connection with the ordinary local authority. But then they were told that it would be a terrible thing that when they had created a school board, they should ever put it down. But take the other case, and suppose that the parish wished to have a school board, and were defeated at the election. So far from being obliged to be satisfied,

they had the opportunity under the Bill of raising the controversy again and again. Yet if only by one vote a school board had been created, it was not to be abolished, even although it might be contrary to the wish of the influential people in the parish. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to think that no one was influential in a parish except the rich and powerful. They were very much mistaken. He agreed that when a man owned the whole of a parish he might do either a great deal of good or harm. In the majority of parishes, however, unless he was supported by the really influential people who were interested in imparting religious education, he was powerless to do good, although he might be powerful to do evil. When the people found school boards unnecessary, and became tired of the disputes and expense of elections, were they to be told they were to be debarred from asking to be relieved from that encumbrance? He could not be charged with hostility to school boards, because the only time he had lifted up his voice in Committee was when his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle took a strong view against them, and when he spoke against his hon. Friend's Amendment. The present clause was an act of justice and equity, and was in harmony with the Act of 1870, the only difference being that while that Act allowed the vote for the setting up a school board to be given freely, the Government thought it right, on the other hand, where the people thought they could get the work better done in other ways by Town Councils and the school attendance committees of Boards of Guardians, to allow them to do so. The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), in a speech which was, he (Mr. Hardy) thought, extremely irrelevant—one of those speeches in which the right hon. Gentleman showed the animus he bore towards the Church of England—made statements so unfair and so unreasonable in connection with that Church that he did not think it necessary to reply to them. His sole argument was that by the local authorities, which would be set up where there were no school boards, schools could not be built out of the rates. Well, that was perfectly true; but the Education Department retained all its powers, and if the voluntary principle did not supply the requisite school accommodation, the Education Department would have the power to require that the deficiency should be supplied. The Department would give the voluntary principle the opportunity of supplying the deficiency, or would cause a school board to be established, if the deficiency were not supplied by the voluntary principle. It would in the latter event fix on that parish a school board for ever, as far as the present clause was concerned. It was said that the population of the country was increasing. That was no doubt true, but it did not grow to the extent suggested in a day, or a week, or a month, or even in a year. There would, therefore, be ample time for the Education Department to interfere where the voluntary principle did not meet the emergency. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh University—a great Liberal—taunted the Government with being supported on the present occasion by the most effective assistance of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don). The right hon. Gentleman, who would never ask what a man's religion was, and who would protest against any investigation into the religious creed of any one who sat in that House, did not hesitate to say that the Government, of whom he had spoken as upholding the bulwarks of Protestantism, had begged for Roman Catholic assistance. He had seen the time when Roman Catholic assistance had been begged for by Parties in that House. It was not in his time, but he had heard of "compacts" with Roman Catholic Gentlemen years ago at Willis's Rooms, and he had known much more recently the assistance of Roman Catholic Members sought for the destruction of a Protestant Establishment. He avowed that in this case without asking it they were ready to take that assistance, because it was founded on justice. The hon. Member for Roscommon put forward no religious ground for giving them his support; and yet the right hon. Gentleman had thrown out that miserable taunt, when the proposal of the Government was founded on justice alone, and when he hoped by this means to obtain that united action so much to be desired by the Party opposite. When he was told that the Government were pursuing a re-actionary policy on the question of education, it passed by him like the idle wind which he regarded not. The question now before the House had nothing whatever to do with religion. It was whether school boards were necessary or not, and whether that, when they were not necessary, parishes should be relieved from them. In order to give effect to their taunts hon. Members opposite had assumed that the two excellent Representatives of Bury St. Edmund's were leaders of the great Conservative Party. He had great respect for the honesty of his hon. Friend (Mr. Greene), and was sure that when he made his general observations, he had regard to the question of justice alone, and did not think of re-action. The hon. Member for Burnley had quoted Lord Palmerston, and said the dirty Party and the religious Party were generally connected, but the sanitary question had nothing to do with the matter, and under the provisions of the Bill the dirty Party, or the non-education Party, would have little chance of success. In fact, the right hon. Member for Bradford admitted that the Bill contained provisions of effective compulsion for education; and although he wished for something better, he was bound to admit that as one of the clauses now stood it would make a very considerable advance in education. What, therefore, was the position? The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council had brought in a Bill for the spread of education throughout the country, and hon. Members opposite said they had supported it up to a certain point. That was not exactly the case. At all events, they had not done so as a body. They admitted that the Bill was calculated to advance education; and there was now a scheme on foot which, so far from confining school boards to places where they at present existed, took the power of extending them to every district in the country, so that in every parish the majority might call for school boards if they wished. Where, then, was the reality or justice of the taunt which said—"You are retarding education, and setting yourselves against it?" It seemed to him that the attack on that ground was wholly without foundation. Well, the hon. Member for Burnley wound up by reading an article from the The Church Quarterly Review, and endeavoured to make hon. Members at that side of the House responsible for every word of that article.

For his part he must decline to be bound by what was stated in any magazine, although he had no doubt there was a great deal of truth in the article in question. The hon. Member went on to say that if the Church of England was going to stretch out her hand everywhere to exercise power or to receive money—which she could not do under the clause—the result would be to unite the great Liberal Party to procure the disestablishment of the Church and to throw her upon her own resources. Well, the time might come when the Party opposite might band together for that crusade, and for that crusade he would wait. For the present he was content to say that the Government had presented to the House an honest Bill, and they believed they were in no wise impairing the honesty or force of that Bill by tendering as they did to his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) in a sense of equity and justice, a hearty support.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was anxious to go back to the purely educational aspect of the matter, and to explain why he and many others who thought with him were, upon solely educational grounds, strongly opposed to the clause. The right hon. Gentleman, in alluding to the previous history of the Bill, hardly did justice to hon. Members on that side of the House. He spoke of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) as if he had opposed the second reading. No opposition was offered to that stage, and the opposition subsequently offered was consistent with a general support of the Bill. The division which was taken on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), also, was justified by the Amendments which were made in the Bill, as a concession to opinions expressed on both sides of the House. Then again, in Committee, the sole view of hon. Members was to secure as good a Bill as possible. Why, then, was the position so changed by this clause? He certainly thought the right hon. Gentleman would have stated the grievance which was to be met and the cases which required the operation of the clause. Some isolated cases had been mentioned, but they were not sufficient to call for such a provision, and the argument had never been answered that the clause would affect very many cases that ought to be let alone.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

The right hon. Gentleman said—"We will find you a substitute for the powers which are taken away;" but in the case of Stockport, Cambridge, and Kendal, for instance, no substitute whatever was provided. What was feared was, that in places where the school boards were doing good work, the clause would lead to agitation and a combination of all who for any reason were opposed to school boards with a view to have them dissolved. This was all the more likely from the fact—which he would admit—that school boards were not popular. That unpopularity, however, existed only to a certain degree, and might be accounted for, if they considered that school boards could not have done their duty without earning some unpopularity; but he should never have expected the Education Minister to threaten that if they opposed the clause, he would retail every insinuation which the Inspectors had heard against the school boards. Those who opposed the clause had no particular love for school boards, but were anxious to maintain the principle that the inhabitants of a locality should elect persons to look after education, believing that upon such a principle they must rely for the success of education in this country. Parliament should be prepared to abide by the compromise of 1870; and while saying that where a district could do without a school board, it should not be interfered with, he should strongly object to a clause which would virtually upset everything that the Act of 1870 had done. With regard to the discretion to be given to the Education Department, he thought hon. Members ought not to be blamed if they declined to repose unlimited confidence in that Department. In many a rural parish where a school had been voluntarily transferred to a school board, the influence of neighbouring parishes would, in the event of this clause being passed, be exerted to procure the re-transfer of the school to its original owners. What cause, he should like to know, was there for such an agitation? Was it worth while to spend more time in discussing a clause which could not be passed? It was not too late for the Government to clothe the new authority with the necessary organizing power, and then they would hear very little more of the opposition. Dissenters in the country had much more confidence in school boards than in voluntary teaching, and where there was a considerable number of Dissenters in school board-districts they had obtained almost a vested right in school boards, and Government had no right to take from them that protection even by a vote of the majority. With reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) he must express a doubt whether the clause would be received with satisfaction by the Catholics in towns like Manchester and Birmingham, because the Catholics were there represented on the school boards, and it was very doubtful whether they would be represented for educational purposes in the Town Councils. The principle of Church and State was involved in the proposal and it was opposed by his side of the House, because they thought it would discourage the rate system as compared with the denominational system. He appealed to the Government whether it was worth their while to risk the failure of their Bill by insisting upon the retention of the clause. The Government might depend upon it that in the long run this step on their part would be found not to be a popular one, and that instead of enhancing, it would gradually diminish the usefulness of the measure.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 221; Noes 140: Majority 81.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, as an Amendment, to the proposed new clause, to insert at the beginning, the words—

"Where a School Board has been formed under sub-section one of section twelve of The Elementary Education Act, 1870."

The clause had been supported upon the ground that where there had been voluntary action in the formation of a board there ought to be voluntary action in getting rid of it, and this Amendment would confine the operation of the clause to such cases. If the limitation were not introduced, the right to dissolve school boards might be taken as applying more widely than perhaps it was meant to do.

MR. PELL hoped that the Government would not accede to the Amendment, as it would very much restrict the operation of the clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that by far the largest number of important school boards had been voluntarily formed; but still many had been established compulsorily, and there would be great danger in allowing the clause to apply to the latter.

VISCOUNT SANDON declined to accept the Amendment, which he did not think would be in accordance with the vote to which the Committee had just come. Moreover, it would not meet cases where schools had been re-transferred to their original owners, and where, consequently, school boards were left with nothing to do.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that to meet some objections which he understood were entertained, he would ask leave to amend the Amendment by leaving out the words "sub-section one."

MR. FAWCETT thought that they ought not to be asked to go on with the clause that night. They had all along been told that it was simply meant to give the ratepayers power to rescind their decision to create a school board; but now it was found that the new clause would go far beyond that. He did not wish to impede the progress of the Bill, but he considered it unprecedented that great principles should be imported into a Bill after it had passed its second reading, and was on the eve of becoming law.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, as there seemed to be considerable confusion regarding the effect of the Amendment, he thought they should have further time for its consideration, and would move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER pointed out that there would be none of the dangers which some hon. Members anticipated from the clause the House had just adopted, and considered the Amendment unnecessary.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consent to his Amendment, as his only objection to it was that he thought the object he had in view was already provided for by the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, they had had rather a heavy evening, and therefore he would consent to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS BILL

(Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Salt.)

[BILL 186.] SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

Question again proposed.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE hoped that the Bill would not be proceeded with at that late hour (10 minutes past 12). He considered that, if the Amendments proposed by the Government were introduced, the Bill would not affect the object in view, and he believed its principal supporters were certain Scotch manufacturers who thought that if it passed they would be able to pollute the rivers as much as they pleased. He was sure that those who had given their attention to the pollution of rivers must know that the prevention must be attended with considerable expense to those manufacturers who, for the purposes of their manufactures, first polluted them. The Bill had been so altered by Amendments that it was by no means the same Bill. The whole construction of the Bill would depend upon the interpretation put upon the words "reasonable cost." He would not move to report Progress; but, if necessary, doubtless some other hon. Member would make such a Motion.

MR. WHITWELL supported the Motion. The Bill had far better be carried, than that nothing should be done for the purification of rivers for another Session. He considered it most essential to the health of the country, inasmuch as infection, it was well known, was carried along the stream of polluted rivers. He could not agree with the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea in his opposition to the second reading of the Bill; and with regard to the manufacturers, for whom he expressed so much interest, he did not see that they were to be considered more than other people. He hoped Parliament would pass the Bill that Session. What the Government proposed to do was quite reasonable; it was that the Bill might be read a second time with a view to the introduction of Amendments which they had well considered since the debate had been adjourned, and which, when printed, hon. Members would be better able to understand than they could do at present.

MR. ORR EWING hoped the opposition to the Bill would be withdrawn, and a hearty endeavour made to pass it that Session. It was an excellent Bill, and if passed into law would effect a great improvement.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, the Bill was in the interest of both the traders and the manufacturers. The subject of pollution of rivers was considered so important that it was mentioned in the Queen's Speech last year, and it was to be regretted that it was not brought in until the end of the Session. The House was no doubt aware that there had been a Royal Commission sitting on the subject for some years, and that Commission had decided on a Report. A Select Committee of the House of Lords had also inquired into the subject, and had made a Report upon it, but there was not a single one of the recommendations of that Committee included in the Bill. He asked what chance such a measure as that would have if it reached the House of Lords, where it was directly opposed to the views of the Royal Commission, and did not incorporate a single recommendation of the Committee of that House? The President of the Local Government Board wished the House to pass the Bill in silence. ["No, no!"] Well, the right hon. Gentleman had not explained what the new Amendments were to be, and the Bill was getting changed since it was first brought into the House. He considered that they would simply be wasting time to discuss the measure at that period of the Session, and therefore hoped it would not be proceeded with.

MR. HERMON would rather have no Bill than an imperfect one, but this was a Bill which was greatly required and called for in the North of England, and he hoped the House would consent to the second reading; at the same time he hoped the Amendments would be very carefully scrutinized in Committee, as he looked upon some of them with suspicion.

MR. STEVENSON also supported the second reading.

MR. NEWDEGATE was most anxious that the Bill should be passed, because the supposed indifference of the House upon the subject was in itself an obstruction to putting even the provisions of the present defective law into force. By passing the Bill, the House would remove an impression that that pollution could be carried on with impunity.

MR. YEAMAN thought the Bill in its present shape too stringent, but if the 16th clause were omitted, and certain other modifications made, he should not oppose the second reading. He advocated uniformity of legislation for England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the compulsory acquisition of land to enable manufacturers to purify refuse.

MR. M'LAGAN considered it very desirable that the second reading should be agreed to, in order that the various Amendments which were in contemplation might be placed before the House.

LORD FREDERICK CAYENDISH said, it was impossible that a Bill on such a difficult and complicated question requiring such careful consideration could pass during the remainder of the Session. It could only be passed by satisfying all the manufacturers and traders who were engaged in polluting rivers, and would then be an obstruction to really useful legislation.

COLONEL MURE hoped that the Bill would pass a second reading. The deputations, so many of which had come up to London, were at first opposed to this Bill; but they had at last come to the conclusion that while it would prevent the pollution of rivers, it would not be oppressive to the manufacturing and other interests concerned. In Scotland there was a general desire to see the measure passed, as the present law had not succeeded in purifying the rivers.

MR. DILLWYN wished that a Bill with this object should pass, but then he wished it to be a good Bill, and they were not likely to have a good Bill when they were discussing it at that period of the Session, and at that time of night (a quarter to 1 o'clock). He would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH hoped that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dillwyn) would not press his Motion. The subject had been under his consideration for two years, and he felt sure that no initial measure could be passed that was not in some degree a skeleton Bill. If the measure were postponed, the House might spend six weeks or two months next Session without passing a more complete and effective Bill than the present. The manufacturers of several towns which had at first opposed the measure were now anxious that it should pass, and that there should be a uniform provision for the whole of the Kingdom, making it a statutory offence to pollute rivers. No one would think of legislating on the subject without due safeguards for the protection of the manufacturing and other interests involved. In future years there might be special tribunals and Conservancy Boards to take in charge the improvement of the rivers of the Kingdom from their sources; but the initial measure must be some such a Bill as the present. It was impossible to exaggerate the importance in regard to the water supply of this country of keeping the sources of rivers free from pollution, and this Bill would do more to improve the purity of the domestic supply of water than any other measure that could be proposed. The House would incur a vast responsibility if it rejected this Bill. The important thing was to get the obligation of law placed upon the sanitary authorities, the owners of mines and manufacturing, and private individuals in every district, and there was now a bonâ fide desire in the very centres of manufacturing industry that this general obligation of law should be imposed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was not opposed to the second reading of the Bill with a view to the introduction of the Amendments to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred; but it was necessary that the measure in its new shape should be fully discussed on going into Committee.

Mr. Dillwyn

In reply to Sir CHARLES W. DILKE,

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the Bill would be reprinted, and be in the hands of hon. Members by Wednesday morning at latest.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MEDICAL ACT (QUALIFICATIONS) BILL.

(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

[NO. 184] SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to remove restrictions on the granting of qualifications for registration under the Medical Act on the ground of sex. The Bill, therefore, provided that the powers of every body, entitled under the Medical Act to grant such qualifications, should extend to give them to all persons without distinction of sex; but it was provided that no person who, except for this Act, would not have been entitled to be registered, should, by reason of such registration, take part in the government of the Universities or corporations mentioned in the Medical Act. He moved that the Bill, which had come up from the Commons, be now read a second time.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

CLEAN RIVERS BILL.—[No. 182.]

(The Duke of Buccleuch.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that after the very full discussion which took place during last Session on the Bill which was brought in by the noble Marquess the Secretary the State for India, it was evident there was an absolute necessity that something should be done to prevent the wholesale pollution of the rivers of this country. The present Bill did not go beyond the prevention of the pollution of rivers which were at present unpolluted. Its provisions were simple. It provided that every person who should cause or permit to fall or flow, or put or permit to be carried into any clean river, or any clean part of a river, any polluting matter, should be deemed to have committed an offence against the Act. This prohibition was to be enforced by summary order of the County Court of the district in which the offence was committed, and the person making default in complying with the order of the County Court, made himself liable to a penalty not exceeding £50 a-day for every day during which he was in default, and in the event of non-compliance with the order for one month, the Court might order the necessary steps to be taken to carry their order into effect, and award the expenses to the persons employed as a debt. An appeal was given to the High Court of Justice. The Act was made applicable to Scotland, but not to Ireland. He thought that as every question which had given rise to controversy in respect of previous Bills had been excluded from this, their Lordships would not hesitate to give it a second reading. The noble Duke concluded by moving that the Bill be now read the second time.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till Thursday next, Eleven o'clock.

ST. STEPHEN'S GREEN, DUBLIN.

QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government, having recently intimated its willingness to recommend to Parliament the grant of an annual sum of £600 for the maintenance of St. Stephen's Green, Dublin, as a public or people's park, on conditions, among others, that the Corporation of that City should forego a yearly rent of £276 now receivable thereout, and should also contribute a sum of £600 annually, will recommend that, subject to such regulations as Parliament may approve, the control of said public or people's park, and the expenditure of the said Parliamentary grant be entrusted to the Lord Mayor and Corporation of said City; and, whether a precedent for such a course is not to be found in the Parliamentary grant to the Royal Dublin Society for the maintenance of the Leinster lawn?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: The hon. Member's Question is based on the hypothesis that St. Stephen's Green is, or will be, a public or people's park. It is not so at present. Whether it will eventually become so is a matter for Parliament to decide, if the parties who are desirous it should become a public park make application to Parliament. If the Corporation of Dublin were to obtain a private Act vesting the Green in them as a "Public or People's Park," and giving them control thereof, it would be open to the Government to consider any application which might be made by the Corporation for a grant towards its maintenance as such; but it seems to me premature to express an opinion on the subject now. I cannot, however, admit that a precedent for such a course would be found in the grant to the Royal Dublin Society for the maintenance of Leinster Lawn; that is a small garden in the possession of the Royal Dublin Society, and bounded on three sides by the buildings of the Society and of the Government. St. Stephen's Green is, by the terms of the hon. Member's Question, an area of such size as to deserve the name of a park, and bordered by property belonging to a great number of owners.

PUBLIC HEALTH—VACCINATION ACT— CASE OF MR. PEARCE.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he is aware that another summons has been issued against Mr. Pearce, of Andover, for non-compliance with the Vaccination Act, he having already suffered twenty-two previous convictions; and whether he proposes to take any steps in the matter?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he was aware that Mr. Pearce had been prosecuted a number of times for non-compliance with the provisions of the Vaccination Act. He received a complaint from Mr. Pearce in the autumn of last year, upon which he communicated with the Guardians, and their reply was that Mr. Pearce was a member of the Anti-Vaccination Society, and that they presumed the society paid the fines in his case. He communicated the views of the Local Government Board upon the subject to the Board of Guardians, which were similar to those addressed to the Evesham Guardians on the previous occasion. In May last Mr. Pearce complained of his being subjected to persecution by the Guardians, and stated that two children had then died in Andover, and that two were dying from the effects of vaccination. He caused a special inquiry to be made into the truth of the allegation by a competent medical officer, who afterwards reported that there was no reason to suppose that the deaths of these two children were caused by vaccination. He had no intention of entering further on this case, and so the Guardians had been informed. But the whole subject was one of great difficulty, and was constantly under his notice, and he could not but hope that some means would be devised by-and-by to reconcile the due execution of the law with some modification of the punishment provided for its infringement.

IRISH CHURCH BODY—EMLY CATHEDRAL CHURCH—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN (for Mr. ARTHUR MOORE) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is aware that the late Cathedral Church of Emly, built on the site of the ancient Roman Catholic Cathedral, and in recent times, until some seven years since, used as a place of worship of the United Church of England and Ireland, has since remained unused, there not being a single Protestant in the parish, and is fast falling into complete decay; while the Irish Church Body, in whom it is at present vested, and the Diocesan Council of Emly, consider that, although they have no use for it, they have yet no power under their Statutes to sell it for the purposes of a place of Roman Catholic worship, or site therefor; whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to a recent correspondence between the Secretary of the Irish Church Body and the Secretary of the Diocesan Council of Emly, on the one hand, and the present Roman Catholic Parish Priest of Emly on the other hand, seeking, on behalf of the Roman Catholic people of the parish, to purchase the same for Roman Catholic purposes, in which the refusal of the former to sell the same for such purpose is based solely upon their inability to do so; and, whether such inability exists at present in fact; if so, whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to amend the Irish Church Act, so far to remove such inability?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I believe that at the last Census there were 18 Episcopalian Protestants in the parish of Emly; but I know nothing of the circumstances stated in the hon. Member's Question, nor of the correspondence to which he refers. The Government have no control over the Representative Body of the Irish Church, and I presume that if that Body desired an alteration in the law for the purpose of enabling them to act in the manner suggested in the Question, they would propose some legislation on this subject, as they have already done in the past Sessions in other matters affecting them, through members of their Body who are also hon. Members of this House.

CAPTAIN NOLAN: As the Chief Secretary has not answered the latter part of the Question, I beg to give Notice that I shall on Thursday next ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether it is legal for the Irish Episcopal Church or any of its bodies to sell ecclesiastical edifices which have fallen into disuse?

DOVER PIER—ENGLISH AND FOREIGN MAIL BOATS.—QUESTION.

MR. HAYTER asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Government will erect another landing stage at the Dover Pier, to enable English steamers to run alongside, since the present piers are occupied by the Mail Boats running between Dover and Calais, and these boats are under a foreign flag; and whether he is aware, that in consequence of their running under a foreign flag, they can take as many passengers as they please, to the great danger of those passengers, while English steamers are properly restricted by the Board of Trade to a fixed number?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: There are two available landing stages at the Dover Pier, and there is no intention at present of going to the expense of any more. It is only at the times of embarking or landing mails and passengers that they are occupied by the mail boats running between Dover and Calais and between Dover and Ostend. At all other times they are available for the use of other vessels, and every endeavour is made to accommodate all who require to come alongside. The vessels which carry the Calais night mails are under the English flag, those which carry the Calais day mails are under the French flag, and those carrying the Ostend day and night mails are under the Belgian flag. There is no restriction as to the number of passengers in the Belgian boats, but the number of passengers is seldom large, the average for last month being 58. The vessels under the French flag cannot legally take as many passengers as they please, the French certificate restricting them to 450. The English certificate for the same vessels would have been 500.

BRUSSELS INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.—QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, seeing that the various Government Departments have contributed by their exhibits to the Brussels International Exhibition, and have arranged for the visits of special Commissioners to report upon the Exhibition, in order to avail themselves thereby of its advantages, it is still the intention of Her Majesty's Government to throw upon private individuals the cost of the Government exhibits?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Exhibition had been entirely of a voluntary character; no grant had been given towards it even by the Belgian Government; and the British Government did not think it desirable to break through the rule which they had made not to grant any public money for the purpose referred to.

NAVY—H. M. S. "THUNDERER."

QUESTIONS.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been drawn to a report in the "Times" of the 22nd inst. of a statement made on the previous day by the Coroner to the jury summoned to inquire into the cause of the death of several victims of the catastrophe on board H. M. S. "Thunderer," on the 14th inst., as follows:—

"A few days ago Captain Waddilove had informed the Admiral that the contractors were desirous of being permitted to clean the engines. The Admiral had communicated with him, and, as he knew that the jury were willing that the requisite permission should be granted, he had given it, but with the precaution that an officer should be present during the cleaning to see that the stokehole was not interfered with. It was very necessary that the machinery should be cleaned, because the engines in a ship like the 'Thunderer' cost as much as a ship of war did in the past ;"

and, whether such admission to the engine-room really took place; and, if so, whether the officials of the Constructors' Department approve of such admission, and have made any report thereon?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he had not seen the paragraph to which his hon. Friend referred; but in consequence of this Question and another by the hon. Member for Glasgow, he telegraphed to Portsmouth for full information on the subject, but no answer had been received when he left the office a few minutes ago. He had heard, however, that the contractors were desirous of being permitted to clean the engines, as it was apprehended that the great quantity of vapour which had escaped into the engine-room might cause considerable damage, but that that desire had not been carried out. It would be a mistake to suppose that admission to the engine-room implied admision to the stoke-hole. There were doors between them, which were closed, and a sentry was placed there, and no one was admitted without the Coroner's sanction being first obtained.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the inquest regarding the "Thunderer" explosion is being conducted by the same coroner who conducted the first "Mistletoe" inquiry; whether that person still holds both the office of Public Coroner and of Admiralty Solicitor; what steps, if any, have been taken to ensure an impartial inquiry; whether it be not the fact, as stated in the "Times" of Saturday, that that official has already permitted some parties who may be implicated in the result of the inquest to have access to the engine-rooms, previous to the inspection by the jury; and, whether he cannot take steps to put the inquiry in the hands of some coroner who is not in the employment of the Admiralty?

MR. HUNT said, that the Question of the hon. Member was on the assumption that the Admiralty had something to do with the Coroner's inquisitions. The Admiralty had nothing whatever to do with Coroners; and as the hon. Member came from a country where there was no such institution as a Coroner, he might inform him that a Coroner was a public officer elected by the freeholders, of the jurisdiction within which he acted. In that case Mr. Harvey was the Coroner for Hampshire; he did not know for what division, but he sat as the county Coroner, and had been elected by the freeholders, and the Admiralty had no power to interfere with him or to say how he was to discharge his commission. He had no reason to doubt that Mr. Harvey was the same gentleman who presided over the inquiry in the case of the Mistletoe. Mr. Harvey was employed by the Solicitor to the Admiralty as law agent for local purposes. He was not a salaried officer, but was paid by fees for whatever work was done. With regard to the third part of the Question he understood from the Home Office that sanction had been given to the Coroner having as assessor a gentleman who was an expert in boilers to assist him in the inquiry at the public expense. With regard to the last part of the Question he had no power whatever to interfere; but he had intimated to the Coroner that the Admiralty would give every assistance for the inquiry, and would send down persons connected with the Admiralty, and also persons not so connected, to give him every aid that might be required.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Perhaps I may be allowed, after the statement of my right hon. Friend, to say that the Coroner applied to the Home Office that some one should be appointed to assist him in the inspection, but I declined to appoint any one, because I thought the inquiry ought to be entirely independent. The Coroner represented that he had no funds, and that the county declined to bear the burden. I told him I had the concurrence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in stating that funds would be placed at his disposal; but he must clearly understand that the sole responsibility of the choice of the person to assist in the inspection and the conduct of the inquiry must fall on himself.

INDIA—ROMAN CATHOLIC CATHEDRALS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to a statement appearing in an Indian newspaper called "The Englishman," that a grant made by the Lieutenant Governor of the North West Provinces of 12,000 rupees towards the construction of a Roman Catholic Cathedral having been brought to the notice of the Viceroy, Whether it is the fact that 12,000 rupees has been granted by the Lieutenant Governor of the North West Provinces towards the construction of a Roman Catholic Cathedral; and, if so, whether such grant has been submitted for the approval of the Government, or in any case is an appropriation of public money approved of by Her Majesty's Government? The hon. Member expressed his disappointment that since he had given Notice of it, the Question had been somewhat curtailed, and he explained that the omitted portion stated that the Viceroy had administered to an official and formal protest made to him on this subject a most scathing rebuke. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that the hon. Member was now endeavouring to include the very point which had already been excluded from the Question.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: We have no information upon this subject except what we have derived from Indian newspapers. I think it probable that the statement is correct, inasmuch as the Indian Government has always admitted its obligation, under certain conditions, to contribute towards the construction and repair of places of worship frequented by the Military and Civil Services.

MR. WHALLEY then asked the noble Lord, Whether he had received any communication from the Viceroy expressing indignation and rebuke towards certain Protestant parties who had made representations to him?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: We have no Papers.

[BILL 155.]

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 24th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

New Clause—

(Dissolution of School Board under certain circumstances.)

("Where application for the dissolution of a School Board is made to the Education Department by the like persons and in the like manner as an application for the formation of a School Board, under section twelve of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' and the Education Department, are satisfied that no school and no site for a school is in the possession or under the control of the School Board, and that there is a sufficient amount of public school accommodation for the district of the School Board, the Education Department may, after such notice as they think sufficient, order the dissolution of the School Board.

"The Education Department by any such order shall make provision for the disposal of all money, furniture, books, documents, and property belonging to the School Board, and for the discharge out of the local rate of all the liabilities of the board, and such other provisions as appear to the department necessary or proper for carrying into effect the dissolution of the board.

"The Education Department shall publish the order in manner directed by 'The Elementary Education Act, 1873,' with respect to the publication of notices, and after the date of such publication or any later date mentioned in the order, the order shall have effect as if it were enacted by Parliament, without prejudice nevertheless to the subsequent formation of a School Board in the same school district. All bye-laws previously made by the School Board shall continue in force, subject nevertheless to be revoked or altered by the local authority under this Act,"—(Mr. Pell.)

Amendment proposed, at the beginning of the Clause, to insert the words

"Where a School Board has been formed under sub-section one of section twelve of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' and."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Amendment made to the proposed Amendment, by leaving out the words "sub-section one of."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'Where a School Board has been formed under section twelve of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' and,' be there inserted."

MR. PELL expressed a hope that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forster would not press his Amendment after virtually accepting the principle of the clause last night. The Amendment would limit the operation of the clause to something like half-a-dozen school boards.

MR. ROEBUCK entered a strong protest against any enlargement of the Motion, and urged that the Committee should keep to the principle on which the sanction of a majority of the House had been given to the clause. Therefore, in his opinion, the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman ought to be entertained by the Committee, as, in his opinion, any other course would not be honest, but an evasion of the explanation which the proposer of the clause was understood to give. Without his Amendment the clause which had been adopted would very much delay, if not frustrate entirely, the chief object of the Act of 1870—namely, to secure sufficient schools throughout the country.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, there were two classes of school boards—namely, the voluntarily and compulsorily-formed school boards. He did not think his hon. Friend (Mr. Pell) intended to say that only those should be capable of being removed which the direct action of the ratepayers had brought into existence.

MR. FORSYTH, in opposing the Amendment, said, he regretted to see that the once great Liberal Party had been reduced to such a state of impotence and distraction that the only possible means they could find of obtaining a temporary union was by manufacturing an imaginary grievance and making a mountain out of a mole-hill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER doubted very much whether the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down and those who thought with him would act as they had done and freely scatter charges of insincerity if they had taken the kind of interest in the work of education which he had been obliged to take. And he might just suggest to hon. Gentlemen opposite that to make insinuations would not tend to shorten the debate. He took a very sad view of the clause, and it was just possible he had gone too far in the way of concession in his Amendment. Most undoubtedly the main argument used to press the clause upon the acceptance of the Committee was, that it was considered reasonable to give districts which had voluntarily-formed school boards the right to get rid of them if they chose. The number of cases in which this power would be used would, he had no doubt, be very limited; but if the clause were to go forth without this guarded exception, they might be prepared for a very different result. The clause as it stood would simply, he would not say destroy, but frustrate the great object of the Act of 1870, which was to supply the country with efficient schools.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I must be allowed to free the Government from all charge of having procured the passing of this clause by a sort of false pretence—that we desired it to apply to both kinds of school boards, whereas we represented it as meant merely for voluntarily-formed boards. The clause was distinctly meant to apply to compulsorily-formed school boards. I myself most distinctly asserted that principle and argued upon it.

MR. RYLANDS said, in the course of a number of speeches, made by many hon. Gentlemen, including the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), and the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill, the burden of the argument of hon. Gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House seemed to be that these school boards, having been formed by the voluntary desire of the particular districts in which they had been established, it was only reasonable that the ratepayers should be allowed to change their mind, and relieve themselves of the obligations placed on their shoulders. Hon. Members opposite seemed to recommend the clause upon those grounds. Those on the Opposition side wished to restrict the operation of the clause, and considered they had a perfect right to call on them to accept the Amendment of his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). He wished to point out to the noble Lord that it was not their desire to carry on a discussion on the clause in an unreasonable manner, and hoped to see a desire on the part of the Government to meet them fairly. Hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that the opponents to the clause were making "much ado about nothing;" but he wished to remind the Committee that there was a great deal involved in the clause, and they said that the Government, finding there was such a strong feeling on that side of the House, might with propriety consider how they could meet them. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forsyth) had said just now that he thought that the Liberal Party had got into a miserable condition when they sought to unite on a matter of this character; but he could tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Party had united because they were entirely opposed to the views of the Government. The Liberal Party were not prepared to support measures which tended to promote the advantage of particular religious bodies. The proposal to adopt the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) was really no advantage at all, because they did not accept that as any compromise. They believed that the effect of that Amendment would be simply nil, because it left it entirely in the discretion of the Education Department to suppress school boards. In the Act of 1870, to which attention had been more than once directed, there was a clause of very great importance; under that clause the Education Department, if it considered it necessary in any locality, gave notice that it was intended to make inquiries whether there was sufficient educational accommodation. After careful inquiry, if it was found that there was not sufficient educational accommodation, the Education Department gave notice for the district to provide the necessary schools. Under the same clause of the Act of 1870, if the district was dissatisfied with what was done by the Education Department, they had power to demand a special inquiry, and after that inquiry, most carefully conducted, had been held, the Department had a right to call on the locality to provide the wanting accommodation for educational purposes, and after giving a very long notice, if the district did not provide what was requisite, then the Education Department had a right to step in and require that there should be a school board et cetera.

establish the necessary schools. He contended that when a school board had been compulsorily formed after so much care and deliberation, it ought not to be put an end to in the manner proposed by the clause. An hon. Gentleman—he believed the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—directed attention to the fact that under the provisions of the Bill, if any school attendance committee made a default, then the Education Department would come in and act in its stead, and the right hon. Gentleman urged that under the Bill in such cases the necessity for the existence of school boards would be done away with. But inasmuch as under the Bill the default was merely with reference to school attendance, and the default under the Act of 1870 was with reference to school boards, he thought the clause to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer alluded did not at all remove the objection which he had to this clause. The argument of the hon. Member for Leicestershire was that school boards were inconvenient because they were costly. Hon. Members asked why should there be the expense of school boards in districts where there were bodies who might carry out the purposes for which school boards existed? He was quite agreeable to that if hon. Gentlemen on the other side would meet them on this question. If the Committee would give Boards of Guardians and Town Councils the same powers with respect to everything which was now possessed by school boards, he dared to say that the difficulty would be met. But so long as the Government proposed to do away with school boards, and substitute nothing in place of them, he should oppose them, because he believed it would be doing a great injury to the education of this country, and tend to act unfairly with school boards.

MR. E. JENKINS felt that the Bill as it now stood could not be accepted in that House without treason against the Liberal Party. It was time for the Liberal Party to stand together in that House and oppose the re-actionary attempts of the Party opposite. They had at last succeeded in re-uniting the Liberal Party. [Ironical cheers.] Well, it was some satisfaction to be able to take some part in that union, though he confessed that, after swallowing six camels they were now straining at something very like a gnat. The clause proposed to strike directly at the educational system established by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford in 1870. The speeches of the Secretary of State for War and the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council indicated that their opposition to school boards was a sectarian opposition, based upon bigoted sentiment, and one which ought not to be admitted in a country where the Established Church had no right to claim the supremacy which these Amendments endeavoured to establish for her. He complained that the Opposition had never had the slightest reason to anticipate that there would be sprung upon them at the last moment such an Amendment as that of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). He thought they were entitled to ask the noble Lord also whether he was prepared to accept the further Amendments of the hon. Member?

VISCOUNT SANDON said, at the commencement of his speech, when he explained the views of the Government respecting the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), he stated that the Government distinctly refused to accept the other Amendments which were proposed by his hon. Friend and by various other Members of the House, which proposed to enable localities to get rid of school boards which had schools. The hon. Member was probably absent, or he would have heard it.

MR. E. JENKINS said, it was impossible for hon. Members to be present during the whole of a debate; but he was very sorry if he had misrepresented the noble Lord's views. For his part, he hoped the Bill would be thrown out altogether, and that they would be able to establish a system of national education to give to the children that which the nation alone should teach, leaving it to the energy, and bigotry, and fanaticism, and enthusiasm of the Churches to do that which they could to bring the children under religious education.

MR. E. J. REED hinted that the Government were not dealing with the House quite fairly, and observed that great public discredit would be brought upon the House by the unnecessary determination of the Government to hold to the strictest and severest interpretation not merely of their own clauses, but of those clauses which they adopted from hon. Members below the Gangway. The clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire was enforced by the Government on the ground that it was the ratepayers' right to have the power of destroying what they had voluntarily created. Yet they now refused to agree to an Amendment which would limit the operation of the clause to such cases. If the deep feelings of the Opposition were to be treated in that way, and no concessions were made to the strongest wishes of many of its most moderate Members, he should have no hesitation in joining those who would use every Form of the House for obstructing the progress of the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the principle of the Act of 1870 was to give fair play to voluntary effort, supplementing it by the action of the Department and the compulsory power of the school boards in cases where the school accommodation was insufficient. In this Bill the Government had endeavoured to assist in the development of this voluntary effort. This attempt was entirely consistent with all they had ever proposed or done with regard to education. Their view had always been that where voluntary effort was sufficient, school boards should not be forced upon a reluctant district. It was a logical sequence to this principle that if, after a school board had been forced upon a district, voluntary efforts there were stimulated by public opinion, or possibly by the action of the school board itself, fair play should be given to the district, and it should have the opportunity of saying—"Trust us, and let us now swim without corks." The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman would not allow a district this opportunity where once it had been necessary to force a school board upon a district.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN would not have risen but for the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer against whose interpretation of the Act of 1870 he desired to protest; the intention of the Act of 1870 was to tolerate, but not to encourage voluntary schools, and the intention and belief of the framers of the Act was that gradually a national school-board system would supersede the voluntary system. But inasmuch as the State, for the first time dealing as a State with the education of the people, found a number of voluntary schools doing work which the State had heretofore not undertaken, it was not deemed wise or fair to uproot or unduly to interfere with those voluntary schools. The right hon. Member for Bradford incurred considerable unpopularity on account of the tenderness with which he treated voluntary schools, and the return which he got was, that when those whom he had befriended were in the majority, they endeavoured to assist the voluntary system to supersede the school-board system which he had established. The Chancellor of the Exchequer now openly avowed his wish to see the two systems maintained side by side, and not only that, but to encourage the voluntary system so as to supersede that system which had been deliberately established by Parliament. By the course they had adopted upon the clause the Government had placed themselves upon the horns of a dilemma. The hon. Mover of that clause (Mr. Pell) had spoken of it as a small matter, but it had also been represented from the other side of the House as one of great importance. Thus the clause was a most unfortunate one. Either it was a very important clause, and if so, it ought to have been introduced in the Bill and discussed on the second reading; or it was of little importance, and in that case, it was to be regretted that so much delay had been caused and so much ill-feeling excited for the sake of passing it.

MR. WHITWELL expressed his surprise at the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for South Leicestershire in the early part of the discussion. The hon. Member had said that the authority which established a school board ought to have the power of disestablishing it. [MR. PELL: With the approval of the ratepayers of the district.] On the introduction of the clause it was said that the power was to be from below; but now it was contended that the authority which established the board ought to have the power of disestablishing it. He had voted for the second reading of the Bill, but could no longer give it its support.

MR. RICHARD: I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, and the other occupants of the front Opposition bench, have at length begun to understand the true character of this measure. I am bound to say this for those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, that whatever merits or demerits they may possess, they are at least a singularly long-suffering generation, that they display the most wonderful patience and equanimity in hearing the grievances and complaints of their own friends. Some of us within, and a much larger number of their most faithful supporters out of the House, have been trying for a considerable time to awaken them to a sense of the insidious dangers lurking in this Bill. But they chose to turn a deaf ear to our remonstrances, and rather to listen to the suave and skilful eloquence of the noble Lord, whose courtesy and amiability they are never weary of eulogizing. And I must admit that the speech in which the noble Lord introduced this measure was so conciliatory in its tone, and so plausible in its representations that he succeeded in disguising from both sides of the House what we on this side regard as the most obnoxious features of his plan, so that when the Bill came into our hands and we compared it with the speech, we were obliged to say that while the voice had been the voice of Jacob, the hands were the hands of Esau. But after the Bill made its appearance we had no excuse for being misled. I cannot admit, with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford, that any mine has been sprung upon us. I hold that what is brought out rather more openly and audaciously in the new clauses, was potentially in the Bill in its original form. I ventured to say, in moving my Resolution on going into Committee, that the Bill was a Bill for promoting, not national, but sectarian education; that its tendency, and, indeed, its avowed object, was to discourage in every possible way the establishment of school boards and the liberal and unsectarian schools to which they give rise, and to throw the education of the country more and more into clerical hands, just at the very time when the Romanizing tendency of one class of the clergy, and the fanatical hatred of the Nonconformists on the part of another class, less than ever entitle them to have this solemn and important trust committed to their charge. I maintained that its effects, even before the new clauses were brought forward, was to make a large number of denominational schools independent of voluntary subscriptions, and thus present to us the extraordinary anomaly of a large number of institutions, scattered over the whole country, completely supported out of public resources, and virtually under the absolute management and control of private and irresponsible persons, with this enormous aggravation of the anomaly, that you take power to force all the children of the people into these institutions without any adequate securities for the rights of conscience. I stated that there were already many schools up and down the country which did not require, and did not receive, any help from voluntary sources. The noble Lord charged me with stating that there were thousands of schools in that condition, and when I corrected him refused to accept my correction. But the statement which he then ascribed to me, and which I did not make, will be true enough under this Bill, for there will be thousands of schools in that condition. And because I protested against this, you charged me with being actuated by narrow sectarian views. Your theory, then, as I understand it, is this—that to support a measure for taking, by main force, the children of all classes of religionists, and compel them to enter into the schools of one denomination, is a proof of a large, liberal, generous, and catholic disposition; while to oppose that, and claim for parents some right to decide the religious influences under which their children shall be educated, is evidence of a sectarian and intolerant spirit. I contend, on the other hand, that you are sectarian and intolerant, and that we are, as we have ever been, the advocates of religious liberty. I contend, in regard to this clause, that no answer has been given to the numerous able speeches of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford. Surely it will be admitted on all sides that there is no man in this House, no man in the country, so competent to appreciate the meaning and object of such a clause as the right hon. Gentleman. He is the founder of the system of school boards, and he sees clearly enough that the tendency—nay, I think I may fairly say the intention—of this clause is to undo incomparably the most important and valuable part of the system with which his name is honourably associated. I fancy my right hon. Friend is learning several things in the course of this discussion. During those long years which he so freely exchanged with

Gentlemen opposite in 1870, I believe he thought that he was winning them over to Liberal views on education. He flattered himself that by the large and ample concessions he was making to them, and which they professed to receive with so much cordiality and gratitude, he was converting them from the error of their way. But he is beginning to discover that the Ethiopian does not so easily change his skin, nor the leopard his spots, and that the only use they are making of his concessions is to take them as vantage ground from which to overturn the best part of his work. I trust that, at any rate, he will adhere firmly to his Amendment, and so do something to counteract these insidious clauses, which are aimed at the very existence of school boards.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed that the last thing he should have expected, looking to the understanding that prevailed in 1870, would have been that more time should be given for the action of voluntary schools.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he was not accustomed to trouble the House unless he had something to say. This, however, was a matter on which he felt strongly, and he meant to say what he thought. Upon reflection the conviction had forced itself upon his mind that a more injudicious speech than that in which the noble Lord used covert threats as to what he should reveal against school boards if pressed to do so, he never remembered to have been delivered since he had had a seat in that House. On the 7th of April he (Mr. Mundella) received a letter from one of the most valued Inspectors of the noble Lord's Department, a clergyman of the Church of England, which, as it referred especially to school boards, he would read to the Committee. [Cries of "Name."] He should not give the name. While the noble Lord presided over the Education Department he would not give the name of any servant of the Department who differed from the Government; but he (Mr. Mundella) pledged his honour to that House that his correspondent was one of the most efficient Inspectors that the Department ever had. He (Mr. Mundella) would read the letter in which the writer bore his testimony, from personal experience, to the good and blessed work for which the school board had been added—

"The dislike of education in itself, the denominational jealousies, the irritation against compulsion, all have united to make the task of the school boards difficult enough, and very little discouragement from the Government would be enough to make their work almost impossible, and certainly prevent the better class of men in our towns and villages from being willing to sit upon them."

[Cries of "Name."] He would hand the letter at once to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford—him, at least, he could trust in educational matters. He would refer to the conduct of the Government in having accepted the clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). He asked hon. Gentlemen opposite whether, in their consciences, they were satisfied with what they were now doing with the view of destroying national education? ["Yes, yes."] Even the noble Lord had turned his back upon himself, and had last night made a speech which was inconsistent with what he had uttered when he introduced the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON denied the assertion, and hoped the hon. Member would not continue to misrepresent him.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he was not misrepresenting the remarks of the noble Lord. He could produce reports out of almost all the principal newspapers in the Kingdom to show that the noble Lord had been inconsistent. ["Oh, oh!"] He adhered to what he said, and he challenged the noble Lord to disprove it. The noble Lord had told them that he had something in reserve which he hoped he should not be forced to use against the school boards. He challenged the noble Lord to do any such thing. It was not because he would not, perhaps, but he dared not. He knew that the majority of the people and the Press of the country condemned his action in this matter. He did not care whether he pleased the noble Lord or not; for he believed the time had come for men who cared for these things to be plain-spoken, and to tell the Government that it was they alone who were responsible for the discreditable movement which had taken place. The clause was an attack on the Act of 1870, and the way in which it had been taken up was a breach of confidence on the part of the Government.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 115;
Noes 172; Majority 57.

MR. E. NOEL moved, as an Amendment to Mr. Pell's new clause, after Clause 21, line 2, after "by," leave out to "1870," and insert "nine-tenths of the ratepayers of the district." The object of the Amendment was to show that unless there was a unanimous, or almost unanimous, feeling on the part of the ratepayers, the school boards should not be done away with—they could not be dissolved. That was a most important object, and he hoped the Committee would adopt the Amendment.

MR. PELL said, the effect of the Amendment would be that in places where a school board might have been established by the casting vote of a single ratepayer, the consent of nine-tenths would be necessary to get rid of them. He could not be expected to give his consent to such an Amendment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL was sick and tired with the prolonged storm which had been provoked on this occasion. He thought the matter should and must be settled by a compromise, and that it should take the direction of this Amendment. He would suggest that the consent of three-fourths instead of nine-tenths of the ratepayers should be required.

MR. W. E. FORSTER was inclined to think that the suggestion of the hon. Member for Dumfries was not a bad one, and might with advantage be adopted by the Government.

MR. E. NOEL said, he would willingly accept the proposition of "three-fourths" being inserted instead of "nine-tenths."

MR. MUNTZ approved of the proposal to require the consent of three-fourths.

MR. PLUNKETT expressed a hope that if the Government made a concession in the matter it would be on the understanding that further Amendments would not be pressed.

MR. MORLEY suggested that the majority to be required should not be less than two-thirds.

MR. CLARE READ supported the suggestion—the two-thirds to consist of the ratepayers voting.

MR. EVANS was of opinion that such a compromise should be come to as would provide, as necessary to justify dissolution of a school board, a satisfactory majority.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that although he had supported the clause he thought a bare majority of 1 to get rid of a school board would be unsatisfactory, and he therefore trusted that some compromise would be arrived at.

MR. W. E. FORSTER complained that the Government displayed no desire to meet the Opposition, and their spirit and tone were not calculated to bring about a settlement.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that it was too much to hear such remarks, when they remembered the tone and spirit displayed opposite. After the remarks which they had had to endure from the junior Member for Sheffield, one of the Members for Dundee, and the hon. Member for Pembroke Dockyards, it was making a draught on their credulity, to ask them to believe in the conciliatory spirit of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

VISCOUNT SANDON remarked that the way to invite compromise was not by making use of acrimonious and most hostile language. He was quite willing to put aside personal feeling in the matter; in fact, the subject of the Bill with which they were dealing was far too grave in its character to allow him to be influenced by personal considerations; but it was necessary for him to say something at this stage of the discussion, especially as, during it, his word had not been taken by an hon. Member opposite. He thought his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford had wrongly understood the position of the Government in this matter. He entirely overlooked the fact that the Government had made very considerable concessions to the arguments and feelings of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and had taken the important step of throwing the onus of considering the particular circumstances of these cases upon the Education Department, which was casting upon it an enormous responsibility. On the part of the Government he was quite willing to assent to the principle that more than a bare majority should be required to dissolve a school board. They might, no doubt, as a matter of argument take their stand very properly upon the exact analogy of the Act of 1870; but he thought that the application to dissolve the board should be a deliberate one, and he would, therefore, propose to insert words in the clause providing that there should be a majority of two-thirds of those present and voting, which he was free to confess he considered would be a real improvement to the clause.

MR. ROEBUCK: I rise for a personal purpose. Yesterday the noble Lord used my name, and immediately afterwards he spoke of Members who had used strong language and had been acrimonious. I hope I have not used strong language or been acrimonious. Also I trust that the noble Lord in the observations which he has just made does not intend to allude to me.

VISCOUNT SANDON: I need hardly say I never thought of alluding to the hon. and learned Member. The Committee is well aware to what hon. Member I alluded.

MR. WHALLEY, remarking that the noble Lord had taken much credit for his concessions, said he thought it desirable to point out that he was by no means satisfied with this concession. His objection to the clause was that the children of the country would be under clerical influence. [Laughter and "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN invited the hon. Member to confine his remarks to the Amendment before the House.

MR. WHALLEY thought he was as much in Order as was the noble Lord when he thought fit to accuse hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House of being influenced by acrimonious motives.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL accepted the Government Amendment, on the principle that half a loaf was better than no bread.

MR. E. J. REED thought that the Government had shown a very fair and satisfactory disposition in this matter. He certainly did not, in his remarks, make any observation as to any Member of the Government.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE trusted that the Committee would hear a similar statement from other hon. Members below the Gangway.

MR. MUNDELLA said, there could be no doubt the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge had made an appeal to him. He (Mr. Mundella) was told that a distinct reference had been made to him in his absence. There was no Member in that House more desirous that their debates should be conducted in courtesy and dignity than he was; but he had felt deeply, and did feel deeply, at the proceedings of the noble Lord. He referred, as he had repeatedly done, to the noble Lord's speeches; and he believed that he could convince the noble Lord that every word he (Mr. Mundella) had stated had been used. He had no desire to say anything personally offensive of any Member; he did not wish to say one acrimonious word in that House, but should always speak plainly on questions upon which he felt deeply. While he withdrew anything personally offensive to the noble Lord, he would withdraw nothing he rightly and honourably said. Hon. Members opposite who called for the name of the Inspector whose letter he had read must have been conscious that in giving it he would have been guilty of a breach of faith, and would have exposed himself to most disagreeable comment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that little good would be done by going back upon heated expressions; but, having restrained his noble Friend when he was about to interrupt the hon. Member, it was right to say that when a Member repudiated the construction or the language of quoted speeches it was usual to accept the disclaimer. The course taken by the hon. Member—no doubt in an excited moment—in declining to receive his noble Friend's explanation was neither usual nor convenient.

MR. MUNDELLA said, if the noble Lord disclaimed the words he used on a former occasion, when he referred to the effect of compulsion on the national character, and said they would not bear the interpretation put upon them, he gladly accepted the disclaimer.

MR. EVANS, in reference to an Amendment which he had submitted relating to such a majority of the ratepayers as he thought desirable to effect the removal of school boards, consented to withdraw it, the Government having accepted it in a modified form.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Viscount Sandon) agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, in line 7, after "School Board," to insert, as an Amendment to Mr. Pell's proposed new clause—

"Where no requisition has been sent by the Education Department to such School Board, under section ten of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' requiring them to supply public school accommodation."

His object was to put a school board which had a requisition sent to it in the same position as a board which had got a school or a site for a school.

VISCOUNT SANDON, on the part of the Government, accepted the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER then moved to add after the Amendment just agreed to, these words—

"And no action has been taken by such School Board under the provisions of this Act or of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870.'"

This Amendment would go a great deal further than its predecessor, and he could hardly expect that the Government would accede to it, but he would, nevertheless, propose it. The result of adopting the Amendment would be that cases such as that of Stockport would be brought within the scope of the Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he could not accept that Amendment, as it would be inconsistent with the course which the Government had pursued.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN supported the additional Amendment, remarking that it would exclude his own parish, of which mention had been made, from the operation of the clause. In that parish the school board had been not abolished, but suspended; the managers of the Church school were the same persons as the school board, and could act in the latter capacity if occasion should require. Here was a fair instance of how things might work. A school board was established because two considerable ratepayers would not contribute to the voluntary schools, and an undue burden was thus thrown upon others. But one of these ratepayers had since died, his successor had been willing to contribute and the school had been transferred back to the old managers. Now, the other large refusing ratepayer was a railway company; since the suspension of the school board the assessment of this company had been raised so largely that they would now pay something like half the rates of the parish. Under these circumstances the ratepayers might wish to revive the school board again. If so, they could do it without trouble or expense, whereas, if under this clause the school board had been actually abolished, its re-establishment would have been difficult and costly. His noble Friend (Viscount Sandon) had mentioned his parish (Smeeth) as an example in favour of the clause, and when he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had pointed out that it was just the reverse, had then turned round and said that he could not think of taking the little village of Smeeth as a model for the rest of England, but he hoped it might be left as it was by the adoption of the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 121; Noes 190: Majority 69.

VISCOUNT SANDON then proposed an Amendment to Mr. Pell's clause by inserting the words—

"It shall be their duty to take the circumstances of the case into consideration, and if they shall be of opinion that the maintenance of the school board is not necessary for the purposes of the education of the district it shall be lawful for."

It would throw the whole onus of being satisfied that the maintenance of the school board was not necessary for the purposes of the education of the district on the Education Department.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that as his right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson), who was absent, had a similar Amendment on the Paper, he should have been prepared to move and state his right hon. Friend's views upon it had not the noble Lord proposed this Amendment. He was obliged to the noble Lord for proposing it, who he had no doubt meant by it to meet the views of the Opposition side of the House, but the words proposed did not exactly do so. He demurred to the word "necessary," and would move to substitute for it the word "advantageous."

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that would go too far in the other direction, and he suggested the word "required."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would accept that alteration.

MR. FAWCETT asked to what extent this Amendment would operate?

VISCOUNT SANDON said, it must, he should have thought, be obvious to everyone that it was quite impossible for him to say. It must be left a great deal to the discretion of the Department, and if the Department was not to be trusted, there was no use in having the clause at all. The Department was bound under this proposed Amendment to the clause to see that education did not suffer by the change, and if it could not be trusted to do this, it was quite unfit for its other most important and responsible duties.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. FAWCETT moved, after the word "Board," in line 9, to insert the words—

"Provided, That no School Board shall be dissolved by whom bye-laws for the attendance of children have been put in force."

The hon. Member observed that school boards, such as those of Stockport and Macclesfield, were doing useful and necessary work, and belonged to that class which the Vice President of the Council desired to preserve, and doubtless he would not consent to their abolition. If, however, they were not protected by some provisions such as he suggested they would be in a position of insecurity which would interfere with them in the performance of their duties.

Amendment proposed, after the word "Board," in line 9, to insert the words

"Provided, That no School Board shall be dissolved by whom bye-laws for the attendance of children have been put in force." — (Mr. Fawcett.)

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the Proviso would do just what the hon. Member did not want to be done. Bye-laws did not of themselves secure the attendance of children at school. It all depended on the way in which the bye-laws were carried out, and sometimes in a year or two they became a dead letter. If this clause were adopted it would be impossible to get rid of school boards which were not doing their duty—namely, of boards, which, having passed bye-laws, neglected to carry them out—a by no means impossible or unlikely condition of things—and it would be impossible to transfer the powers with regard to school attendance which they had neglected, to the new school attendance authorities constituted under this Bill—namely, Town Councils and Boards of Guardians. It would be much better to leave the matter to the discretion of the Department. He hoped that the Amendment would not be carried.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

V. E. FORSTER reminded the hon. Member that the Amendment applied to school boards which had put the Amendment into force. He believed the Amendment would fully carry out the intention which the hon. Member for Hackney had in view.

MR. LYNCH supported the Amendment.

MR. AWCOTT said, his object was that in case a school board was dissolved, the body, whatever it was, should be substituted, should be compelled to pass bye-laws for compulsory enforcement or to enforce it if passed. At present school boards did both, while there was no security that either Boards of Guardians or Corporations would intervene in it. He proposed, therefore, that a school board should be abolished and the body substituted should be compelled to pass bye-laws which would carry out the objects intended by the present of school boards.

ROBERT MONTAGU said, the intention of the Amendment would be that no person on a school board which passed compulsory bye-laws could prevent the board being dissolved notwithstanding the wishes of all his colleagues in the entire district.

When the question was put, "That those words be inserted."

Committee divided:—Ayes 110; Noes 8: Majority 78.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved, as an Amendment to Mr. Pell's proposed Amendment, line 9, at end of first paragraph—

"That no application shall be made for the dissolution of a School Board within three months of the expiration of the period for which the School Board has been appointed, and no order for the dissolution of such School Board shall take effect until after the expiration of such period."

He said that school boards were usually elected for three years, and he contended that no application for the abolition of one should be made until three months before the expiration of the period for which its members were elected. This would prevent agitation being carried on year after year against any board.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should be glad if they came to some arrangement by which the agitation for the dissolution of school boards would be prevented.

The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) had a provision which he intended to move at a subsequent stage of much the same character as that of the hon. Member for Reading; and what he would suggest was, that the Amendment should be withdrawn for the present, in order that both might be considered together. The Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire was to prevent agitation for the removal of school boards within the three years for which they were elected.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked whether the Government accepted the principle of the Amendment?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, so far as it involves the objection to repeated contests.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH thought the Committee might very well decide the small point raised by his hon. Friend's Amendment without leaving it over for subsequent discussion, especially as the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted the necessity for some such provision.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped that the question would be decided upon its merits, and that in any vote that should be given the Committee would not be taken to express an opinion on the proposal of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, to which he had very great objection.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, the proposition of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was so simple, and recommended itself so much to every one, as well on that (the Conservative) as on the Opposition side of the House, that he could not believe, if the hon. Members fully understood the Amendment, that any one would object to its adoption. It was simply this—that when a board was appointed for a specific period, its death was not to take place until that period expired. If school boards were liable to be dissolved after three months of existence, surely no man who had any regard for his own character would take office under them. The Amendment next provided that no order for the dissolution of a school board should take effect until the time when the school board would naturally expire. This Amendment did not affect the clause intended to be proposed by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, and did not alter the principle of the clause agreed to by the Government. He would therefore ask the noble Lord whether he would not accept the Amendment without putting the House to the trouble of dividing.

It being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, House resumed.

MR. DISRAELI: I propose that we shall proceed with the Bill this evening. ["No, no!"] I understand there are no Orders of the Day which hon. Gentlemen are particularly anxious to bring forward.

MR. M'LAGAN said, there was a Bill of which he had charge, the Game Laws (Scotland) Bill, and he had waited day after day and night after night in the hope of getting it into Committee, but had hitherto failed to do so. He was one of the last men to throw any obstacle in the way of the progress of Business; but considering the importance of this question, and the great interest which the Scotch people took in it, he should feel bound to take every opportunity of bringing it forward.

CAPTAIN NOLAN observed, that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick was anxious to pass the Municipal Privileges (Ireland) Bill, which had already been read a second time.

MR. DISRAELI: Of course I am not resisting any Gentleman who has any particular interest in bringing any question forward. I will therefore put the Bill down for to-morrow.

MR. RYLANDS wished to know whether it would take precedence of the Orders in which private Members had an interest, as in that case it would be a violation of the promise made by the Government that the proposal to take the Wednesdays would not be pressed.

MR. DISRAELI replied that he had no intention of placing it before the other Orders.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at five minutes after Nine o'clock.

Mr. John Bright

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 26th July, 1876.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that before the Orders of the Day were read, he would venture to make an appeal to hon. Members in charge of Bills on the Paper that day to facilitate Public Business by allowing them to stand over for another day, so that some further progress might be made with the Education Bill. He only made that application as a request, because he had no right to press it on the House.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, he rose on a point of Order. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had made a rather unprecedented request without any previous Notice. The Prime Minister had a Notice on the Paper a day or two since asking for Tuesdays and Wednesdays for the Government, but the right hon. Gentleman forbore to make the Motion. Every hon. Member had a right to believe that the ordinary course would be adopted that day; and if the Elementary Education Bill was proceeded with, the House would be placed at a great disadvantage by this sudden change at the last moment, when many Gentlemen, including his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), were absent in the full conviction that the Education Bill was not coming on.

MR. SPEAKER said, there was nothing out of Order in the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. He had only put a Question to hon. Gentlemen in charge of Bills as to the course they intended to pursue.

MR. J. G. TALBOT, who had charge of the Burial Grounds Bill, which stood as the First Order of the Day, said, he was willing to assist the Government. He had some days ago suggested to the Prime Minister that he should ask for precedence on Wednesdays, and he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman had not taken that course. The request now made placed him in a difficult position, because he had assured the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan) and others that his Bill would come on that day, and it was hardly fair that he should deprive them of the opportunity of discussing it. At the same time, he was willing to do all he could to expedite Public Business, and if other hon. Members would adopt the course suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would waive his right to proceed with the Bill which stood in his name.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, who had charge of the Criminal Law Evidence Amendment Bill, which stood as the Second Order of the Day, said, he also was placed in a peculiar position; but after what had taken place he must decline to accede to the request which had been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Hon. Members had asked him whether his Bill would come on that day, and he had told them that he thought it would, and consequently those who were interested in other Bills were absent. Moreover, he objected to the Education Bill being taken in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, and others who took great interest in the subject of education. He might also state that he had been waiting the whole Session hoping to bring on his Bill, and that day he expected having the opportunity of doing so.

BURIAL GROUNDS BILL.—[BILL 67.]

(Mr. John Talbot, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.)

SECOND READING. WITHDRAWAL OF BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. J. G. TALBOT, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the question had been before the public for something like 20 years, and the failure to provide any solution hitherto was not creditable to Parliament. The sanitary difficulty was one to which public attention should be directed. He believed that the public would be shocked at the scandalous condition of many burial grounds in the country districts, as well as some of the cemeteries of our large towns, and he hoped that one result of the discussion, by calling attention to the subject, would be an inquiry into their condition by the Government. So far as the Bill now before the House was concerned no further provision for burials was required in the metropolis or large towns, except in the sanitary direction he had indicated. But as to burial in the country generally, he believed he was correct in saying that the State had made no provision for it, but that it was a matter left at present to the charity of the Church. Then as to the wish of Dissenters, that they should be buried according to their rites, the way to remove one conscientious objection was not by transferring it from one set of shoulders to another—from Nonconformists to Churchmen, but rather by legislating in the direction of this Bill, which would relieve Nonconformists from the grievance under which they now laboured, as it would allow them to have a burial ground of their own. Would it not be better to treat the question from the sanitary point of view? His Bill proceeded upon that basis. It provided both in urban and rural districts for the establishment of unconsecrated burial grounds, creating no new local authority for this purpose, but calling upon rural and urban sanitary authorities to put the provisions of the Bill into operation, because the burial of the dead was a sanitary matter, which the State ought to take into its consideration and provide for. It also enabled several small parishes to combine for the purposes of the Bill. The chief peculiarity of the measure was the power it would give to minorities to put it into operation. Twenty ratepayers might call a meeting in any parish; if no poll was demanded, the votes of one-fourth of the ratepayers present would put in force the provisions of the Bill; and upon a poll the same proportion of votes would have the same effect. He admitted that there was no precedent for such a proposal, but it must be remembered that the Bill was one for the protection of minorities. With a view to limit the expense to the rates, the Bill contained what he might call a statutable suggestion to every Burial Committee appointed by a rural sanitary authority that a site for the new burial ground might probably be given by one of the chief landowners; but if not, provision was made for the purchase of the site, spreading the repayment over a period not exceeding 50 years. The Bill provided for the appointment of a Burial Committee, and if they did not do their work it gave power to the Secretary for the Home Department to take measures that the work should be done. There was also a provision to enable chapels to be erected where they might be desired, but only, let it be observed, where they were desired, and power was given to enable persons now disqualified from doing so to grant sites for burial grounds in the same way as sites for schools might be granted. He hoped the debate would not close before the House heard from the Home Secretary that the Government were prepared to take up and settle the matter on sanitary grounds. If they were prepared to do so, the best way in which they could deal with it was by the appointment of a Commission, the result of whose inquiries might form the basis of legislation. If the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) were carried, it would only introduce into the churchyard alien ministrations without settling the sanitary question. For his own part, he was prepared to say that no churchyard should be extended without making provision in it for some portion of unconsecrated ground. He hoped he had shown, by the introduction of this measure, a bond fide desire to assist the solution of the question. In conclusion, he begged to move the second reading of the Bill, and he hoped, at all events, that if nothing else came of the measure this Session, the House would affirm its principle, which was neither controversial nor theological, but, on the contrary, social and sanitary.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. J. G. Talbot.)

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in moving that the Bill be read a second time upon that day two months, said, that notwithstanding the lateness of the Session he was glad that the hon. Member had had an opportunity of moving the second reading of the Bill, because he felt that the more such proposals as this were discussed, the more would it be seen that they were utterly inadequate to remedy the grievance they sought to remedy. If it had been brought forward as a sanitary measure, he should have had little to say about it, except that it was rather late to bring forward so important a measure on the 26th July. But the scandals to which the hon. Member had referred had not come home to his experience. Whatever necessity existed for increased burial accommodation in the crowded districts of Lancashire and Yorkshire, no such necessity existed in the district in which he lived. If they were to tell the Denbighshire peasant that the churchyard on the hillside in which the bones of his fathers were laid, and in which he expected to lay his bones, would shortly be closed for sanitary reasons, he would laugh in their faces. This was not a sanitary measure at all, for it did not contain a single provision for closing a churchyard, so that, unless its promoters were prepared to say that the interment of Dissenters was more injurious to public health than the burial of Churchmen—on account of the odour of sanctity in which the latter died, or something of that kind—the Bill left the question of sanitary reform where it was at present. The hon. Gentleman had said that the object of the Bill was to relieve Nonconformists from the grievance of being compelled to bury their dead without the forms and ceremonies which they approved. How did the Bill attempt to accomplish that object? In the first place, it enabled a mere handful of ratepayers to call a meeting together, and if they obtained a vote in their favour, they were to put into operation the cumbrous machinery of the Bill. Why, this Bill was ten times more vicious in principle than the Permissive Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, because while that Bill would enable a majority to oppress the minority, this one would give a power to a minority to oppress the majority. He could not conceive a more invidious task thrown upon the rural sanitary authority than that of requiring them to elect the Burials Committee every three years. In Wales, if not in England, almost every parish would be the hot-bed of discord whenever such an election took place. The question of expenses the hon. Member had treated as a mere bagatelle, and he proposed to allow the Burial Committee to purchase land as sites for burial grounds, though he hoped that persons sufficiently munificent would be found to make a free gift of the sites. The (Mr. Osborne Morgan) doubted whether under the present law there were more than a dozen such free gifts; and the ratepayers, therefore, would have to bear the expense, which would be extremely heavy. A short time ago an advertisement appeared in The Times from Bromley, a parish in Kent, a division of which county his hon. Friend so ably represented and according to that advertisement £12,500 would be required to provide a burial ground. There were 1,000 parishes in England in which there were no cemeteries, and in which the ratepayers would be entitled to invoke the assistance of this Bill. If a third only of those parishes availed themselves of its provisions, at a tenth of the money which the parish of Bromley required, the cost to the taxpayers would be over £3,000,000. The Bill would therefore be far too expensive, and such a proposal, emanating from a party that had always prided itself upon a stubborn resistance to increasing the burdens on local rates, seemed to him absolutely monstrous. The Dissenters did not want the Bill. They said—"We are entitled to be buried in the parish churchyards with such rites and ceremonies as we think proper; but you say—We will not grant you that right; we give you the right of obtaining cemeteries for yourselves, with the privileges of putting our hands in your pockets and paying for them." What was that, but to give them a stone when they were asking for bread. If he and those who acted with him differed with the promoter only as to the machinery of the Bill, that matter might be arranged in a Committee, and some agreement might be come to, but they differed as to the principle of the Bill. Neither could he think any good would come of referring the Bill to a Select Committee. That had been done before, and the whole question had to be fought over again. He objected to the Bill because it was a crude measure, because it was an utterly unpractical one, and because it would entirely fail to remedy the grievance which it professed to remedy. For those reasons he would conclude by moving its rejection.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day two months."—(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. BERESFORD HOPE acknowledged the conciliatory tone both of the introducer of the Bill and the mover of the Amendment, but deprecated discussion as likely to be unfruitful at that period of the Session. Some hon. Members were prepared, if necessary, to vote for the Bill as a declaration of principle in which they concurred, while others were desirous to study the details of the measure; and probably, in regard to a question so complicated as this, no two hon. Members could be found to come to an identical opinion upon all points. Under these circumstances he would suggest to his hon. Friend that, having held out the olive branch, he should now withdraw the Bill, and not put the House to the trouble of dividing on the second reading. At the same time, he hoped the Government would tell them something of their views about a question which it was now impossible for private Members to bring to a solution.

MR. BUTT said, before the Order was discharged, he would like to have an opportunity, as a member of the Disestablished Church in Ireland, to say a few words upon the Bill. The real question, as he understood it, really was—whether Dissenters should have separate burial grounds, or whether they should be permitted to perform their rites and ceremonies in the old churchyards. Let him briefly tell the House what had been done in Ireland. In 1824 a Bill was passed by the Imperial Parliament giving Dissenters the right of burial, with their own rights, in the Irish churchyards. Up to that period the law as to burial in Ireland and England was exactly the same. That law was introduced to the House by a great lawyer, Mr. Plunket. Mr. Plunket, in introducing the Bill, which afterwards passed, made a remarkable statement as to the law. He declared that the Protestant parson had a freehold in the churchyard, and no one could enter without his leave without committing a trespass. But besides his rights as a possessor of the soil, he was appointed to superintend Christian burial, and he could grant permission for interment. By the Act of Uniformity he was to read the Burial Service of the Church of England over every person, and therefore, if the Protestant clergy insisted upon their rights, the Act virtually deprived the general body of the people of their right of interment. As he (Mr. Plunket) put it—it was an interception of the rights of the people, imposed upon them by the Act of Uniformity. That was how the matter stood in England at the present day. According to the law of the land, every person living in the parish had a right to be buried in his churchyard with what rights he chose, subject to the rights of the Protestant clergyman before mentioned. There was no illegality in the performance of those rites. Supposing a clergyman had performed the rites of the Church of England, or waived their performance, there was no law to prohibit the performance of Dissenting rites in Protestant churchyards. Therefore, there was no illegality in the performance of those rites, and the only difficulty in the way was the Act of Uniformity. So far as to the law on the one side. Now, mark what it was on the other. According to the law at the present time, everyone had a right of interment in some Protestant churchyard. His relatives were entitled to claim it, subject to the rights of the parson. There was no difficulty but the Act of Uniformity in the way, and of that Act Churchmen had little reason to be proud; for it expelled the best men in the Church of England, and left a legacy of weakness and dishonour to the Establishment which she had never recovered. It was that Act only which stood between the full right of the Dissenters to use the churchyards for burial. And what did that word burial mean at the Common Law? It did not mean simply placing the body in the ground. It meant interring it with such solemnity, and such reverential rites, as each person in his own conscience desired to be employed. That was the right of burial which the Common Law gave to every parishioner, and the Act was intercepted only by the Act of Uniformity. He most cordially supported the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) to admit Dissenters to the same rights in England which they had long enjoyed in Ireland. They had found no inconvenience, no dissension to result from the system in Ireland. He (Mr. Butt) was brought up in his childhood in an old parsonage close to the churchyard, and he well remembered with affection that some near and dear to him lay buried there. He thought it would be a great misfortune if the affections of the people were turned away from the old churchyard, by their being sent to the cemetery instead of their bones being laid by those who were near and dear to them in the old churchyard. He did not think it was an act of statesmanship to take away from the old churchyards the affections and the memories of a large proportion of the people, nor did he think it was entirely consistent with Conservative principles thus to detach burial from the religion of the land. He opposed the Bill on the ground of Christian liberty; on the ground that it really was not fair to refuse the Dissenters the Common Law right which they at present possessed, and on the good old Conservative principle that they ought not to detach the affections of the people from the Church and the churchyard, and weaken the Church by relegating the people in that way to the cemeteries.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sorry his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had been obliged to leave the House on Public Business, as he would have spoken with more authority than he could command, but as he knew his right hon. Friend's views he would endeavour to state them. His right hon. Friend would have concurred in the suggestion of the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge, that no further progress should be made with the Bill. They could not expect at that time of the Session any practical result from a division on the principle of the Bill; and to vote on the second reading now, would be voting on something in the nature of an abstract Resolution. The measure involved many details which could not be accepted without considerable discussion. The discussion which they had already had could not fail to make it evident that it was the duty of the Government to give their best attention to this question; his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was giving his attention to it, and no doubt he would consider during the Recess whether it would be possible in another Session to make any suggestion or proposal on the subject; but he thought it would be inexpedient at the present time to attempt to develop any views of the Government on the subject, which must either be done fully, or the statement would really amount to nothing. He thought perhaps the best course would be to allow this Bill to be withdrawn, or, if there was any indisposition to withdraw the Amendment, to adjourn the debate, which it was obvious could not be discussed with any prospect of a practical result.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, that the Bill only touched a portion of a large and difficult question, but it was an honest endeavour on the part of Churchmen to meet the views of those who differed from them. He had no hope of ever being able to satisfy all parties who considered themselves aggrieved, as there were many who would accept no compromise upon the question. He was very glad to have an assurance from the Chancellor of the Exchequer—which had, indeed, been given in “another place” by another Cabinet Minister—that the Government would take this matter into consideration, and he hoped that next Session they would be able to introduce a Bill which, without giving up the rights of Churchmen, would remedy any grievance of which the Dissenters could justly complain. He therefore recommended his hon. Friend the Member for West Kent to withdraw the Bill.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he had no wish to divide on the Bill, nor did he wish to divide the feelings of hon. Members upon the matter. He hoped that as the Government had announced their intention of dealing with the question, that a pacific solution of it would be arrived at. The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire had another idea as to the way it should be dealt with, but probably they were both wrong, and as it was a question which must be solved in one way or another, he was pleased to find the Government were prepared to undertake it. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) that we ought not to sever the association of the living from the resting-places of the dead, but it was because Churchmen had such an intense affection for their churchyards, where, for 300 years, nothing but the words of consolation of the Burial Service had been heard, that they objected so strongly to their—he would not say desecration—they objected to the provisions of a Bill which allowed not merely Roman Catholic services, and what Secularists called their Liturgy to be performed, but harangues to be delivered, displacing the services of the Established Church, unless proper securities were taken against them. The associations connected with burial grounds were of a sacred character, and they would never allow them to be desecrated or misused. He understood the Amendment would be withdrawn. [Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN: No.] That being so, it would be better to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he should not have spoken had not the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) made a speech so defiant and strong in its language that it might have been delivered on the second reading of a Bill vehemently opposed, and ought never to have been delivered on a Bill about to be withdrawn. He, for his part, had advised that the withdrawal of the Bill should not be opposed; but after the speech to which they had just listened he should certainly vote against the Bill or against the adjournment if a division was called. The Bill itself was in his opinion a bad Bill, but it was needless to discuss its details when its passing was impossible. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had many tenants and neighbours who were Nonconformists, and he altogether deprecated and protested against the tone and language of the hon. Member for West Kent. That hon. Member and those who thought with him appeared to draw a broad line of demarcation between Churchmen and Nonconformists, as if the latter were scarcely of the same race as themselves. When the hon. Member used such a word as “desecration” in regard to the services of Dissenters in churchyards, he was doing his best to render any settlement of the question impossible. If the Church of England was to maintain its position in this country, it would not be by cultivating a spirit of narrow exclusiveness, but a spirit of enlarged toleration, and in these days it was much more desirable to draw near and heal the breach between the Church of England and the Nonconformists rather than widen it by such language as that of the hon. Member for West Kent.

MR. J. G. TALBOT explained he had not used the term “desecration” with reference to the burial of Dissenters, but to rites which might be introduced in churchyards under the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire

(Mr. Osborne Morgan), which would in the estimation of Churchmen amount to "desecration."

MR. HALL insisted that no safeguards against "desecration" of churchyards had been provided by the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire. He had himself admitted the fact.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that in moving the second reading of his Bill he had distinctly said that he had introduced no safeguards, because, in his individual opinion, none were necessary, but that if any safeguards were suggested from the other side they should receive from him the fullest consideration.

MR. HALL thought safeguards were necessary. The right hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had misunderstood the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot). He simply tried to show that Churchmen had those strong feelings for the resting places of the dead to which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) referred, and that under the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire those feelings might be seriously violated. When his hon. Friend spoke of "desecration," he referred not to the Nonconformist service, but to the Secularist Liturgy, the use of which they would probably desire, equally with clergymen, to see rendered absolutely impossible in their churchyards.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN stated that after the second speech of the hon. Member for West Kent he felt some difficulty in withdrawing his Amendment. He must divide the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Sir William Edmonstone.)

MR. RAMSAY said, he was surprised, and very much regretted that a discussion of that nature should be necessary in that House. In Scotland they had ample experience of the freedom of interments in the graveyards of that country, and he must say that although even a Secularist might pronounce any sort of oration over the grave of a deceased relative which he thought proper, it did not appear to the people of Scotland that such an oration was any desecration to their feelings. Scotland might well be cited as an example of a country where there was perfect freedom to inter in such way as the relatives of the deceased might think proper. In the graveyards of Scotland the Ritualistic Episcopalian might perform the ceremony according to the Burial Service of the Episcopalian Church, the Roman Catholic might do the same, according to the ritual of Rome, and a Presbyterian might be interred without any form of worship at the grave. It was becoming the practice to recite passages of Scripture and deliver short prayers; but on no occasion had the feelings of the people of Scotland been violated or offended in any way, and in his opinion the sooner they saw a similar liberality in existence in England the better it would be for the Established Church.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, all he desired was that a system under which we had lived for so many years should not be wantonly broken up. He desired to maintain the order which he believed was precious to the people, and to preserve the sacred character of churchyards. He, however, considered that a time had arrived when all Churchmen admitted that some change in the law was necessary, and they were prepared to approach this question in a spirit of charity and conciliation.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD said, that as the churches and churchyards were national property no one had a right to use them unless subject to those restrictions which the nation imposed. He therefore thought some compromise should be adopted on this question which would satisfy the views of Churchmen and moderate Dissenters. The Bill was not a religious Bill at all, and he regretted that religious feeling had been introduced in connection with it.

MR. GREGORY said, he did not think that the Opposition were acting in a spirit which was likely to produce a settlement of the question.

MR. J. G. TALBOT desired to say that he was sorry that if, under the strong feelings he entertained on the subject, he had used any expression which could give the least offence to hon. Members opposite. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had referred to the feelings of Nonconformists, and his (Mr. J. G. Talbot's) object was to show that if feelings existed on the subject of the House they equally existed on his side. He repeated that he was sincerely sorry if he had said anything which could be the least offensive to hon. Gentlemen opposite. It was quite unintentional; and he still hoped that the Bill would be allowed to be withdrawn.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that after the appeal of the hon. Member for West Kent he would not persist in dividing the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he must apologize for not being present during the discussion on the Bill. Nothing but pressing business of a public character would have kept him away. He was very glad to think that the discussion had ended in the way it had done. He sincerely hoped that in the course of next Session they would be enabled to come to some satisfactory arrangement on the subject. He was quite sure that the best course they could take was to avoid doing anything to raise an angry feeling on the one side or the other.

Amendment and Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

CRIMINAL LAW EVIDENCE AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 61.]

(Mr. Evelyn Ashley, Mr. George Clive.)

FURTHER PROCEEDING ON SECOND READING. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Further Proceeding on Second Reading resumed.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in moving, that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to enable prisoners, their wives and husbands, and co-prisoners, their wives and husbands, to give evidence when on their trial on a criminal process. Many of the Judges had recently expressed their dissatisfaction at the present condition of the law, and many of the more thinking of the Professional classes desired to see a ~~made~~ ^{made}. In the Eupion Gas Case, Lord Chief Justice of that the fact of the law shutting the mouths of all the persons charged rendered it very difficult for the Court to get at the truth. There was, again, the Wainwright Murder Case. Was there not even now considerable doubt in the public mind as to which of the two brothers was the more guilty of that crime? Was it not manifest that if the two men could have gone into the witness box and told their own story, we should have been better able to tell which was the more guilty of the two? It had been objected to the Bill that it would prove a torture to the prisoners, as it was in Germany; but he maintained that the abuses which were connected with the examination of accused persons in foreign Courts of Justice could not occur in our own, where all tradition was in favour of fairness to the prisoner, who would not be examined by the Court, but by his own counsel, if he had one, and cross-examined by the counsel for the prosecution; and under such circumstances he was less likely to be entrapped into admitting his own guilt than he was by the policeman who arrested him, whose evidence of such admission often secured conviction. It might raise a strong inference against him if he did not go into the witness-box, but it would be a just inference; and it might be enacted that no comment should be made on that fact by counsel. It was so contrary to the spirit of our judicial proceedings to tolerate anything approaching to torture that such a result need not be feared; and any apprehension of an increase of perjury, which had not followed the admission of the evidence of the parties to a suit, ought not to prevent an improvement in the law. Mere lying, as contradistinguished from legal perjury, was a thing with which we had nothing to do; and we tempted prisoners to tell lies at present. He did not lay much stress on an oath, though it was a good form to maintain; but in this case the object could be attained without an oath if the accused could be cross-examined. He believed that a system such as he proposed would go far to elicit the truth, because no one could give better evidence than those who were concerned in the transaction, and he was confident that time would overcome the natural prejudices of the Legal Profession against the change of a system which they had supported and which had supported them, and that public opinion was becoming ripe for that change.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Evelyn Ashley.)

MR. RODWELL, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day two months, said, he thought his hon. Friend had hardly realized the magnitude of the change to which he had called the attention of the House. The Bill, though a short and apparently a simple one, struck at the very root of the principles upon which their law was administered in Criminal Courts, and was contrary to the very instincts of the people in this country with regard to dealing with criminals. He disputed the recital in the Preamble of the Bill, that the examination of prisoners and their relatives would assist the conviction of offenders and the discovery of truth; and speaking from some experience of criminal matters, he maintained that such examination would work injustice in many instances and prevent the ascertainment of truth. It was one of the most re-actionary measures he had ever known to be introduced into the House, and would be quite unworkable. So far from being an improvement, it would be a return to the practice of the dark ages, when it was the business of those who presided at criminal inquiries to do all they could to entrap the accused into fatal admissions. The result of the proposed change would often be that the hardened, guilty offender would get the benefit of his evidence, while a timid, nervous person, though innocent, would involve himself in greater difficulty. A man often derived more benefit from the fact that the mouth of his wife was closed than he could possibly derive from the evidence of the wife. If we could not convict an offender from the evidence of independent persons, it was better he should escape than that we should run the risk of putting an innocent man in jeopardy. He could, if necessary, quote the opinions of many Judges against the proposed change, and the Lord Chief Justice, in the opinion which had been quoted by the hon. Member, referred to the hardship of including several persons in one indictment, so that one could not be examined in favour of another. He would conclude by moving the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day two months."—(Mr. Rodwell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he was, and had always been, a law reformer, but he could not support the Bill, because it was based entirely upon theoretical principles, and was not calculated to cure any practical evil which experience had brought to light. He did not hesitate to say that having had a large experience in criminal practice, he had never known an instance in which innocence had suffered, or justice been defeated, in consequence of the want of the power proposed to be given by this Bill. All the points were generally brought in evidence before the jury. He thought that a Bill of this kind, involving questions of the greatest magnitude, ought not to be brought in at this advanced stage of the Session, when there was not sufficient time to consider and discuss its provisions; and looking at the great changes which it proposed, he begged to say that he could not give his assent to it. Instead of reform, he regarded it as a retrograde Bill—a Bill of torture, going back to the dark ages, and not a progressive Bill. A fundamental principle of our criminal jurisprudence was, that a person accused of crime was held to be innocent until his guilt was proved. But this Bill would practically reverse that principle. The so-called permission to the accused to tender himself for examination, was no permission at all, but, in practice, would be compulsory, for the prisoner who did not tender himself, would be open to adverse comment on the part of the prosecution for not doing so. The state of things then would be this—that instead of the prosecution being obliged to prove their case beyond reasonable doubt, it would be the duty of the accused to prove his innocence. Another important principle was also at stake, and one that deeply concerned the due administration of justice, he meant the public confidence in the impartiality of our Judges. At present the Judge ~~was to hear and take down the evidence,~~ ~~refusing in no way~~ with the prisoner in the conduct of his case, or with the witnesses, unless to prevent improper evidence being given. Indeed, it was his duty to interfere for the protection of the prisoner even against himself, or, sometimes, the imprudence of his counsel. Under the Bill, if it became law, the timid prisoner—the innocent prisoner—and not the experienced rogue—would be placed at a disadvantage. He had often seen this in Court, and many a time had he said to himself—“How fortunate it is that I am not obliged to call upon the prisoner as a witness, and subject a respectable inexperienced man to the ordeal of a cross-examination.” At present there was confidence in our Courts of Justice, because the Judge sat there calm and impartial, and at the close of the evidence he summed it up, leaving out nothing which told in favour of the prisoner, and with that aid the jury were enabled to arrive at a proper decision. This gave confidence in the administration of justice; but if an accused person could be examined as a witness and cross-examined, he believed that they would have scenes of wrangling between Judges and prisoners which would become a public scandal. The prisoner would inevitably be tendered for examination in every case; a scene of wrangling between him and the Judge would often ensue; the dignity of the Bench would be lowered, and the public confidence in the impartiality of our Judges and in the administration of justice be shaken. He asserted that it would be a great improvement if the law were altered so as to permit a husband to be called as a witness for a wife and a wife for a husband; but in regard to the other principles of the measure, he was satisfied that the change proposed ought not to be adopted. He regretted that the Session was so late that he could not state all his objections to this Bill; but he would conclude by expressing his earnest hope that the Bill would not pass, and he only regretted that a Bill dealing with a matter of such importance could not have been brought forward at a time when the subject could have been fully discussed.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, he also regretted that the Bill had come on discussion so late in the Session, ^{there} was so little probability that ~~it~~ become law. He differed entirely, in his experience of the administration of justice from his hon. and learned Friend who had just spoken (Mr. Serjeant Simon); but he could not permit the question to pass away without expressing his opinion upon it. Having been brought up to the Profession almost from a child, he had been favourable to the institutions and practices that he found in existence; but his experience, the experience of many years, as Recorder of London and one of the principal Judges of the Central Criminal Court, had convinced him that it was most important for the interests of justice—for the conviction of the guilty and the acquittal of the innocent—that some such change as was now proposed should be made in the law of this country. Wives now could not be examined where their husbands were concerned, or husbands for their wives, and nothing more absurd could be conceived. Very often the only person who could prove a man's innocence was the wife, especially as to events which were alleged to have occurred at night. If the accused husband was a good, moral man and lived with his wife, her mouth was closed; but if he were an immoral man and lived with a mistress, she could be examined in his defence. All the objections which had been urged against that portion of the Bill which proposed to change the law in that respect had been urged against previous changes of the law which, nevertheless, had been found to work beneficially and materially to promote the interests of justice, as, for instance, in the case of allowing the parties interested in civil suits to give evidence. He had lately been reading the Memoir of Lord Althorp, in which it was stated that that nobleman brought forward a Small Debts Bill in which he proposed to give power to the parties to be examined. A Judge of those days said of the proposal that it was most barbarous and abhorrent, and that nothing would result from it but unmitigated perjury. But the change had been made, and what had been the result? No person who practised in our Courts wished to return to the old system. No doubt, perjury was occasionally committed, yet the alteration in the law had tended most materially to the elucidation of truth. Justice was more speedily and more certainly arrived at, and under the species of compulsion that now existed the defendant was often obliged to admit the debt which otherwise he might have successfully disputed. But we had gone rather further than altering the law in mere civil actions. When the Divorce Courts were established, there were universal complaints from women that their mouths were closed in matters of supreme importance to them. That was felt to be a great hardship, and by universal consent the parties to a suit were allowed to be examined. In no cases was there a stronger temptation to commit perjury, and perjury was no doubt sometimes committed, but the truth was more certainly arrived at. He now asked for the same relief for the innocent prisoner who stood at the bar charged with some criminal offence, and he could not, with his experience, say with the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury, that the change was unnecessary. He had often felt when he entertained doubts about a case that those doubts would be entirely removed if he could put six questions to the prisoner. In two cases of forgery, which had occurred before him, women had been called whose evidence could not have been received if they had been the wives of the prisoners. One woman told the truth, and most reluctantly established the case on the part of the prosecution. The prisoner was accordingly convicted; but if she had been married to the prisoner, he would wrongly have been acquitted, because her mouth would have been stopped. The other woman was not called by the prosecution, but her evidence in the prisoner's favour soon broke down on cross-examination, and her statement having been found to be untrue, the prisoner was in that case also convicted. If those women had been the wives of the prisoners, and one of them had been convicted, application would have been made to the Home Office for the release of the prisoner upon the affidavits of those women, and when they were referred to him, as they probably would have been, for his report, he might have found it very difficult to come to the conclusion which he had arrived at without hesitation when the women were examined in open Court. He was not proceeding in this matter upon theory; but upon facts which had forced themselves upon him in course of his judicial life. The only misgiving he had had in regard to the proposed change was as to how far the popular feeling would go with it. During the period, little short of two years, which he recently spent in the United States, he lost no opportunity of visiting the Criminal Courts to see the working of this system. He heard several trials in which the prisoners were examined, and in every case their evidence tended to the elucidation of the truth. He was specially struck by the manner in which this system worked for the deliverance of the innocent. He was present at one trial where the prisoner admitted that he had been previously convicted, and of the same sort of offence. He gave, however, as a witness, such a complete explanation of all the circumstances against him, and his evidence was so completely confirmed, that he was at once acquitted by the jury. He might go further than his own experience, because he lost no opportunity of asking the opinion of the Judges and the prosecuting officers, and one and all agreed that the change had been an improvement. The Chief Justice of Maine, Justice Appleton, stated that the new system had worked admirably, and had given great satisfaction to the Judge, the Bar, and the public. Innocent men were able to give important evidence in their own defence, and the Chief Justice said he regarded the change as absolutely indispensable to the due administration of the law. The district prosecuting attorneys described the change as having assisted greatly in bringing the guilty to punishment, while the innocent might rejoice in the opportunity thus afforded of proving their innocence. The prosecuting attorney for the district of New York stated that the Bench and the Bar were once all opposed to the change, but they were now unanimous in its favour. This officer told him that in seven cases in which he had conducted the prosecution he had, after hearing the explanation of the prisoner, thrown up the case. It was said that, although the Bill only provided that a prisoner "might" submit himself as a witness, yet the effect must be that he would be compelled to get into the box, or, if he did not, his guilt would be presumed. That was, he admitted, a somewhat strong point; but the objection might be, to some extent, obviated by providing that the Judge should be bound to tell the jury that they were to give their decision upon the evidence, and not to draw any inference from the fact that the prisoner had not chosen to be examined. This was the law in the United States; and it had the effect, at any rate, of preventing the prosecuting counsel from using this as a topic against the prisoner. Unless it could be alleged that our Judges were unfit for their high offices, he had no fear of any change in their manner or demeanour as a consequence of the change now proposed. He had felt it his duty to offer to the House such assistance in coming to a right decision as might be derived from a not inconsiderable experience in criminal trials, and he trusted that the House would affirm the principle of the Bill by reading it a second time.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS regretted to be obliged to differ from his right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder. Speaking from his experience as Common Serjeant, he contended that his right hon. and learned Friend had not made out any case for subverting the principles upon which the criminal law of this country was administered. He did not believe there was one case in a hundred about which the Judges had any doubt; and, that being so, where was the necessity for the Bill? Was it contended that innocent people were largely convicted? No one pretended to say that. It was the rarest thing possible for an innocent person to be convicted in the English Courts. Again, were the guilty not convicted? No one ever pretended to say that. It was said that there was a great number of persons, of whose guilt there was no moral doubt, who were acquitted by reason of the technicalities—the just technicalities—of the law, which required that a case should be proved beyond the region of doubt. He utterly denied that proposition; and, moreover, if it had been so, he was certain that the evil would not be corrected by the Bill. A great point had been made as to the desirability of getting at the truth; but the truth was only worth a certain purchase, and if it required the assistance of the present Bill to establish a case of petty larceny, then he said that the price paid for the truth was too great. The chances, too, were that the prisoners would add perjury to the crimes with which they stood charged, merely making the case of the prosecution against them stronger than before. Everybody knew that there was a great amount of perjury committed in the Divorce and Civil Courts—committed, too, under far less pressure than existed in the Criminal Courts. It was said by his right hon. and learned Friend that the system had been found to work in America; but no one would deny, he thought, that acts of perjury had been largely multiplied since the change in the law took place. It was immoral—immoral in the highest degree—that the House should legislate for the admission of witnesses who would get into the box under influences which would make it impossible for them to tell the truth. It was the principle of the law as it stood that it was not for a prisoner to prove his innocence, but for the prosecution to make out the case it had brought against him; and if this proposed change of the law came about that axiom could not be maintained. Differing as he did from his right hon. and learned Friend, with great diffidence he felt bound to declare that anything more injurious, more calculated to affect the credit of the administration of the law in this country than the proposed changes, he could not imagine.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he had listened most attentively to his right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder of London, whose great experience enabled him to speak with authority; but, after all he had heard, his (Sir Eardley Wilmot's) own experience had brought him to a contrary conclusion, and he was constrained to oppose the Bill, because he believed the proposed alteration in the law would work injustice. It would neither tend to the elucidation of truth, nor to the protection of innocence. He concurred with much of what had been said by the hon. and learned Common Serjeant (Sir Thomas Chambers). In the County Courts, of which he had much experience, there was no doubt some perjury; but he believed nothing like that which would take place in Criminal Courts, with, of course, greater injury to public morals and the administration of public justice. There might be some advantage in admitting a wife as witness for her husband, and a husband as witness for his wife, and he cordially approved of such a proposal; but to the general principle of the Bill he could not give his support.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, that having had some experience at the Home Office and also as chairman of quarter sessions, he was unwilling to let hon. and learned Gentlemen of the long robe have an entire monopoly of the debate. The permission proposed to be given by the Bill to a prisoner to be examined, if not taken advantage of, must tend materially to the disadvantage of that prisoner; for if he refused, having as he would have under the Bill, the option to be examined, no power on earth could prevent that fact operating against him in the minds of the Jury. This would be much more the case in such an instance as that quoted by the right hon. and learned Recorder, where a man admitted, in answer to his own counsel, a previous conviction for an offence similar to that with which he was charged and afterwards satisfactorily established his innocence of that charge. Suppose the prosecuting counsel had elicited the fact of the previous conviction, and the man's defence had not been so conclusively satisfactory, could any one doubt that the fact of the previous conviction would have weighed heavily against him in the mind of the jury? Chairmen of quarter sessions had recommended lists before them when they tried prisoners, and he owned that he himself in charging the jury found it sometimes one of the most difficult parts of his duty so to exclude from his mind the knowledge of previous convictions as to prevent its giving a bias to his analysis of the evidence. The law of England was that a prisoner should be tried by the evidence brought upon the particular charge against him, and he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) deprecated the introduction of anything which would prejudice the jury. Then, again, as regarded the instance brought by the right hon. and learned Recorder, of two men convicted by the evidence of their mistresses, who could not have given evidence if they had been wives. The first woman told the truth and convicted her paramour. Well, suppose she had been his wife, was there not something repugnant to English feeling in the idea of obtaining a conviction against a prisoner by the evidence of his wife? Moreover, what a terrible temptation you would hold out to the wife to commit perjury? But take the right hon. and learned Recorder's second prisoner. His mistress attempted to establish his innocence by lying, but broke down under cross-examination. But suppose the man had been really innocent, and the wife, nervous and full of anxiety, had been called to prove his innocence. Might it not have happened that her very interest in the case would have caused her to break down under the astute cross-examination of counsel, and her evidence might have helped to convict an innocent man just as that of the mistress helped to convict a man who was really guilty? Upon the whole, he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) regarded the Bill as one which would militate very greatly against the interest of the prisoners, and, in spite of his respect for the right hon. and learned Recorder, he could not support it. He apprehended that his hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) would be satisfied for the present Session with the ventilation which the subject had received; and, for himself, he must say that upon the whole he did not think a sufficient case had been made out for a change in the law of England in this important particular, and he felt bound to say that the Preamble of the Bill was not proven.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in opposing the Bill, said that, not having been present during the entire debate, he would endeavour to avoid urging at any length arguments which he understood had been already submitted to the House. He was not one of those who thought that private Members were to be blamed for bringing forward Bills of that nature. On the contrary, great advantage, he thought, often resulted from the discussion of such questions as his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) had brought before the House. The Bill was one of the greatest importance, because if adopted it would effect a radical and sweeping change in the administration of our Criminal Law, and that not only in England, but also in Ireland. Its provisions would apply to every prisoner charged with an indictable offence, or an offence punishable on summary conviction. In either case it would allow the prisoner to submit himself for cross-examination. The Bill said it should be optional for the accused person to do so; but it was clear that if a prisoner failed to avail himself of an opportunity of explaining his position, by giving evidence on oath, his doom would be sealed. He was ready to admit that there was a great amount of plausibility in the Bill—that there was a great deal in it that was seductive, and that the Bill had been supported by arguments of great force; but, nevertheless, he had come to the conclusion that the measure was one that it was not advisable should become law. First, he thought that if the Bill passed, it would tend to weaken the confidence which at present existed in the administration of justice in this country; and, secondly, that whilst they might by it try to bring home a particular crime to a particular person, it would be at the expense of creating even a greater crime than that with which the person stood charged. The widespread and well-founded confidence of the country in the administration of criminal law had its origin in the feeling that although occasionally a criminal might escape, it was almost impossible under our system for an innocent person to be convicted. No man was put upon his trial unless some facts and circumstances of a suspicious character could be proved against him, and if he declined to give an answer the counsel for the prosecution would press forcibly upon the jury the argument that he had no answer to give, and in nine cases out of ten such reasoning would be convincing. Although the Bill was plausible in its object of allowing a prisoner to give evidence, its effect would be to compel him to do so; and, if he did, what would happen? They would have an ignorant, careless, inexperienced man on one side, and pitted against him an astute, trained advocate conducting the prosecution. Would they like to see any such prisoner, however desirous he might be of telling the truth, subjected to an ordeal in which he might be cross-examined as to every event of his life—as to some things which he might not be desirous of disclosing at all, some which he would hesitate to speak to because they would reflect upon a third person, some as to which he might give an evasive answer, and all which circumstances could not fail to weigh against him with the jury? But it was said that the prisoner might be examined by the Judge. Well, he hoped they would not witness the day in which a Judge might be seen engaged in a contest with the prisoner he was trying. The moment a Judge descended from the calm, serene atmosphere with which he ought to be surrounded, to the region of turmoil and advocacy, that moment he would lose the fairness and impartiality which ought to distinguish all who held the high office of a Judge. It might be that he would do so unconsciously; but, even without desiring to do so, he could not help entering into a contest with the prisoner which would, at least, have the effect of shaking confidence in his perfect impartiality. But it was said that the system worked well in America and other countries; and he always remarked that when any of our institutions were arraigned they were invariably referred to those of other countries, which were said to be superior to our own. For his part, he very much doubted whether they were; and this he held—that, so far as the administration of justice was concerned, England stood supreme among all the nations of the world. Among other reasons he might mention which led him to oppose the Bill, he would allude to only one, and that was that in the whole calendar there was hardly an offence of greater heinousness than perjury, for by reason of it men might lose their estates, reputation, and liberty; and yet the Bill would offer a premium for that grave and detestable crime. For these and many other reasons, he was convinced, as he had said, that such a measure ought not to pass into law.

MR. WHALLEY thought that the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down were disposed of by the experience of the Civil Courts, in which no injurious consequences or practical inconvenience had been found to arise from the fact that interested parties were allowed to give evidence in their own cases. The present system left accused persons almost entirely at the mercy of the police, who frequently perjured themselves and conspired together in order to secure convictions. ["Oh, oh!"] There was great and growing dissatisfaction in many places against the conduct of the police, and he was afraid that in some cases policemen were continued in their office who ought to have been removed. He hoped that the existing law would be modified so far as persons charged with misdemeanours were concerned, if the Amendment did not go further. He could assure the hon. and learned Attorney General that he "inherited a pledge" from his Predecessors in office to give this matter full and practical consideration.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, referring to an observation of the hon. and learned Attorney General, said, that if the Bill had been proceeded with, many of the arguments against it would have been answered as he would have proposed the insertion of the provisions which he intimated the first time he spoke upon the measure—that neither the Judge nor the prosecuting counsel should make any remarks upon the absence of a prisoner from the box, and that there should be no cross-examination of a prisoner as to previous character or previous convictions. He was perfectly satisfied with the tone of the debate, and he regarded the speech in favour of the Bill by the right hon. and learned Recorder as calculated greatly to assist the progress of opinion on the question. With the permission of the House, he would withdraw the Motion for the second reading of the Bill.

(Mr. J. G. Hubbard, Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Twells.)

SECOND READING. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that he did not intend to press the measure upon the House, but that he desired simply to make a statement with a view to some legislation at a future time. [The hon. Member here explained the provisions of the Bill, and entered into some details as to the mode in which he wished the existing law to be amended, particularly as to the mode of assessment.] In conclusion, he said, he would formally move the second reading of the Bill, with the view of hearing something from the Government on the subject, though he felt that there was no option but to allow the Order to be discharged. He was strongly opposed to the discrepancies, the anomalies, and the injustice of the present system, but he thought it would be better to wait for the introduction of a Government measure next Session, which he hoped would supply a general remedy.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. J. G. Hubbard.)

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH regretted that, owing to the present state of Public Business, he should have to move that the Order for the Government Valuation Bill should be discharged, as under that, the general measure, they might have successfully dealt with the particular case of the metropolis. He had been in communication with all parts of the country, and every local authority on the subject, and he believed there was a general approbation of the principle contained in the Bill, which was, if possible, to establish a system of uniformity throughout the country in the cases of valuation of property. He would not enter then into a discussion upon the question whether the charge should be on the rateable or the gross value. He was not prepared to say what might happen during the Recess, but the more he had considered the question, the more satisfied he felt that the plan he had proposed would be the least disturbing. It would be impossible for the Government to agree to the second reading of the Bill, which would apply to the metropolis a measure founded on a principle different from that applicable to the rest of the country.

MR. MUNTZ thought the Bill required great consideration, and hoped the House would have an ample opportunity of discussion. Should it be withdrawn, they might then have a more satisfactory general proposal put before them next year.

MR. M'LAREN entertained the same opinion, that the Bill required serious consideration; and he could say that in the City of Edinburgh, which he represented, the inequality of the valuation of property, as compared with the provisions of this Bill, would be unequal and unjust. He opposed the Bill on the ground that it was a species of class legislation, giving a remedy to the metropolis at the expense of all the large towns in the United Kingdom. Whatever was done in the way of putting the present system of valuation upon a uniform basis should be made to apply to the whole country.

CHADWICK said, that there be a common measure of value should be applicable to the whole y, and to all the taxation paid by untry—a thing which it was clearly le to arrive at.

GRAHAM MONTGOMERY that when any change was made gland, it would be in favour of a rateable value both for Imperial cal purposes. He desired to see d also the principle of valuation nties and by parishes, as it was i vogue in Scotland.

ERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR anxious that the question of valua- ould be properly adjusted, so that larities and inequalities might be d of. The mode of valuing pro- both for local and Imperial taxa- differed in the three divisions of ingdom. The Irish values were, y instances, based on prices exist- any years since; and in England, unty and local valuations were on data varying with the counties owns. In Scotland, on the con- the basis of valuation was uni- throughout, and had been so 1854. On the whole the Scotch a was the best; but the super- of the measure being vested in ord Clerk Register, he feared that actice many irregularities took which led to great inequalities. ; very necessary that some Depart- of the Government should attend e valuing of property throughout ingdom. Unfortunately there ex- great diversity of administration; luation of Ireland being under the Secretary of Ireland, that of Eng- and Wales being divided amongst reasury, Home Office, and Local nment Board, whilst that of Scot- was left to that overburdened officer ord Advocate; the result being he valuation of property in the divisions varied so greatly as to be y unreliable from the absence of niformity in the data on which it ased.

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE- R suggested that the Bill should be rawn, on the ground that incon- ce would be occasioned by a divi- being taken upon it. Of course, was no chance of its passing, and e useless to press it forward, for as ght hon. Friend had said no Bill could be sanctioned upon the subject, which dealt with the metropolis solely.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, he would assent to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, and withdraw the Bill.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [8th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Debate resumed.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he hoped that the measure would be read a second time, although it would require considerable modification in Committee. It contained an important principle—that was, to divide murder into two degrees, one of which only, murder in the first degree—that was murder deliberately committed—should be punished with death. That was really the proper definition of murder, for, in his opinion, no act should be punished as murder, except the unlawful killing of another with the deliberate intent to kill.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

GASLIGHT AND COKE COMPANY BILL.
SOUTH METROPOLITAN GASLIGHT AND COKE BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee, read.

LORD REDESDALE said, that these Bills were of such an important character that they deserved to be considered in Committee of the Whole House. The powers which the promoters sought were very extensive. They proposed to raise two millions of money, to purchase land, to fix the price of gas, and to do a great many other things which affected the interests of the whole metropolis. He thought it desirable, therefore, availing himself of the power that was vested in him under the Standing Orders, to move that they be referred to a Select Committee of the Whole House.

Moved, "That the House be put into a Committee on the said (the Gaslight and Coke Company Bill). Bill."—The Lord Redesdale.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, these Bills were promoted by two private Companies—there was nothing whatever on the face of the Bill or that which followed on the Notice Paper to show that they were promoted by public bodies, or that they could in any way be considered as public Bills. They were supported, however, by the President of the Council, representing the Board of Trade; and he could not help thinking that it was somewhat irregular on the part of the head of a public Department to promote a Bill without letting Parliament know that it was in reality a Bill of a public character. The Gaslight Companies, he might add, had in their hands the lighting of nearly the whole of the metropolis; and this was not all, for another Bill had been introduced into the House of Commons within the last two or three weeks, in defiance of the Standing Orders, the object of which was to amalgamate three out of four Companies, and which was now being hotly contested before a Committee of that House. Now, if that Bill came up to their Lordships' House all the Standing Orders would have to be suspended, and a measure would thus be passed without adequate consideration, which related to Companies whose capital amounted to two millions and a half.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY was understood to say that he believed the Board of Trade repudiated all connection with the Bill now before the other House to which the noble Earl referred.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he had reason to suppose that the Bill was supported by that Department; but be that as it might, the result of all that had occurred in regard to those measures was that he now felt himself obliged to enter into an argument on questions of the purest detail, which in reality ought to be referred to a Select Committee. In fact, he looked upon the whole course of proceeding in the case of those Bills as most unsatisfactory.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN rose to move the insertion of a clause of which he had given Notice. His object in doing so was this—these Bills allowed, under certain conditions, that the dividends should be paid up to any amount. Now, at present, the Gas Companies had what was known as a Parliamentary dividend, which was a practical guarantee of 10 or 7 per cent or less, according to the rate at which their capital had been raised. Under no circumstances could they at present go beyond 10 per cent; but by these Bills it was proposed to introduce a new principle—that of a fixed initial price, with a sliding scale. It had been the almost invariable custom in the case of the transfer of the supply of gas from private Companies to the local authority, to make the transfer at so many years' purchase of the statutory dividend. Gas was being manufactured more cheaply every day, and the consequence would be that under the powers given by these Bills the dividends would be proportionately increased. It was not likely that a Company which was guaranteed 10 per cent would accept an unguaranteed dividend that was not to be more than 10 per cent—they might, if they exercised the power proposed to be given by these Bills, demand 12 or even 15 per cent. The result would probably be that it would be found impossible to buy the Company up, and it would become perpetuated. His proposal did not interfere with the rights of the existing shareholders; he gave them 10 per cent, but he asked that they should not be given any more. In conclusion, he might remark that the clause he was about to propose had received the approval of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), to whose opinion he was sure their Lordships would attach due weight. The noble Earl then moved, after Clause 24, to insert the following clause:—

“For the purpose of estimating the value of the capital of the company in the event of the purchase of the undertaking or any part thereof by any public or local authority, whether by agreement or otherwise, the several descriptions of stock or shares in such capital authorised before this Act shall, notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, be considered as entitled only to such dividends respectively as were authorized in respect thereof before the passing of this Act; and the stock or share capital raised under this Act shall for such purpose as aforesaid be estimated as entitled to a dividend of 10 per cent.”—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY deprecated the course adopted by the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown), of recommending his clause to their Lordships on the personal authority of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), who was not in his place, and who, if he expressed an opinion in favour of the noble Earl's project, no doubt did so without prejudice to any more mature judgment which he might subsequently form. He was very much inclined to think, however, that the noble Earl was mistaken in believing that the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) had expressed approval of the clause. He doubted exceedingly whether the noble Duke would have done so without consulting his Colleagues in the Government. But, however, that might be, he had to demur altogether to the proposal of the noble Earl opposite. He wished to protest, in the first place, against the view insinuated or stated by the noble Earl, that the Government were in this matter taking part with the Gas Companies against the consumers. The Gas Companies were quite strong enough to take care of themselves; and if the Government opposed the clause it was because they thought it would bear hardly on the consumer; and that if drawn up by the noble Earl in the public interest, it was marked by more zeal than knowledge. The Bill was earnestly supported by the Corporation of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works, both of whom were elected Bodies, and who had always maintained a careful watch over the action of the Gas Companies; and in view of such a recommendation in its favour, he was sure their Lordships would, at all events, give it very careful consideration before they consented to destroy its leading principles—which was what the clause proposed to do. A Committee which considered the gas question very fully last year, under the presidency of Mr. Forster, recommended to Parliament what was known as a sliding scale. For many years before the Companies had enjoyed a guaranteed dividend of 10 per cent; the effect of which was that they had no inducement to improve their process of manufacture, to exercise economy, or to benefit the consumers in any way; and Mr. Forster's Committee, with the view of remedying that state of things, proposed that, starting from the price which the Companies were then allowed to charge—namely, 3s. 9d.—and from the dividend of 10 per cent which they were allowed to earn, there should be a sliding scale up and down; that for every 5s. of dividend which the Companies were allowed to earn in excess of 10 per cent they should grant to the consumer the reduction of 1d. That was the proposal of of this Bill. That arrangement, however, the advantage of which to the consumer was obvious, the noble Earl opposite asked them to disturb. The Bill, in addition to those provisions, contained a set of clauses to which he would now draw their Lordships' attention—and it was right their Lordships should bear in mind how adverse the Bill was to the Companies. Owing to the advantageous position which they occupied, the Companies, it appeared, were able to command £200 for every £100 of nominal capital, and that extra £100 was divided among the shareholders. The Bill put a stop to that, and provided that capital should be offered by auction, and that the premium obtained should be carried to the capital account of the Company. Upon this the noble Earl opposite came forward with his proposition. He proposed to leave the sliding scale for the present to work unimpeded—to allow the Companies to raise their dividend to 12 per cent and lower the price of gas to 3s. 1d.; but he would allow that 12 per cent to be earned by the shareholders in security for a single year only, reserving to Parliament absolute power to step in whenever the dividend was above 10 per cent, and sweep away from the shareholders their advantages, paying them merely the price calculated on the old dividend of 10 per cent. Now, if the noble Earl's clause were carried, what would be the position of the shareholders? Although they would no longer have their guaranteed 10 per cent, they accepted the Bill as it stood, trusting by good management to raise their dividend to 12 per cent. But now the House was asked to step in and say to the Companies—"You shall earn this 12 per cent for one year, but we shall have power to buy you out the next." Of course such a prospect as that would be very damaging to the Companies; for, whatever advantage they might have for a single year, their shares would certainly not have an increased value in the market. He asked them not to think of the interest of the Companies, but to think of the consumer, and to say which of the two would be the more advantageous alternative—that the Bill should pass without that clause, or that no Bill should pass? The capital concerned was about £6,000,000 sterling. Let them assume that the price of gas went down, and that the dividend rose. That was the hypothesis on which the noble Earl went and on which they must argue. If the price of gas fell to 3s. 1d. the dividend would rise to 12 per cent. If there was a wish to buy up the Companies, on that £6,000,000 of capital, there would be a loss, taking 20 years' purchase, of £2,400,000—the amount of the additional 2 per cent was £2,400,000. That was the sum which the noble Earl asked them to save to the public purse, and it was only to be saved in the event of there being a Municipality of London to buy up the Companies. What would their Lordships give for the chance of there being such a Municipality for the next 20 years? As for the Corporation of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works, they would not dream of embarking in any such unprofitable and dangerous speculation. On the other hand, while the dividend rose the price of gas fell, and, consequently, the consumers would gain 8d. per 1,000 cubic feet of gas. The consumption during 1875 was 9,000,000,000 of cubic feet, and it increased at the rate of about 7 per cent every year. The accounts would have to be adjusted upon the results of the year 1877; and then the amount of gas on which they would have to calculate would be 10,000,000,000 of cubic feet. At 8d. per 1,000 that would give them £330,000. In less than eight years that would accumulate to the £2,400,000 which was the terror of the noble Earl. But if they took into the calculation the annual increase of 7 per cent in the consumption, they would find that in six years' time the gain to the consumer by the fall of the price would come up to that £2,400,000 which, if the Municipality purchased, would be lost to the ratepayers through the rise of dividend. If, then, they caused that Bill to drop, the loss to the consumer in six years would more than equal the loss that was feared in the case of compulsory purchase, and as time went on it would infinitely exceed it. He believed that that idea of a municipal purchase was a mere chimera. If within six years a Municipality of London sprang into being which was willing and able to purchase these Gas Companies, there would be some slight loss in consequence of the arrangements under this Bill, and the absence of the clause of the noble Earl; but if a Municipality of London did not appear after six years, the absence of this Bill would cause a loss every succeeding year to the consumer which would have no end. He hoped their Lordships would not allow it to be said that for idle dreams they had taken from the consumer the real and practical benefit of cheap gas.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL pointed out the fallacy of assuming, as the noble Marquess had done, that there would be no reduction in the price of gas, if they did not pass that particular Bill. The noble Marquess had answered his own argument when he told them that the consumption of gas was increasing so rapidly that the price must necessarily fall. Their object, he contended, should be to secure the benefit of that fall for the consumer, and not to give a considerable portion of it by that proposal in perpetuity to the producers. This Bill was, in fact, promoted by a Department of Her Majesty's Government—he had heretofore thought that there was a clear separation between Public and Private Bills—and the main object of this Private Bill was to repeal a most material provision of a Public Act, introduced by the Board of Trade, for the protection of the consumer. Under the Act there were clauses which provided for the revision of the price of gas as the increase of its consumption enabled it to be reduced; but it was now proposed by this Bill to substitute for those clauses a sliding scale by which they would divide between the consumer and the producer the advantage of the continually accruing reduction of price. The Companies had their 10 per cent secured to them; that was all they were entitled by law to obtain, and yet those who wished to protect the just interests of the consumer were now compared to Bashi-Bazouks. Under the Acts of both 1847 and 1860 the London Gas Companies had had advantages conferred upon them which were not accorded to provincial gas companies, for they obtained a minimum as well as a maximum of 10 per cent, and if the present measure were passed they would be placed in a still better position, for they would obtain a share of the profit which ought to go to the benefit of the consumer. He objected to this partiality being shown towards them in a Bill which was promoted by a Government Department, and which was brought under the consideration of that House on the 27th of July, when their Lordships were told that if they made the slightest alteration in the Bill it could not pass into law during the present Session. He did not believe that the introduction of this clause would destroy the Bill; but he would rather it did, than see the Bill passed without the clause under such circumstances.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that, as the Bill embodied a compromise which had received the sanction of 8,000 shareholders, of the Corporation of the City of London, and of the Metropolitan Board of Works, as the representatives of the public interest, it would be impossible to materially alter the Bill without again submitting it to the consideration of the shareholders, and that was tantamount to throwing it over for the present Session. The Bill had been passed through a Select Committee of the House of Commons and had met with its approval. He denied that the measure was promoted by Her Majesty's Government, as was said, further than that the Board of Trade had sanctioned it as being for the public interest. This being a private agreement between two parties it could only be dealt with by a Private Bill. He regretted that it should have come up to their Lordships so late, but it had had to pass through a Select Committee of the other House. He admitted the right of their Lordships to deal with every line of every Bill that was brought before them, but he entreated the House to consider whether in the position at which the question involved in the Bill had arrived, it would be wise by adopting the clause of the noble Earl to leave the gas consumers of London in such a position as that they might be called upon to pay 5s. per 1,000 feet for gas instead of a maximum of 3s. 9d. as provided by the Bill.

LORD CARLINGFORD felt compelled to assume that if the clause of his noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) was adopted there would be an end of the Bill for the present Session, and therefore the question, as it appeared to him, was, whether the fact that, under the Bill the shareholders in the Companies might now possibly obtain somewhat higher dividends and at some future time sell their properties for a larger sum than would be paid in other circumstances, that disadvantage to the consumer was not counterbalanced by the settlement that would be brought about by the provisions of the Bill. He thought, on the whole, that the advantages that would flow from the Bill were greater than the disadvantages that might be feared from it.

EARL NELSON said, he was a Member of the Committee which had been alluded to, and the Bodies which had been appointed the legal protectors of the gas consumers made no objection to the proposals which had been embodied in the Bill under consideration. The public had received advantage from the amalgamation of Companies that had been made, and he therefore doubted the wisdom of interfering with the grounds on which the Companies were induced to amalgamate.

THE JUDICATURE ACTS—CAVE v.
MACKENZIE.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

LORD SELBORNE rose to call attention to certain proceedings which were reported to have occurred at the recent Chelmsford Assizes, in a case of Cave v. Mackenzie, and to proceedings in the Chancery Division, in the High Court of Justice, and in the Court of Appeal in the same case. The noble and learned Lord said that as this subject had been much discussed in the public journals, he deemed it necessary to advert to it, and to put to his noble and learned Friend the Questions of which he had given Notice. It appeared that on the 18th of June last the Master of the Rolls directed certain issues of fact, arising out of the case of Cave v. Mackenzie, to be tried at the present Chelmsford Assizes. From the Law Reports in The Times he learnt that at those Assizes there were nine causes entered for trial before Baron Huddleston, one of them being the case of Cave v. Mackenzie. It appeared from The Times report that on the 17th of July—

“When the case was called on, his Lordship left the Court to consult the Lord Chief Justice of England as to whether, since the passing of the Judicature Act, the Master of the Rolls ought not to have tried the case himself. His Lordship returned into Court, and announced that, having consulted the Lord Chief Justice, he should decline to try the cause, and the parties must go back to the Master of the Rolls.”

If the matter had gone no further he should have assumed that there was some error in this Report. But, from the same channel of public information, it appeared that on the 19th of July the matter was brought before the Master of the Rolls on the same representation as to what had occurred at Chelmsford. The Master of the Rolls, after referring to Order 36, Rule 29, and the Judicature Act, 1873, sect. 29, declined to alter the order he had previously made, and in the execution of which considerable expense was said to have been already incurred; and he suggested that there should be an appeal from the order or decision of the Judge of Assize. In accordance with this suggestion an application was stated to have been made to the Lords Justices of Appeal, who thought they had no power as Judges of Appeal to deal with the matter, and who suggested that if any remedy existed at all it was to petition Parliament or to bring the matter before the Lord Chancellor or the Attorney General. Such being the state of things, he thought that it probably would not be unacceptable to the learned Judges, and that it would enable suitors to understand their rights in this respect, if he called their Lordships' attention to the matter. He would not go into the subject at any length as far as the law was concerned, but for his part he had understood that the general principal of the Judicature Acts was that all the Courts which had previously been divided should be brought together into one High Court of Justice, and that although for convenience in the distribution and transaction of business the Court was subdivided into certain Divisions, in which the old names were retained, yet all those Divisions had the like powers and the same jurisdiction. In particular, the 29th clause of the Act of 1873 provided that Her Majesty might assign to any Judge or Judges of the High Court of Justice the duty of trying at the Assize towns any questions or issues of law, or partly of fact and partly of law, in any cause or matter pending in the High Court of Justice. This applied to the Chancery Division as much as it did to any other Division of the Court. All the other Divisions of the Court were in the daily practice of sending for trial at the Assizes or at the sittings in London or Middlesex all actions which were to be tried by juries, and he was at a loss to understand why the Chancery Division should not have the same power of sending issues to be tried in the same manner. It seemed that under the Judicature Act every Court and every Judge had ample power to direct a trial to be held at any particular place, and when any order had been so made for the trial of a cause at the Assizes, the Judge of Assize could not constitute himself a Judge of Appeal to decide upon the order which had been made, but was under a legal obligation to try the case in accordance with the order which had been made. He found in the Orders made for the execution of the Act of 1873 the following provisions:—

“Section 1. That where no place of trial is named in the statement of claim, the place of trial shall, unless a Judge otherwise orders, be the country of Middlesex. Any order of a Judge as to such place of trial may be discharged or varied by a Divisional Court of the High Court."

"Section 12. Notice of trial elsewhere than in London or Middlesex shall be deemed to be for the first day of the then next Assizes at the place for which notice of trial is given."

There was also the 29th section of the same Orders, which said—

"In any cause, the Court or any Judge of the Division to which the cause is assigned may at any time, or from time to time, order the trial or determination of any questions or issue of fact, or partly of fact and partly of law, by any Commissioner or Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the 29th section of the Act, or at the sittings to be held in Middlesex or London, and such question or issue shall be tried and determined accordingly."

He would only add that since he gave Notice of his intention to advert to this subject in their Lordships' House, some explanations had been publicly given by the learned Judges on the South-Eastern Circuit, by which it appeared that there was another reason alleged besides those stated in the report for the course which had been taken—namely, that the case would have occupied so much time that it would have been impossible to deal with it without postponing the other business of the Assizes, which would probably be under any circumstances a sufficient reason for making it a remanet. If that had been done, he should not, of course, have deemed it necessary to trouble their Lordships in the matter, and he would now conclude by asking his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, Whether it was true that Baron Huddleston refused to try certain issues directed by the Master of the Rolls to be tried at the Chelmsford Assizes, on the grounds that the Master of the Rolls ought to try them himself; and, if so, whether such refusal was in accordance with law; and whether the Court of Appeal had declared itself to be unable to grant any redress in this case; and, if so, how the administration of the law according to the Judicature Act of 1873, Section 29, and Order 36 of the Schedule to the Judicature Act, 1875 (Sections 1, 12, and 29), was to be enforced in favour of the suitors in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was not surprised, nor did he at all regret, that his noble and learned Friend had brought the subject under their Lordships' notice, for it was one which had undoubtedly created a certain amount of uneasiness in the public mind, and especially among the suitors in the High Court of Justice. In replying to his noble and learned Friend, the best course which he could, he thought, pursue was to read to the House communications which he had received from both the Lord Chief Justice and from Baron Huddleston. The Lord Chief Justice had written to him as follows:—

"South-Eastern Circuit, July 22.

"Dear Lord Chancellor,—The postponement by Baron Huddleston, at the recent Chelmsford Assizes, of the trial of an issue sent down for trial by the Master of the Rolls having given rise to observations in the public papers, as so often happens on an imperfect apprehension of the facts, and Notice having been given of a Question to be put in the House of Lords on the subject by Lord Selborne, I think it desirable that you should be put in possession of the exact facts of the case.

"Being desirous of remaining as long as possible to assist in doing the work of our Courts in town, and not anticipating more than the average run of business on the circuit, Baron Huddleston and I, the Judges of Assize on this circuit, had allowed only the usual time at the different circuit towns. On arriving at Chelmsford we found the business on the Civil Side apparently much heavier than we had expected, and Baron Huddleston, who sat on the Civil Side, was informed that this issue, sent down by the Master of the Rolls for trial, would occupy fully three days; in other words, the whole time at the Assizes; so that if tried, as it stood early in the list, it would lead to all the other causes being made remanets. Baron Huddleston consulted me, and, as it did not appear that there had been any special ground for sending this issue to be tried at Chelmsford, but, on the contrary, it might just as well have been tried by a jury before the Master of the Rolls himself—indeed, we were informed that the Master of the Rolls had at first refused to order a trial by jury, but, on being applied to a second time, had consented to grant a jury, but, declining to try it himself, had said he should send it to Chelmsford—I, under the circumstances, advised my learned Colleague not to let the trial of this issue displace and supersede the proper local business of the Assize, but to treat it as the last cause in the list, which was done accordingly. It so happened that, having finished the criminal business, I was fortunately able to come to the assistance of my brother Judge, and one or two of the causes, which threatened to be heavy, having been unexpectedly settled, we were enabled to finish the business of the Assize in time, without leaving any remanets. If the issue had been tried this would have been impossible. If any responsibility attaches to the course thus pursued I desire to share it, as my learned Colleague, though fully concurring in my view, acted under my advice. I am still, on the fullest consideration, of opinion that the course taken was, under the circumstances, the right one. I think it right to add that I further suggested to Baron Huddleston that we should take the first opportunity of your Lordship, as President of the High Court, calling its members together to bring the whole subject of issues sent from the Equity Division to the Common Law Divisions, or Circuits, to be tried by juries, under the consideration of the High Court, it being my very decided opinion that the course which the Equity Judges are understood to be pursuing, of sending all issues of fact calling for trial by a jury to be tried at Nisi Prius by a Judge of a Common Law Division, is altogether in excess of the power conferred by Order 19 of the Rules of Court, as well as contrary to the entire spirit of recent legislation in the matter of judicature."

He need not trouble their Lordships with the rest of the letter, in which the argument on that point was expanded. The letter of Baron Huddleston was as follows:—

"The civil business at Chelmsford was unusually and unexpectedly heavy, and there were only two days and part of a third (the Commission day at Hertford) in which to do the whole of the work, both civil and criminal. While trying the first common jury, some application was made to me with reference to the special juries, and I was informed by the counsel engaged in 'Cave v. Mackenzie,' which stood third in the list, that it had been sent to Chelmsford by the Master of the Rolls, who, though applied to, had refused to try it himself with a jury; that it was a matter arising entirely in the Chancery Division of the High Court, and in no way connected with the county of Essex, and, if tried, would occupy at least three days.

"I consulted with the Lord Chief Justice, and we came to the conclusion that I ought not to give it precedence over the other causes or try it at these Assizes, to the prejudice of the business legitimately belonging to the Essex cause-list. In announcing this to the Bar, I stated that the Lord Chief Justice and myself both thought that, considering the spirit of the Judicature Acts and the intention of the Legislature to fuse Law and Equity, as we in the Common Law Division of the High Court had to deal and did deal with all questions of Equity that came before us, the Equity Judges, having every facility afforded them to do so, might well try, with the assistance of a jury, any question of fact which arose before them, and not send it to the Assizes or the Courts of Common Law, already overwhelmed with the pressure of their own business.

"I did not make the cause a remanet, as I might have done (it being impossible to try it within the compass of the time allotted to the Assizes), because I did not think it right by so doing to throw on any brother Judge who might go the Spring Circuit the duty of trying it. But the Lord Chief Justice and myself agreed that the opinion of the Judges of the High Court should be obtained on the subject at their first meeting.

"If, in their judgment, the case ought to be tried by a Common Law Judge, I think it is the parties desire it and the Master of the Rolls will vary his order to that effect, to try it myself in London or Middlesex with a special jury, and thus spare the parties the delay till March, and save them the extra expense of taking it down again to Chelmsford."

Now, those two letters stated very clearly what occurred at the Assizes, and were an answer to the first part of the Question. His noble and learned Friend then asked, whether the refusal to try the case was in accordance with the law? Now, that was a point on which he (the Lord Chancellor) desired to speak with all reserve; but, so far as was proper, he would remind their Lordships very briefly of what had been enacted by the Legislature on the subject. His noble and learned Friend had referred to the 29th section of the Judicature Act of 1873; but he had not read the following paragraph:—

"Her Majesty, by Commission of Assize, or by any other Commission, either general or special, may assign to any Judge or Judges of the High Court of Justice or other persons usually named in Commissions of Assize the duty of trying and determining within any place or district specially fixed for that purpose by such Commission any causes or matters, or any questions or issues of fact or of law, or partly of fact and partly of law, in any cause or matter depending in the said High Court, or the exercise of any civil or criminal jurisdiction capable of being exercised by the said High Court."

There was, no doubt, no exception then drawn between one Division of the High Court and another; but lower down occurred the following passage:—

"Subject to any restrictions or conditions imposed by Rules of Court, and to the power of transfer, any party to any cause or matter involving the trial of a question or issue of fact, or partly of fact and partly of law, may, with the leave of the Judge or Judges to whom or to whose Division the cause or matter is assigned, require the question or issue to be tried and determined by a Commissioner or Commissioners as aforesaid, or at sittings to be held in Middlesex or London as hereinafter in this Act mentioned, and such question or issue shall be tried and determined accordingly."

A further section—the 37th—provided that—

"Subject to any arrangements which may be from time to time made by mutual agreement between the Judges of the said High Court, the sittings for trials by jury in London and Middlesex, and the sittings of the Judges of the said High Court under commissions of Assize, Oyer and Terminer, and gaol delivery shall be held by or before Judges of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer Division of the said High Court, provided that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, if she shall think fit, to include in any such Commission any ordinary Judge of the Court of Appeal or any Judge of the Chancery Division to be appointed after the commencement of this Act or any Serjeant-at-Law."

Then the 29th Rule of Court, which was part of the Act, was to this effect—

"In any cause the Court of a Judge of the Division to which the cause is assigned, may"—and then came these remarkable words—"at any time, or from time to time, order the trial and determination of any question or issue of fact or partly of fact and partly of law, by any Commissioner or Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the 29th section of the said Act, or at the sittings to be held in Middlesex or London, and such question or issue shall be tried and determined accordingly."

Now, these were the provisions which bore on the point. They seemed to take a large and comprehensive view. The power given was like every other power subject to discretion, and it was better that he should say nothing on that point. But whatever might be the principle on which that discretion ought to be exercised, their Lordships would agree with him that once a case was sent down by a Judge who had the power to send it down to be tried at the Assizes, there ought not to be at the Assizes any investigation of the principle on which the case was sent down. The suitors, in order to go to trial, would be put to considerable expense—they had their witnesses ready and their counsel; and then, if the question was to be raised as to whether it was a discreet and proper thing to send the case down, the persons who would suffer by the raising of that question would be the suitors.

LORD COLERIDGE was exceedingly glad that his noble and learned Friend had called attention to the matter, for it was one which concerned very much the interests of the public. In his opinion there should be a general understanding among the Judges as to the principles upon which the new law should be carried into effect. He absolutely agreed with the last observation of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, that it was exceedingly inconvenient that when a case had been sent down for trial at Assizes any question should be raised as to the propriety of it having been sent down; but he also thought that it was exceedingly desirable that there should be a distinct understanding upon the matter. But he, and those with whom he was associated, the Judges of the Common Law Divisions, felt strongly with regard to the point raised in this case—they thought that, while they were willing to take their fair share of the business that arose, those of the other Division of the High Court must also take a fair share of the business. The Judges of the Equity Courts had now, as they always had, the power of sending a case for trial before a jury at any convenient place; but, as he understood, that was hardly the question here. There was no peculiar propriety in sending the case of Cave v. Mackenzie to be tried in Essex more than in Northumberland, or anywhere else; it did not belong to the county of Essex, nor had the jurors of that county any reason to expect that they would be troubled with it. As he understood, it was sent down to be tried at Assizes against the protest of both parties to the suit, the Master of the Rolls saying that he would not try the case before himself in the Rolls Court, for "he did not intend to try jury cases." He understood further that the jury box which had been erected in the Rolls Court had very recently been taken down, and therefore there were now no means of trying cases there before a jury. This was to his mind an attack upon the principles of the Judicature Act, and it was going back to principles which had been deliberately modified long before the Judicature Acts passed. There was an Act passed by Sir John Rolt and another by the noble Lord now upon the Woolsack in two Parliaments which enabled Equity Judges to try cases before juries; and it certainly was desirable that the Judge who had the case before him should dispose of the whole of it. It was not a little surprising, but he could not but feel that at any rate some of the Judges of the Chancery Division had gone away from the spirit of the Act. It was a surprise to the Judges of the other Divisions—they felt that the Judges of the Chancery Division should do the whole of their work as the Judges of the other Divisions did theirs. There had been great misunderstanding upon the question of circuits, and of the rightness of circuit work; upon the small amount of work to do, and the number of Judges to do it. This was made a constant subject of observation. He had been surprised to find it stated that so far from the Judicature Act having worked well the Judges under it had sat for fewer days than before, that they tried fewer cases than formerly, and that there was now a block of work. He had taken some trouble to ascertain the real state of the case, and as he had derived his information from the highest authority their Lordships might rely upon it. In 1874-5 the total number of judicial sittings at Nisi Prius was 540; and for 1875-6, counting down to the 8th of August next, there would be 670. This referred to the sittings in London and Middlesex. An "enormous block of work" had been talked of—it was said that there was a great waste of judicial power at the Assizes, and that Judges were sent down who ought to stay in London and dispatch business there. The amount of Nisi Prius arrears in London and Middlesex for the five years beginning with 1871 and ending with 1875, in November for the different years were, 132, 230, 283, 243, and 539. So far as he could judge they would begin in November next with an arrear of about 600 Nisi Prius cases. Beginning last November with an arrear of 539 soon after Christmas the whole of that arrear had been got rid of, and there was almost difficulty in keeping the Courts going. Every action entered after the Judicature Act was passed had been tried within three months of entry, and every action remaining at the beginning of the Long Vacation would have been standing for trial considerably less than three months. The three cases which he had himself tried that day were entered respectively on the 9th, 18th, and 27th May. Therefore the notion that had arisen was perfectly unwarranted. From Returns he found that in the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Common Pleas the state of business was more satisfactory now than it had been at any time during the last five years. As to the business in Banco the arrears were only 150. He hoped that the observations he had made would help to clear up any misconception which existed on the subject.

TURKEY—THE NAVAL FORCE IN TURKISH WATERS.—QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, For information as to the number and names of war vessels, and the complement of men in the same, that are now stationed in waters under the Government of Turkey; if any, and what number of persons recently in the service of Her Majesty Queen Victoria have been transferred to the service of the late or present Sultan of the Turks; and, if any war stores of any kind soever have been lent, bestowed, or sold by the servants of Her Majesty Queen Victoria to the late or present Sultan of the Turkish Empire?

MR. DISRAELI: I conclude that the hon. Gentleman does not mean to ask for information as to the number and names of the war vessels of all nations in Turkish waters, because the Question as expressed applies to the naval force of all nations. It would not be in my power to give him that information, even if it were exactly proper that I should do so. But if his inquiry is limited to Her Majesty's Fleet at present in Turkish waters, it consists of 20 vessels—11 iron-clads and nine unarmoured ships of war. With regard to the second Question—whether any and what persons recently in the service of Her Majesty have been transferred to the service of the late or present Sultan—my answer is, none have. And with regard to the third Question, my answer is that no stores have been sold by Her Majesty's servants to the late or present Sultan.

ARMY—COURT MARTIAL ON CAPTAIN ROBERTS.—QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE (for Sir ALEXANDER GORDON) asked the Judge Advocate General, Whether it is true, as reported in the "Broad Arrow" of the 15th instant, that the officer officiating as his deputy at the trial of Captain Roberts, 94th Regiment, pointed out to the Members of the Court Martial, when summing up the evidence, that the acquittal of the prisoner would involve the character and standing of his commanding officer; and, if so, whether the conduct of the officiating officer is approved of by him?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: The issue of the late court martial upon Captain Roberts was limited to a question of fact, whether a certain statement made in writing by the prisoner and alleging acts of gross misconduct towards him by the colonel of his regiment, was true or false. The Deputy Judge Advocate, in summing up the case to the Court, after stating the charges upon which the prisoner was arraigned, spoke as follows:—

"The case before you is thus of the gravest importance, for upon the issue, not only do the honour and the interests of the prisoner depend, but indirectly are involved both the character and the reputation of his commanding officer."

In answer to the latter portion of the Question I have to say that, in my opinion, no exception can be taken to these observations, and that the Deputy Judge Advocate fulfilled his duty satisfactorily in every respect.

TURKEY—ALLEGED ATROCITIES IN BULGARIA.—QUESTION.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether in the Mission despatched from the British Embassy at Constantinople to inquire into the outrages in Bulgaria, there has been sent any responsible person acquainted with the Bulgarian language?

MR. BOURKE: The gentlemen appointed to inquire into and report on the alleged atrocities committed in Bulgaria are M. Dupuis, the British Vice Consul at Adrianople, and Mr. Baring, one of the second secretaries in the Constantinople Embassy. M. Dupuis was Vice Consul for 12 years at Sulina, on the Danube, and four years at Adrianople. He is, therefore, well acquainted with the country and people. It is not known whether he speaks Bulgarian accurately; but he is believed to be sufficiently conversant with the language of the country to be able to furnish a good and faithful report. Mr. Baring has been nearly three years at Constantinople, and was previously for some time at Athens. Sir Henry Elliot, in reporting that he had appointed him to accompany M. Dupuis, stated that there was no one better qualified for the duty. It was considered that it would be more effectual for the purpose of the inquiry that some one should go from Constantinople who could report personally to the Embassy and explain if necessary to the Porte what he had seen and learnt.

FUGITIVE SLAVES—THE NEW CIRCULAR.—QUESTION.

MR. W. HOLMS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he is now prepared to state what course the Government intends to take with respect to the Report of the Royal Commission on Fugitive Slaves; and, whether it has decided upon withdrawing the Fugitive Slave Circular now in force, more than a month having elapsed since he informed the House that he would be prepared with a statement as to the course to be pursued by Government so soon as honourable Members had sufficient time to consider the Report?

MR. HUNT: It is intended to issue fresh Instructions, and I hope before the Prorogation of Parliament to lay a copy on the Table of the House.

ARMY—MILITARY PRISONERS—GUNNER CHARLTON.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Right honourable the Paymaster General, Whether any decision has been arrived at as to the promised pension or gratuity to Gunner Charlton, permanently crippled from frost-bite during, or in consequence of, imprisonment in Millbank; and, whether there is any hope of a speedy settlement of a matter which has now been under discussion for above a year, and has been five times mentioned in Parliament?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: The Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital would be unable, under existing Warrants, to award a permanent pension to Gunner Charlton on his discharge; but a new Warrant has been framed in order, among other things, to meet his and similar cases. This Warrant has had the approval of the Treasury and of the Commissioners, but some unforeseen delay has occurred in the final settlement of the terms. There is, however, no consequent hardship in Charlton's case, as he has not yet been discharged from the Service.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—SHIPS SURGEONS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the Return, No. 316, of this year (Ship Surgeons), being a continuation of Return, No. 240, of Session 1875, by which it appears that since the issue of the Circular in September last by the Board of Trade, addressed to Superintendents of Mercantile Marine and Emigration Offices, no less than thirty-six non-registered persons are still permitted to proceed to sea in medical charge of passengers and crews contrary to Law; whether he has noticed the articles on the subject in the professional papers; and, whether he will take steps to compel compliance with the Law?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The cases of ships with non-registered surgeons referred to in the Return as having occurred since the Board's Circular are 36 in number. In 25 of these the total number of persons on board, passengers and crew together, did not exceed 100, and therefore the provisions of Section 230 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and of the Passenger Acts, do not apply to them. Ten cases occurred at Liverpool, at which port, as I stated in reply to the hon. Member's Question in May last, there was a misconception of the meaning of the Act, since rectified. The remaining case occurred lately in London, and the Board of Trade are at present in communication with the owners about it.

Sir Edward Watkin

NAVY—THE ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he is aware that the Regulations of the Royal Naval Reserve, which provide that Lieutenants and Sub-Lieutenants shall undergo in each year a course of twenty-eight days' drill, are systematically evaded by one hundred and seventy-eight officers of that force, forty of whom, as appears by Return of this year, No. 315, have failed to perform any drill at all; and, whether he has any objection to state by whom these appointments are made, and who is responsible for the continuance of unqualified officers in the Royal Naval Reserve?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that he had seen the Return giving the statistics of the officers of the Royal Naval Reserve who had attended drill, and he had no doubt his hon. Friend's statement was correct that 40 had failed to perform any drill at all. These officers received no retainers and no payment unless they attended drill. The question would be further considered between the Board of Trade and the Admiralty. The officers were appointed by the Admiralty on the recommendation of the Board of Trade.

PRISONS (IRELAND) BILL. QUESTION.

MR. MURPHY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If the Government intend to proceed with the Prisons (Ireland) Bill this Session; and, whether they will be disposed to institute inquiries with the view of ascertaining the propriety or otherwise of assimilating the salaries of the officers of convict prisons in Ireland with those of a similar class of officers performing analogous duties in England?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The progress of the Irish Prisons Bill is at present stopped by a Notice of opposition on the part of the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan), which, so far as I have been able to learn, is likely to receive the support of very few Irish Members on either side of the House. I hope that the hon. Member for Dundalk may be disposed so far to withdraw his opposition as to allow the Irish Bill to reach the same stage as the English

Bill, so that if the latter should become law this year, the Irish Bill may share the same fortune; for I think it would be almost universally regretted by hon. Members from Ireland that their part of the United Kingdom should be a year later than England in obtaining the benefits from improved prison management and the relief from local taxation that may be anticipated from these measures. With regard to the second part of the hon. Member's Question, in 1873, a Departmental Committee inquired into the salaries of Irish convict prison officers, and recommended an improved scale, which is now in force. I think it would be premature to re-open this question unless the proposals of the Government for a general reform of the Irish prison system should be sanctioned by Parliament, in which case it might be very desirable that a fresh inquiry should be instituted into the pay of all prison officials in Ireland.

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—THE 1st. SURREY MILITIA REGIMENT.
QUESTION.

MR. FRESHFIELD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the recent removal of the 1st Regiment of Royal Surrey Militia from Richmond to Kingston did not deprive that regiment of the advantages of a good and convenient drill ground and rifle range, and thereby interfere prejudicially (during the late training) with the usual annual course of drill and musketry instruction; whether the officers were not compelled, from want of space, to hire ground for their mess accommodation; whether the sergeants were not deprived of their permanent quarters for themselves and families; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to supply the deficiency of barrack and other accommodation existing at Kingston?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that a camping and drill ground was hired for the use of the 1st Surrey Militia adjoining the Brigade Depot barrack at Kingston, and the use of a Volunteer rifle range was also hired for the regiment. The camp ground should have sufficed for the officers' mess, and it was understood that it did so when the ground was hired. The sergeants would retain their quarters while temporarily absent from their families in camp, and cottages have been hired for the staff sergeants at Kingston. There was no intention of providing more accommodation for the regiment at Kingston; but any renewed proposal by the general officer commanding the district for hiring camp ground another year would be entertained if offered on reasonable terms.

INSPECTORS OF IRISH FISHERIES—THE ANNUAL REPORTS.
QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, The reason of the delay of the report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries for 1875, which, under the Act 5 and 6 Vic., c. 106, s. 112, should have been made before January 31, 1876; whether it is true that the report for 1874 was not made till June, 1875; and, whether it will not be possible to arrange for the making of the report within the prescribed time?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: When the Act 5 & 6 Vic. c. 106, s. 112, directed the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries to be made within a month of the termination of the year to which it related, there were no Boards of Conservators in Ireland, and scarcely any statistics to be collected. A large amount of statistical information, extending, of course, up to the 31st of December in each year, is now annually forwarded by the Board of Conservators to the Inspectors of Fisheries, and published in the Appendix to their Report. These Returns are often delayed, and this year some of them have only been very recently supplied, so that it would be now obviously impossible to make this Report by the date fixed in the Act referred to. The Report for 1874 was not made till June, 1875, and that for 1875 will, I am told, be completed in a few days. I am bound to say that I think, both this year and last, the delay in this matter has been greater than ought to have occurred; and I will endeavour to secure that the Report for next year shall be presented at an earlier date, though, for the reasons I have given, I do not think it would be possible for the Inspectors to comply with the precise requirements of the law.

CRAB AND LOBSTER FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will be prepared, during the present Session, to inform the House of the names of the gentlemen to be appointed to inquire into the state of crab and lobster fisheries on the coasts of the United Kingdom; whether the same staff of Commissioners will be appointed to inquire on all the coasts of the United Kingdom; and, whether their inquiries will be held in open Court?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it had not yet been decided whether the inquiry would be completed in its present form, or whether a fresh inquiry would be instituted before the end of the Session. He believed that all such inquiries were held in open Court.

THE FIJI PAPERS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Why the Papers respecting affairs in Fiji, which were laid upon the Table of the House in August of last year and February of this year, have not yet been furnished to Members?

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the reason why the Papers referred to by the right hon. Gentleman had not been furnished to Members until the previous day, was the pressure upon the printing staff caused by the fact that this year there had been very heavy Papers to prepare, including those relating to the Straits Settlements and Barbadoes. Steps would be taken to prevent the recurrence of such delays.

MR. W. E. FORSTER wished to know whether, as the Notice with respect to the Fiji Papers was given on Monday, and they were circulated on Wednesday, the delay did not arise after the printing was done?

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the printing department was so occupied with other matters of importance, especially the preparation of the Barbadoes Papers, that those relating to Fiji had for the time to be put aside.

JUDICATURE ACTS—THE JUDGES ON CIRCUIT.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will state the number of Judges who have been detached from London business on Circuit, and the number of days which these Judges have been actually employed in trying prisoners and hearing causes; and, whether in his opinion under better arrangements a smaller number of Judges would not have been sufficient to transact the business at most of the Circuit towns, so as to have left an additional force for the despatch of the arrears in London?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: With regard to the first part of the Question, I believe the number of Judges sent on Circuit were the usual number—14—but two were engaged on the Surrey Sessions. As to the second part of the Question—the number of those Judges actually engaged in trying prisoners and hearing causes—there is great difficulty in the middle of the Circuits in obtaining exact information upon that point; but if he wishes a complete Return for all the days of each Circuit, and will move for it, there will be no objection to its production. Cases are allowed to be set down up to the last moment, and the Judges, I believe, take the greatest care to have business despatched as quickly as possible. The hon. and learned Gentleman, I know, considers that one Judge might go Circuit instead of two; but if only half the judicial staff went Circuit it would take longer to get through the business.

UNITED STATES — EXTRADITION TREATY—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will now fix a day for the discussion of the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States on the subject of Extradition?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I had intended to have given an early day to the hon. and learned Gentleman for the discussion of this subject; but it is impossible for me to make any arrangement until the Committee on the Education Bill is closed. That Committee must proceed de die in diem. I trust it may be closed to-night; but if not, I shall fix it as the First Order for Monday, and make some other arrangement for the debate on Turkish affairs.

ARMY MOBILIZATION — THE MONAGHAN MILITIA.—QUESTION.

MR. OWEN LEWIS asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is true that the Monaghan Militia, which disembarked at Portsmouth on the 13th inst., at 4 a.m., at once proceeded to Codford Downs, a distance of sixty miles, where they arrived at 6 a.m., and were immediately ordered to march to a review eight miles off, from which they did not return until 5 p.m., making a total journey of sixteen miles on foot; if any breakfast was provided for the men before starting from Codford Downs; if they got any food or drink of any kind whatever during the day until they returned to their quarters at 5 o'clock in the evening; if they were kept standing in an almost tropical sun for two hours and a-half before being inspected; if any cases of sunstroke were reported as occurring either in the Monaghan Regiment or in the Brigade; if so, how many, and if any such ended fatally, and what proportion such bore to the total effective strength; if it is customary in the Line to march soldiers such a distance during the hottest part of the day, and that without either food or drink; and, if he will have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the Brigadier's Despatch?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: In reply to the hon. Member's Question, I have to say that I endeavoured to obtain all the facts respecting the Monaghan Militia; but I must say, without any desire to keep anything from coming before this House, I regret very much that complaints of this kind are not sent in the first instance to the War Office instead of being brought up here. When we hear of it for the first time here we are at some disadvantage, because we have to collect information in a great hurry, and the facts turn out to be different from what is supposed. The answer I have received is this—

"1. The Monaghan Militia disembarked at Portsmouth at about 2 p.m. on the 13th inst., proceeded by special train, and arrived at their camp at East Codford, in Wiltshire, a distance of about 60 miles, at 6 p.m. the same day. Their tents were ready for them. They marched at about 7 15 a.m. next day, 14th, about four miles to a review. They had breakfast before starting, and a portion of bread was issued to each man before starting to take in his haversack. Three companies had cheese, but, by some mistake, none had been put into the waggon for the other three. They halted three-quarters of an hour at Yarnbury, had water, and the Army Service Corps water cart, which accompanied them, was refilled, and went with them to the ground. They arrived on the ground about 10 a.m., the review began about 12; they left the ground again about 2 p.m., and got back to camp about 4 p.m. Proper arrangements were made in every way. There were no cases of sunstroke nor deaths in this regiment; but there was one which was fatal, and four not so, in the other regiments of the Brigade."

TURKEY—THE INSURRECTIONARY PROVINCES.—QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government have reason to believe in the accuracy of a telegram in the "Daily News" of Wednesday, July 26th, dated Belgrade, Tuesday afternoon, announcing "the failure of the Servian plans;" whether the time has not now arrived when, in the interests of European peace and civilisation, as well as of the independence of the Ottoman Empire, the Great Powers, parties to the Treaty of 1856, may, in Congress or otherwise, actively mediate to put an end to the deplorable state of things now existing in the Slavonic Provinces of Turkey; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will submit to the other Powers, including the Sublime Porte, proposals to this effect?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, we have never been able to obtain any accurate information as to the plans of the Servian campaign; and therefore I cannot give any opinion as to the failure of those plans. With regard to the other very important inquiry of my hon. Friend, I feel it is, perhaps, impossible—certainly most difficult—in merely answering a Question, to enter into a discussion of such magnitude. My hon. Friend will recollect there is a fair prospect, I hope, of our having an ample discussion upon these matters connected with what is proceeding in Turkey; and I shall be quite happy then, not only to hear the arguments of my hon. Friend, but to address myself generally to the question.

ARMY—LINE AND SCIENTIFIC CORPS
—THE GARRISON OF BELFAST.

QUESTION.

MAJOR BEAUMONT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true, as given in evidence in the course of the recent Court Martial on Captain Roberts, that a junior Infantry officer commanded the garrison of Belfast over a senior officer of one of the scientific Corps; if this was the case, whether it was not in direct violation of the Queen's Regulations, which say—

“that the functions of command is to be exercised by the senior combatant officer, according to date of Army rank, and irrespective of the branch of the Service to which he belongs;”

and, whether he will in that event take steps to prevent the recurrence of such irregularities?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: In reply to the Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I beg to state that the facts as stated in the Question are substantially correct. There has been an irregularity, and directions have been given to the general officer commanding in Ireland to prevent its recurrence.

NAVY—H.M.S. “THUNDERER.”

QUESTIONS.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a leading article in the “Hampshire Post,” in which the following passage occurs:—

“But if Mr. Harvey had no power to select the jurors, he had, we suppose, some choice allowed him as regards the selection of himself as the official to conduct the inquisition. We should have thought after the experience which Mr. Harvey has had with respect to the extreme sensitiveness of the public on the score of appearances, as illustrated in the case of the “Mistletoe” inquiry, that he would have seen the expediency of delegating to some other person his authority in this matter;”

and, whether he cannot still arrange to put the inquiry in the hands of some coroner who does not receive any Admiralty fees?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he was not in the habit of taking in The Hampshire Post, and therefore had not seen the article until his attention was called to it by the hon. Member's Notice of the Question. His reply was that he had no jurisdiction whatever in the matter. The Coroner had written to the First Lord of the Admiralty inquiring whether it was advisable that, on account of his connection with the Admiralty, the inquiry should be held before any other person than himself. His right hon. Friend immediately replied that, so far as he was concerned, he thought it would be advisable. There was, however, a question of law as to whether that could be done. So far as he was at present advised, it appeared that as the inquiry had been commenced by the Coroner, it must be continued to be held before the same person. He would endeavour to obtain the best opinion upon the point; but he was afraid that there were legal difficulties in the way of holding the inquest before a deputy which could not be overcome.

MR. HUNT wished to supplement the answer of his right hon. Friend. It was thought desirable that the Coroner should not conduct the inquiry himself, but that some one else ought to be appointed. He, however, afterwards wrote to say that, in consequence of the state of the corpses, he thought it necessary to commence the inquest at once, and therefore he was not able to make any other arrangement.

MR. GOSCHEN asked the right hon. Gentleman to give an approximate idea as to how long the inquiry was likely to last, and whether there would be any opportunity for the House to discuss the subject before the end of the Session? He had been most anxious not to put to the First Lord any Question respecting the Thunderer pending the inquest; and although the Session was now drawing to a close, he thought it possible that the right hon. Gentleman might be able to furnish the House with information upon the subject before the Prorogation.

MR. HUNT: It is quite impossible to say how long the inquiry may last or how long the Session may last. At present it looks as if there may be a competition between them as to which shall hold out the longest. I am unable to give any answer to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman. I should be exceedingly glad if I could see my way to the end of the inquiry.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE—THE NORTH EAST COAST.—QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, having regard to the very numerous disasters resulting in the loss of life and property which occurred annually to our shipping on the north east coast of England, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of providing more adequate harbour accommodation in that district than at present exists?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he could not at present hold out any encouragement to the hon. Baronet to expect that the Government would propose a Vote for additional harbour accommodation on the north-east coast of England. The course which had been pursued of late years had been to encourage local authorities to improve their own harbours by advances out of the Public Works Loan Fund. That course had produced very good results in some cases, and he hoped that it would lead to considerable improvement in our harbour accommodation.

THE NEW FOREST.—QUESTION.

LORD HENRY SCOTT asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is his intention to renew his Notices given last November of a Bill to carry out the resolutions of the Select Committee on the New Forest, with a view to passing a Bill in the next Session of Parliament; and if he is willing to state the reasons that have prevented its introduction this year?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that he hoped to give Notice of such a Bill for next Session, and that its introduction this year had been prevented by the pressure of other business.

THE IRISH CHURCH—

SALE OF ECCLESIASTICAL EDIFICES.

QUESTION.

MR. A. MOORE asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is legal for the Irish Church body, or any of its component parts, to sell ecclesiastical edifices which have fallen into disuse?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET): In my opinion it would be legal for the representative body of the Irish Church to dispose of any ecclesiastical edifice vested in them by the Act of 1869, if directed to do so by the General Synod of the Irish Church.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—CANVASSING JURORS.—QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to an occurrence at this Summer Assize held at Tralee, where, in the case of The Queen v. Quilter, on an indictment for murder, the Crown prosecutor, Sir Colman O'Loughlen, applied for a postponement of the trial on the ground, proved by affidavit, that the whole jury panel summoned to serve at the Assize had been canvassed on behalf of the prisoner, and that a fair trial could not be had; and, whether he will in the Juries Procedure Bill now before Parliament propose a change in the mode of summoning jurors to form the panel as will prevent their names from being known a long time before being called on to serve, and so giving opportunity for solicitation or intimidation, a result which cannot be prevented under the present system of summoning in dictionary order?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: The trial of John Quilter has certainly been postponed to the next Tralee Assizes, and the reports in the public Press agree in stating that it was postponed by the learned Judge for the reason given in my hon. Friend's Question—namely, that the jury panel had been canvassed on behalf of the prisoner; though I do not think that it was alleged that the canvassing had extended to the whole jury panel. But as I have not yet received the report of the Crown Solicitor on the case, which only occurred a few days ago, I am unable to say precisely how far the reports in the Press are accurate. There is in the Juries Procedure Bill a proposal for the repeated summoning from time to time of jurors who have not answered to their names, which will, I hope, not only secure a better attendance of jurors, but will also make it more difficult than at present to ascertain the composition of the jury panel before trial.

INDIA—PARLIAMENT ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

MR. GOSCHEN said, some anxiety was beginning to be felt with regard to the discussion of the Indian Budget, which would be particularly important on account of the difficulties there had been with regard to the depreciation of silver. He had been reluctant to ask the Government, seeing how pressed they were with various kinds of business, to give a day for the discussion of the matter, so very important for India; but in consideration of no day having been asked for the discussion of the Report of the Committee on that most important subject he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to assure the House that the Indian Budget, involving as it would the discussion of the depreciation of silver, would not be postponed too long. He should like also if the right hon. Gentleman would give them any information as to the course of Business next week. It would appear as if the Education Bill would not be taken to-morrow, and there would be great disappointment if the debate on the Eastern Question were not begun on Monday.

MR. DISRAELI: No one can be more anxious that I am that the discussion on the Indian Budget—under the peculiar circumstances which now affect the currency—should come on for discussion as soon as possible. I did mention it the other night as one of the main subjects that I contemplated bringing before the consideration of the House. I should hope that we might discuss it under circumstances which will allow of a tolerably full attendance of Members; but it is quite impossible for me to form any opinion as to the progress of Business until the Committee on the Education Bill is closed. When that time arrives I will make a statement to the House as to what I think will be the probable course of Public Business. It was an inadvertence of mine when I stated that we should not proceed with the Education Bill to-morrow. I thought for the moment that this was Friday. We shall proceed with the Education Bill to-morrow morning, if we do not close the Committee to-night. And I trust that on Monday we may approach the discussion of Turkish affairs.

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the contingent intimation that the debate on Turkish affairs may possibly be put off, I do not know that we have any power in the matter. Probably the House is in the hands of the Government. But before the right hon. Gentleman makes any final announcement on the subject, I hope he will take in view that in consequence of the Notices that have been given by two hon. Gentlemen sitting on that side of the House, the debate on the Turkish question is to assume distinctly and unequivocally the character of a Vote of Confidence in the Government. I cannot think it would be proper to postpone a vote of that character on a subject of so much importance, in order to proceed with the Committee on the Education Bill.

MR. DISRAELI: If any Notice of a Vote of Censure on our policy had been given, I certainly should, in any circumstances, have made arrangements to meet it; but as it has taken the more amiable form of a Vote of Confidence, I think, on mature consideration, the general interests of the House require the course which I have announced, and which I think it my duty to follow.

MR. GLADSTONE: There is such a Notice on the Paper.

MR. DISRAELI: From the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. GLADSTONE: No!

[BILL 155.]

*Viscount Sandon, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,
Mr. Ascheton Cross.)*

COMMITTEE. [Progress 25th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Amendment proposed to new Clause (Dissolution of School Board under certain circumstances), line 9, at end of first paragraph, to add the words—

“Provided always, That no application shall be made for the dissolution of a School Board except within three months before the expiration of the period for which the School Board has been elected; and no order for the dissolution of such School Board shall take effect until after the expiration of such period.” —(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that he was unable to state his views on this Amendment at the last sitting before the hour of adjournment arrived. Since that time the Government had considered the subject, and in the same spirit of conciliation with which they had all through met the Amendments proposed in this Bill, he was not only willing to accept the Amendment, but he did not hesitate to state that he thought it a great improvement. Its object was to prevent school boards from being constantly disturbed by proposals for dissolving them being made at short intervals. It was very much better that the will of the locality should be taken at certain distant intervals—that was to say, after a period of three years when the school board elections had taken place; and he thought the Amendment providing that such should be the case was a decided improvement. It was much better that a school board when once elected should know that it could not be disturbed during its three years' term of office, and had the whole responsibility of working the law during that time. He should therefore ask his hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) to adopt it in his clause. He might have to make some alteration on the Report in the proposed term of three months.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE was willing to accept any modification in the term of three months.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT moved, as an Amendment to Mr. Pell's proposed new clause, at end to add—

“In every case where a school board shall be dissolved under this Clause all the powers conferred upon it by and under ‘The Elementary Education Act, 1870,’ shall be transferred to and continued under the local authority of the parish or district for educational purposes created under this Act.”

The right hon. Gentleman said, he was glad to hear that the noble Lord was in a favourable mood for considering any reasonable Amendments that might be offered to this Bill. The Amendment he had now to propose would recommend itself very strongly to those who might wish the Bill to do as much good and as little harm as possible. It was very simple, would lead to no confusion, and all might understand it. The meaning of his Amendment was that when the Government shifted the authority in cases where this clause came into force from the school board to a committee of corporations in boroughs and a committee of the guardians in parishes, all the powers conferred by the Act of 1870 upon the authority about to be superseded should be transferred and continued to the new school authorities. He thought he could show that the Amendment was one which ought to meet all the complaints of the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) and his friends, and at the same time to a large extent it would satisfy those who had to complain of the course which the Government had taken in accepting this clause. During the course of the debate a little too much stress had, he thought, been laid on the statement that the change proposed was only a substitute about which really they ought not to complain—that the change was one which was not calculated to damage the efficacy of their educational legislation, and that it was a change rather of convenience to persons who had some ground of complaint against school boards in certain districts. The hon. Member for Leicestershire thought that the school boards in certain cases were unpopular, and that the substituted authority would be more popular, and the principal ground which he had given had been that the school boards were unnecessarily troublesome in their formation, and that they were more expensive than a corporation committee in boroughs, or a Board of Guardians committee in a parish would be. It would be seen at once that the great object of saving the trouble of elections and expenditure would be promoted just as much if his Amendment were accepted as it would be if it were rejected. He objected to the argument that had been used, that this clause did not make a real change, but made only a substitution of authority. The whole argument, so far as it was rested upon that statement, was absolutely untrue; because it was clear that it was the destruction of one authority and the substitution of another very inferior to it in force and in completeness. By the Act of 1870, where more school accommodation was required, and as it was required, and where it might be desirable to hand over an existing school to a public authority, the school board was complete for these purposes. The authorities to be established by this Bill had no force and no efficacy whatever. He ventured to say that if the state of things which this clause would produce in districts where school boards were abolished could be made general throughout the country, the whole object of Parliamentary legislation on this great question would be thwarted and entirely put an end to. If the noble Lord would accept his Amendment to the clause they would have exactly the same powers in those districts which they had at present; they would have in all degrees of efficacy a school board, but deprived of all those features of the school board of which the hon. Member for Leicestershire had so much complained. If the population increased in any of the boroughs and towns and parishes to which this clause might ever apply, the new authority could at once, if it thought proper, proceed to the affording of more school accommodation; and if the schools were feeble the new authority could take them in hand, and the efficiency of the schools might be maintained. He had stated before that under the education system as it was now conducted there had been a great want of confidence in some portions of it, on the part, he should say, of a large majority of the Nonconformists and Dissenters of England and Wales; and he should himself have very little confidence in their intellect and judgment if their confidence had not been impaired by the long experience which they had had in connection with this and other questions. He saw that some critic of their discussions the other day remarked upon the unusual vehemence with which he had addressed himself to the Committee, and another had remarked upon the acrimony with which he had spoken. He had no doubt the authors of this Bill and of the clause under discussion were very anxious that they should all speak in very moderate tones, as if really there was nothing to complain of. He found, however, that a very great dignity—no less than one of the Bishops of the Established Church—speaking on the subject of the Government Education Bill the other day, said “he congratulated Mr. Pell on the success of his Amendment,” adding that—“the bitterness that Amendment had evoked was an encouraging fact.” Surely, then, they could not be blamed, having the approbation of a Bishop, for the warmth which had been evoked by a discussion of this question. He made some charges, or what had been called charges, the other day with regard to the position of Dissenters under the operation of this Bill to the effect that the children of Nonconformists and Dissenters were forced into schools the vast proportion of which belonged to the Church of England. Some of the cases which he had mentioned were said by hon. Gentlemen on the other side to be trifling, and not to be worthy of consideration. He thought differently. It would, he believed, be possible to get scores of such cases from every county in England, and three-quarters of the letters he received lately contained complaints of the same kind, showing the disadvantages to which the children of Dissenters were exposed, and that the Conscience Clause, as enforced upon paper, was no real or safe guarantee for the proper treatment of the children. He was prepared to assert that in hundreds, and he believed in thousands of instances all over the country, petty persecution of the meanest kind was offered to Dissenting families and their children in connection with this matter of education. He would give a case in a village near Malmesbury where there was a Church school which provided sufficient school accommodation for the district. There was also in the same village a Baptist chapel and Sunday school, which had been recently enlarged. On the occasion of the completion of the buildings a tea party was held, whereupon the Rev. R. Powis, the clergyman of the parish, sent out a circular which was an interesting comment on the Education Bill. It was that the Rev. R. Powis had made up his mind that those parents who could send their children to the tea party—the Baptist tea party—could not want any help; also that the children could not come to the school feast in August. He hoped there was no man in that House so depraved by his prejudice in favour of an Established Church as to approve of this miserable persecution. Here was another case. In St. Mary's parish—he supposed it was in the town of Warwick—this circular was sent out—

“Coal, Shoes, Bread, and Beef Charities.—Persons with families may take notice that they will receive nothing from any of these charities unless their children are sent regularly to the national or infant school on week days, and to the Church Sunday School on Sundays.”

And then there was a slight conviction that this was not quite the thing, and the circular went on to say—

Mr. John Bright

"This rule will be strictly carried out, except when the children go to the School of Industry, and perhaps in the cases of a few persons who have been always consistent members of some Dissenting congregations."

That was the sort of thing that was going on almost everywhere. ["No, no!"] He was glad that hon. Gentlemen opposite objected to his statement, because it was clear that they would not object if they did not disapprove of that which he had read. He had a note written from Winchester on the same subject, speaking of what had taken place in a parish in Hampshire. It said there was a small Free Methodist society there, with many members of sterling worth, who were not willing to send their children to the Church Sunday school, and, consequently, the Rector intimated that only those children that should attend both day and Sunday school would be permitted to attend the annual school treat. The parents and friends retorted—for, of course, these things grew into contest and conflict—by threatening to withdraw their children from school on the day of the examination of the Government Inspector, and so injure the school financially. The Rector replied that the treat was a matter in which the parents had no concern, and concluded with a threat as to the unknown evils which would happen if they persisted in their obstinacy. The Rector, his correspondent added, was High, teaching the usual Anglo-Popish heresies, and therefore was distrusted by Protestant parents. One good man sent his children a distance of two miles, to the nearest town, rather than allow them to come under the Rector's influence; and his informant added that in this case the Conscience Clause was a delusion and a sham. A gentleman speaking not long ago at the assembly of the Congregational Union, said there were thousands and tens of thousands of children of Nonconformists who were in Church schools, and were being taught the Church Catechism. Many parents of Nonconformist children were probably anxious their children should be educated, and did not press the question of the Conscience Clause; but what were they to think of the children of Baptists being in these schools and being taught the efficacy of baptismal regeneration as in the Established Church, and

and if they were taught all the curious things that were said about godfathers and godmothers, when there were no such persons in relation to them? These things were occurring all over the country, and under this Bill such children would be forced into the Church schools all over the country without any sufficient safeguard. What he quoted the other day from the President of the Wesleyan Conference last year (Rev. Gervase Smith) was received with something like a shock of disapprobation from hon. Gentlemen on the other side. The President of that Conference held no mean office. He was a man of the highest culture and of the highest character, and he had the confidence of one of the most important religious bodies in the Kingdom, and he could now read his words. He said—"In many parts of this land the Methodist people are persecuted." What he said of the Methodist people applied equally to Independents, Baptists, and other smaller sects. He said—"And they have not the religious liberty which the laws of the country certainly suggested they ought to have." He referred to such things as those—labourers turned away from their employment because they were Methodists; shopkeepers having to close their shops because they were Methodists; farmers turned out of their farms and thrown on the world because they were Methodists; gentlemen in high position in commercial circles who were not placed on the magisterial bench because they were Methodists. [Laughter.] He did not know how Gentlemen could laugh at a statement of that sort. They must be very ignorant of their own class if they did not know it was very true. He himself, conversing with a country gentleman in one of the Midland Counties not long ago, was told by him that nothing would induce him to let one of his farms to any Nonconformist; and he would undertake to say hundreds of men followed the same rule. His right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had once, with regard to the county of Huntingdon, given an instance of how magisterial appointments were dispensed, and in all probability there was not one man out of 20 among the magistrates of England and Wales who was not, excepting it might be in the West Riding, and in South Lancashire, connected with the Established Church. ["Oh!"] It was a fact common and notorious—[“No!”]—and hon. Gentlemen, instead of objecting to what he said, might take it into their serious consideration, and hope that a more liberal and just system might before long be established. The President of the Conference continued—

“Children have had rewards given to them, rewards carried to the school at Christmas by a lady from one of the principal houses of the village, and handed round the school to the children of parents associated with her; but on coming to one little girl she says, ‘Mary, I am very sorry I cannot give you a book,’ and this for nothing whatever but because her father and mother are Methodists. The little girl began to cry, nor can you be surprised at that.”

These were absolute facts, the more astonishing, perhaps, because the persecution descended to such small matters. The President concluded with another case similar to the one mentioned by him (Mr. Bright) the other day. A lady, attended by two servants, was distributing clothing in a parish, and after leaving one blanket at one door, she half opened the next, told the inmate what she was doing, and said—“I am sorry I cannot leave you one; you know, you are a Methodist.” The good lady did not intend ill perhaps, but what could be more base than attempts to proselytise of this kind? Mr. Smith ended his remarks by mentioning instances in which sites had been refused for Methodist chapels simply because they were Methodist chapels, and said these were samples of what was going on in at least 2,000 villages in this country. They were then brought, and he (Mr. Bright), being himself a Nonconformist, of those whose ancestors suffered indignities, imprisonment, and death through the persecutions of the Established political Church of this country, not more than two centuries ago, was brought to the consideration of the effect of this Bill, and of the policy of the House in regard to it upon one-half of the population of England and Wales, so far as they were estimated by attendance at places of worship on Sundays, and, if possible, to induce the House and the Committee to guard them from further insult and from further neglect. He would ask to have a quiet talk with hon. Gentlemen opposite upon this point. Suppose there were 5,000 parishes in England, or only 500, in which there was no school but a Methodist school, or an Independent school, or a Baptist school, or Unitarian school. What would be their course with regard to this Bill? Why, they would do as the House of Commons did 200 years ago, as an insult to the other House, they would rise from their seats and kick it out of the door, and dispossess the Minister, and disestablish him before the night was over. But because this Bill was a Bill giving extra authority to the thousands of schools in connection with their own Church, they passed over the grievances, and injury it might be, and insult to the scores of hundreds of thousands of Nonconformist families throughout the country who ought to be fairly represented in that House, and had the right to claim as much indulgence and as full equity as the members of the Established Church had any right to expect from Parliament. Dissenting children all over the country were to be driven by crack of whip, as it were, into Church schools; and it was because he wished to mitigate the harshness of this Bill—and were the positions of Churchmen and Nonconformists reversed the hardship would be admitted—and to free it from parsonic and priestly partiality, that he brought forward his Amendment. The Board of Guardians might be free from that partiality, and the committee of the Town Councils in boroughs might be free from it to a certain extent; but he believed the freest and best institution probably in either boroughs or country parishes, but certainly in the latter, would be the school board as established by the Act of 1870. He wanted particularly by his Amendment to enable the noble Lord and the House to create confidence in Dissenters, and where it existed at all to increase it. The Bill as it at present stood would impair confidence, and would do great injury to that great and excellent and admirable class of the population of this country. He had said the Dissenters of England and Wales numbered one-half of the population; but in Great Britain and Ireland they were far more than one-half, and what did they see? A Government, within whose precincts no Dissenter could hope at any time ever to be found. Amongst the 350 Members opposite there were probably not half-a-dozen—he knew not whether there were more than two—who would avow themselves to be unconnected in some way, in feeling or profession, with the Established Church. He thought there was one professed Jew, and he knew there was one member of a Unitarian sect; but whether there were one of any of the other Nonconformist sects of the country he was not certain. And with a Government who could feel themselves perhaps defiled by the presence amongst them of a Nonconformist with a great Party, almost every man of whom was connected not only by religious profession but by political sympathy, which was not less strong, with the Establishment, was he not entitled and bound to ask Gentlemen opposite for a moment to throw aside the prejudices—he had almost said of their caste, the prejudices connected with their Church and their sect, and to look broadly upon this question as one of equity to the great body of the people—equity which they were as much bound to offer to the Nonconformists of this country as to the most rigid Churchman? He knew perfectly well that the tribunal before which he had to offer these observations was one most unfavourable to his claim. He knew that Gentlemen opposite had never been accustomed to look upon Nonconformists and the Dissenting population but as persons who differed from them seriously in religion, and were mostly opposed to them in politics. He had never found them on their side advocating justice to the Dissenting population of England and Wales. ["Oh, oh!"] It was no use Gentlemen saying, "Oh, oh," their own consciences must tell them he was not exaggerating in these statements he had made. Though, therefore, the Committee might be unfavourable to what he asserted, yet he believed the cause he pleaded before them was just, and though they might be strongly biassed now and determined not to yield, though the noble Lord might make no greater concession in this case than he had in some other cases, yet the time would come when the judgment of Parliament, backed by an intelligent and free people, would reverse the unfavourable judgment to which tonight they might come.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Clause, to add the words

"In every case where a School Board shall be dissolved under this Clause all the powers conferred upon it by and under 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' shall be transferred to and continued under the local authority of the parish or district for educational purposes created under this Act."—(Mr. Bright.)

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he thought it would be more expedient and more in accordance with the feelings of the Committee if he declined to follow the right hon. Gentleman into the questions of supposed wrongs and insults heaped by the Church upon their Nonconformist fellow-citizens, which the right hon. Gentleman had thought fit to introduce into the discussion of this clause. The Committee would fall into very unnecessary rancour if it once entered upon a discussion of these topics. Some things stated by the right hon. Gentleman were very grievous to hon. Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side to hear, and they did not think the right hon. Gentleman did them justice in these questions; but they were content to leave the matter to the judgment of the people of the country. He could assure the Committee that there was no wish on his own part, or on the part of the Government, and he was sure he might speak for his hon. Friends around him also, to do any injury to the conscientious feelings of Nonconformists. Many hon. Gentlemen on that side had, as he certainly had himself, the pleasure of the acquaintance of Nonconformist gentlemen, and he did not see why he should not value their friendship and deal justly by them because they differed from them in opinion. Heated partizans on both sides might, no doubt, sometimes be inclined to act as they ought not to do in the matter of school treats. But surely no one would venture to say that the Church had a monopoly of unkindness, even if it were proved that some unkind acts were committed by some of her sons. He admitted that there might be foolish and wrong-headed people in the Church of England, who did unkind things which he strongly condemned; but hon. Gentlemen would not find unkindness confined to any one of the Christian Churches. He did not believe that his Friends belonging to other Churches always distributed their blankets or their buns among those who differed from them in religion. But with regard to the question before the Committee, the securities for the rights of conscience must be held to have made a very great advance under this Bill, because a local authority would be within the reach of every cottage in the land, charged under this Bill, in addition to its school attendance duties, with the obligation of taking cognizance of every complaint of violation of the Conscience Clause, and bound to inform the Department of such wrongs. He could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman was misinformed as to the number of Nonconformist children who would be affected by this measure. The Central Nonconformist Committee, in their printed circular, dated from Birmingham, issued after he had made his first speech explaining the Bill, and signed by the Chairman and leaders of that Association, of which he had spoken before, had said they believed the number of Nonconformist children who would be driven to school by Lord Sandon's Bill must be very few. The right hon. Gentleman had said he had come to the conclusion that the best thing even for country villages was a school board, and that Boards of Guardians and Town Councils could not take that care of the consciences of Nonconformists which he desired. He confessed he was a little puzzled by the right hon. Gentleman's opinions about school boards, because in a set speech which the right hon. Gentleman delivered in Birmingham in October, 1873, speaking of school boards, he said—

“There is no free breeze of public opinion passing through the room, but rather an unwholesome atmosphere of what I call sectarian exclusiveness, or sometimes of bigotry, in which nothing good can thrive.”

This opinion was delivered on a most formal occasion, when the right hon. Member addressed his constituents on the leading topics of the day, and specially on the Education Act of 1870, and he (Viscount Sandon) was totally at a loss to reconcile the right hon. Gentleman's present zeal for school boards, and desire to impose them everywhere upon the country when it did not wish for them, with the very bitter and deliberate attack which he made upon them so recently on a great public occasion. But to come to the Amendment. The largest number of school boards which could be touched was 530 or 540, which, after certain eliminations, would be reduced probably to between 200 and 300. To meet their case the right hon. Gentleman had made a very large proposition. He was not sure that this proposal would not raise the cry to abolish school boards even in the large towns if Town Councils and Boards of Guardians were to have their power. The principle, therefore, of the right hon. Gentleman's proposal was a very large one. He would ask the Committee to look at this matter from one point of view. Under this Amendment they must give these local authorities the same power as the school boards to remit and pay fees, and that would be putting into their hands the whole question of the old 25th clause. The effect of introducing such a question in all the elections of School Attendance Committees of Town Councils and Boards of Guardians would be most mischievous. In the present Bill the Government had said that the proper thing was to leave it to the Guardians in their capacity of Guardians to deal with the question of fees; and as for the question of religion the authorities created by the Bill had nothing whatever to do with it, and were nothing in fact, you might say, but school police to look after the employer, the negligent parent, and the neglected child, as far as the provisions of this Bill were concerned. Now, was the Committee prepared to have the election of Boards of Guardians and Town Councils turn on the question whether religious instruction should be given in the schools as it frequently did in the case of the election of school boards? The country would repudiate the introduction of such an element of bitterness into the election for what may justly be called the municipal authorities of town and country. If you were not to have this element of religious dissension introduced into these elections, Parliament must do one of two things: to eliminate it from the elections, it must either make all schools purely secular, or it must itself order religious teaching of a certain character in all schools. Were the schools to be secularized? The country would repudiate any such idea. The only other alternative was to order religious instruction in all their schools: were the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends prepared for that? If the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman were adopted, the inevitable result would be that the religious question would come up in all elections of Boards of Guardians and Town Councils. That of itself seemed a sufficient answer to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. The country would never tolerate the introduction of this new element into municipal elections. Did any one who was experienced in school matters, and who took a real interest in education for its own sake and with a simple view to the advantage of the children, ever propose that the Boards of Guardians should be made the managers of our schools? Once assent to such a principle, and they must carry it further. It was a very serious, a very large, and altogether a new issue which was raised by the right hon. Gentleman. It ought, in fact, to be discussed upon its merits as a Bill in itself. He confessed that the more he looked at the proposal the more confident he was the country would not accept it. More than that, the proposal would be received with a universal "No" from every Town Council and Board of Guardians in the country. For himself, he was quite willing to leave the matter to the judgment of the country. Of one thing he was certain, that hon. Gentlemen who supported the proposal would not meet with a very hearty reception when they went to the country in the autumn either to attend the civic feasts or to be present at agricultural dinners, where Guardians were present. Town Councils and Boards of Guardians, he felt sure, would not care to have the school board difficulties and complications imported into their elections. The duties imposed upon them by the Government Bill were simple and distinct, and introduced none of these difficulties into their elections or into their proceedings, and only tended to add new interest and dignity to their work, which, while it would lead to economy, would draw the best men to seek seats on their bodies. The more the Committee looked at the Amendment the more it would find that it was not one which should be entertained. After giving it the most careful consideration he did not think it would meet the difficulties of the case. He felt satisfied, in spite of the extraordinary arguments of the right hon. Gentleman, and the impassioned way in which he urged them, that the country would not support the proposal for a moment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER must remind the Committee that this new issue, be it large or small, was not raised by his right hon. Friend, but by the noble Lord himself, when he accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). The arguments used in support of the Amendment were not attempted to be answered by the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council. In his (Mr. Forster's) opinion school boards were by far the best machinery for carrying out the educational improvement of the country; but the Government wished to get rid of the school boards and substitute for them an authority which had not the authority of a school board. School boards had power to supply school accommodation where it was deficient and to take over voluntary schools; but Town Councils and Guardians would have no such power. Wherever school boards had been established there were persons elected by the district who would see that fair play was given to the children of all religions, and who were able to put up schools of such a nature that they could not be denationalized or secularized; and unless the Amendment of his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham were adopted there would be no means of removing or concealing any unfairness that might be shown to Dissenters or Nonconformists. He was astonished to hear the arguments put forward by the noble Lord on the disadvantages of school boards, as if he felt so strongly on the subject he ought to have put forward his views when Mr. Dixon, the late Member for Birmingham, brought forward his Motion with reference to the 25th clause of the Education Act. If the Amendment now before the House brought about any difficulty it was caused by the new clause, to which the Government had so unexpectedly given its support. The only positive mode of getting rid of the Amendment was to withdraw the clause, and he strongly recommended that suggestion to the favourable consideration of the Government. Very likely the noble Lord had no idea when he assented to this clause that he was re-opening the whole settlement of 1870; but it was a re-opening of it, and everyone would consider that it was unsettled, and that the arrangement that had been come to was open to the power of the strongest from year to year and from Parliament to Parliament. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his conciliatory speech in defence of the clause was obliged to bring forward arguments which re-opened the whole question, for he stated that the result would be to give time to the denominational party to supply deficiencies, and that would be a complete unsettling of the question. The local authority ought, at any rate, to be clothed with the same authority as the dissolved school board, and if that involved any difficulties the difficulties were of the Government's own seeking.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD heard with extreme pain and regret the speech of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, which could in no degree tend to pacify or bring about any successful subsidence of the feelings which the debates of the last three nights must have produced throughout the country. Incidentally the right hon. Gentleman had spoken of Churchmen as not being a majority of the population, and such a conclusion rested upon unauthentic statements; while the only inference to be drawn from school attendances, burials in cemeteries, the registration of marriages, and the composition of the Army and Navy, was that the Church of England embraced between 70 and 80 per cent of the population, and there were in workhouses 80,000 members of the Church of England, against 21,000 members of all Dissenting bodies. They were now concerned with a population that did not go to church, and whose condition corresponded most nearly with that of the inmates of the workhouses. Whatever were the relative proportions of Churchmen and Dissenters did not make any difference to the question before the Committee; but he must protest against deductions being made from false statistics.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT desired to explain that all he had said was that so far as the matter could be determined, the numbers attending Nonconformist places of worship were at least equal to the numbers attending Established Churches, and if, instead of taking England and Wales only, we took the Three Kingdoms, the Established Church was in an acknowledged minority. That there were more Church people in workhouses and gaols might be quite true, and he would make the right hon. Member a present of all he could extract from that argument.

MR. PELL reminded the Committee that his clause would take effect only where there was sufficient school accommodation. One of the most important functions of a school board was to provide school accommodation, so that if that were done the clause would not come into operation at all. It was exceedingly difficult to answer accusations against Members on this side of the House generally; but, if he had been attacked personally, he could have defended himself as to what he had done for education. The debate had elicited facts from the advocates of the school boards which were not very much in favour of the latter. It was no longer a political but a caste Party which advocated the extension of school boards. That was shown by the silence with which the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had been listened to by his own Party. He thought the more they divested themselves of these caste prejudices the better. When those who supported this clause were accused of being re-actionary and disturbing old settlements, he wished to remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that in the desire to promote education the Act of 1870 was accepted as a compromise. In the years 1874, 1875, and 1876, however, a Bill was brought in by the late Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) for the establishment of compulsory school boards. Was that re-actionary or progressive? It appeared to him to be very much like advancing backwards. In 1875, and again in 1876, the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) voted for that disturbing Bill. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) voted for it on all three occasions. The noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) voted for it once or twice, and yet these were the Gentlemen who now talked of disturbing the Act of 1870. In 1874 a Bill was brought in by the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) to repeal altogether the 25th clause of the Act of 1870, and also to repeal the three miles distance under which children were exempted from being brought into attendance at board schools. It was rather hard to be accused of disturbing the settlement of 1870 when hon. Gentlemen opposite, in their ardour for school boards, had neglected the so-called compact and compromise arrived at in that year. The school boards had been spoken of as depositaries of power and authority, but this did not appear to be their character at Birmingham. He went down to that town the other day to see the cattle, and he there saw something with which he was not quite so well pleased. On the platform of the London and North Western Railway were four or five urchins whose attire, if put together, would have made about one decent pair of trousers for the entire lot. They were performing the operation of turning themselves over like wheels, and he said to a friend, one of the Guardians of a neighbouring town—"Why are not these little imps at school? I should have thought the school board here would have swept them in?" His friend told him that at the first moment a policeman appeared those boys would be up a chimney shaft. But what was a "depository of power and authority" worth if the school board of Birmingham could not catch these children and send them to school? The Committee might rely on it that the members of Boards of Guardians would be quite as good depositaries of power as the school boards and would do their duty in bringing the children to school; but God forbid that there should be school boards formed to build schools that were not wanted with all the concomitants of election turmoil and excitement. He trusted that the Committee would not accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, which appeared to be put on the Paper more with the view of giving the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity of firing his Gatling gun at the Party opposite than with any expectation that the Committee would adopt it.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Pell) had accused the Opposition of treating this question of school boards as if it were connected with caste. Now, he wished as a Churchman distinctly to state, after the challenge that had been thrown out by the hon. Member, that it was not necessary to be a Dissenter to be able to appreciate the grievances of Dissenters. No answer had been given to the question put by his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham whether, if there were 500 schools managed by Dissenters, would they as Churchmen pass a compulsory power for the children of Churchmen to be sent to these Dissenting schools. No Conscience Clause in such a case would satisfy hon. Gentlemen opposite, and in the same way hon. Members on the Opposition side felt that there was an extreme difficulty in combining compulsory school attendance with denominational schools. The general principle of the Act of 1870 was the school-board compromise; but the Vice President of Education now felt himself at liberty to take a retrograde step and encourage voluntary schools. He had supported the second reading of the present Bill in the belief that it would carry out the compromise of 1870; but he should have hesitated before doing so, if he had known the course the Government intended subsequently to adopt, which had caused the debates to be so protracted and so much feeling to exist amongst the Members of the Opposition, from a belief that they had not been fairly treated in the order in which these questions had been brought before the Committee. He regretted as much as the noble Lord did that there should be religious conflict at school-board elections; but there was something just as bad, and that was a sense of religious grievance left unredressed. The question they had now to decide was a simple one—namely, whether, where a school board was suppressed, the whole of the powers which the board might have exercised should not be transferred to the public authority which was to take its place?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that in the question of education there was, and must continue to be, great diversity of opinion among Members of the House. The subject was one of so much interest, and in many respects of so exciting a character, that it was not unnatural that they should from time to time be led into discussions which took a very wide range; but if they were to make progress he hoped the Committee would be led to consider the matter in a business-like point of view. With respect to the clause of his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) the Committee had by a decisive majority accepted its principle. Certain Amendments had then been moved, and one or two of those Amendments had been agreed to with modifications, and they were now considering another Amendment. It appeared to him that it was not a business-like proceeding, on the discussion of each Amendment, to re-open the whole principle of the clause, and to wander even beyond that, and re-open the principle of the Bill itself. He would invite hon. Gentlemen on both sides, and especially those on the Government side, to refrain from discussing matters which lay beyond the scope of the Amendment—namely, that where school boards were dissolved, the whole powers of those boards should be transferred to the school attendance committees. One important power would be handed over by the operation of the clause; but, as had been already shown, the district would lose nothing by the suppression of a school board which had exercised no other power than that which would be so transferred, and where there were schools attached to the school board the clause would not apply. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham proposed to go further, and to give to the school attendance committee the same powers that were possessed by school boards. That would in some respects aggravate the difficulty that was felt with regard to school boards, and the evils of elections would be transferred to Boards of Guardians and Town Councils, and occur annually instead of every three years. He did not think the Amendment a good one, and he asked the attention of the Committee to the real issue before them.

MR. WHITBREAD said, the clause under discussion entirely changed the whole scope and tenour of the Bill, and it was, therefore, a little too much to say that in debating it hon. Members should not go a single inch beyond the particular Amendment they were discussing. He deeply regretted the course that had been taken by the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon). There was much in the Bill of which he cordially approved, and he had hoped, until this unfortunate clause was brought forward and adopted, that this Bill would have been a settlement of the education question for some time to come, and have brought the children into the schools without raising any religious difficulty. With respect to the instances of petty persecution to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had referred, he must say that, as a Churchman, he much regretted them, but they should not be taken to be the acts of the Church, but of rash individuals within the Church; and it was necessary, if possible, to obtain security against their recurrence. In country districts, Dissenters had not the option of sending their children to any but Church schools; and he asked whether, if the case were reversed, hon. Members opposite would think that the Bill gave sufficient security to the children of Churchmen? This was the only just way of looking at the question. If, as the noble Lord said, so few school boards were affected, why not make this small concession? If, again, it turned out that there was less religious animosity in entrusting these duties to Town Councils and Boards of Guardians, why should there be any fear lest the principle should become popular and should spread? If this clause were insisted on, it would be impossible that this Bill could be accepted as a final settlement of the question.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE argued that the House ought to adhere to the position taken up in 1870—namely, that the voluntary schools, so long as they could maintain themselves, were to be allowed to do so. He sympathized in the grievances which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had detailed, and so far as legal interference could properly go, they ought to be prevented. He should support the Amendment of his right hon. Friend.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND said, the question involved in the clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire was regarded by those who sat on the Opposition side of the House as one of immense importance, and was an emanation of the policy of the Government, as indicated by the clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire. He did not wish to introduce bitterness or acrimony into the discussion, attributed to his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham; but he might state that travelling with a friend of his own on the previous day, a Nonconformist, he told him that there was such an opposition on the part of the Church to Dissenters, that a clause was put into the leases of farmers that they should not, on any account, allow Dissenters' services to take place in their farmhouses; and not only that, but that there should not be any religious services in the parish but those of the Church of England. There was a prevailing impression in the country that the Dissenters could not get fair play. There was no use in denying that gentllemen who had got what were called "quiet parishes" were not very desirous to let in elements of discord among them. The towns were able to take care of themselves; but the question was what was to be done in the country parishes? He did not object to the clergy and members of the Church of England doing all in their power to advance their own schools and religious opinions; but did the Parliament think that the Dissenters would submit to such a system as that which it was sought to subject them to? Were the Dissenters not as much entitled as Churchmen to have their schools and security for freedom of their religious convictions? They could not, without the greatest difficulty, obtain even a small site for a school in some parts of Cornwall. He regretted the tone in which the noble Lord had spoken both of school boards and Boards of Guardians. He thought that one good effect of this Bill would be to give the Boards of Guardians a higher sense of their duty to the poor of the country. The Government were making a great mistake in what they were doing, and he was quite sure they would not be backed up by the farmers. He was exceedingly anxious that the system of school boards should be made universal, and should not wish them to be abolished where they had been working well without substituting an efficient body for them. He gave credit to the noble Lord for what he had conceded in the discussion of this important question; but was it worth the noble Lord's while to adhere to the clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire? Much had been said by hon. Gentlemen in position of wealth about the pressure of the rate on the ratepayers for the erection of schools and school-board expenses; but, in his opinion, those who had wealth, and who affected to sympathize with the ratepayers, ought to bear half the expense of carrying out so great an object as that of educating the children throughout the country.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he had not voted on the Bill since the introduction of the clause proposed by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, which, he feared, would tend to render the measure, which might be otherwise beneficial, liable to the objections urged by the right hon. Member for Birmingham. School boards could not be introduced under the existing law, except where a deficiency of school accommodation had been proved, and where the accommodation was deficient; the effect of the compulsory powers under this Bill might force the children of parents, who disapproved of the religious teaching in the existing schools, to accept an education repugnant to their consciences. He agreed with the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that school boards that were especially elected for educational purposes must be presumed to be better adapted for those purposes than Boards of Guardians or corporations, who were elected for other purposes; but he felt with the right hon. Member for Birmingham that the introduction of compulsory powers rendered some further provisions than those at present existing necessary, and he thought that the suspended power of a school board, while inexpensive, tended to afford the protection which parents needed against having their children forced into schools under the direction of persons of extreme opinions, and it was better that the appeal of these persons should be to their neighbours than to the Education Department, which might, under certain circumstances, be practically inaccessible to these poor persons. It was not enough that the House should infer by such a measure as this that it desired to establish religious education. Parliament was bound to define what it meant by religious education as consistent with religious freedom. At present what the House meant by religious education remained in nubibus. He (Mr. Newdegate) was not to be persuaded that such a definition was impossible. The late Lord Derby, in 1835, succeeded in defining a tolerant code of religious education for Ireland, in which he was fortunate enough to obtain the co-operation of the Roman Catholic Archbishop Murray, together with that of the Protestant Primate of Ireland. Such an undertaking for Ireland was far more difficult than for England; and if Her Majesty's Government chose to adopt the late Lord Derby's—then Lord Stanley—Irish scheme of 1835 of religious education as their model, he believed that they might easily arrive at a definition of religious teaching that would be acceptable to all tolerant Christians. The present difficulty was created by the determination of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire and the Local Taxation Committee to reduce the rates at any risk or at any cost. That lay at the foundation of their determination to pull down school boards. He (Mr. Newdegate) feared that the Local Taxation Committee had taken a leaf out of the late Mr. O'Connell's book, who boasted that the young Ireland of his day understood the policy of making themselves inconvenient. He feared that the clause introduced into this Bill by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, which was founded, like some other measures of the present Session, upon an indiscriminate determination to abolish local taxation, would inflict severe inconvenience upon Her Majesty's Government, and much trouble upon the House of Commons.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK observed, that the country had by an overwhelming majority decided in favour of compulsion. This Bill extended that principle, though in an indirect manner; at all events, the Bill adopted it. He had voted for the second reading of the Bill; but if the clause moved by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire was passed, he should feel considerable doubt, in common with other hon. Members, as to what course he ought to take on the third reading. At present it appeared to him that the disadvantages of the Bill would be greater than the advantages. He hoped, even at that late stage of the debate, the Government would withdraw their support from the clause, for which, even as amended, he could not vote.

MR. GRANTHAM said, that as a member of a leading school board from its first formation in 1871 he had supported the Bill because he believed that the best way to maintain the high character of school boards was to abolish all boards as soon as they became useless. No board that was doing good work need fear abolition when the decision was left to two-thirds of the ratepayers, and boards which could not command that amount of popular support had better cease to exist. If in two or three years it was found that the new bodies to be appointed did not work well, it would be in the power of the Education Department to call for the appointment of another school board.

MR. ERNEST NOEL asked whether anything could be worse or do greater harm to school boards than that the Committee should pass a clause deliberately, after four days' discussion, that would create an agitation—it might be only against 400 of those boards at first—but, an agitation which, if they followed out what they had already done, would spread to other institutions of the kind. As had been pointed out over and over again, it was an illogical position to take up to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire after what they had done previously. It was contended that it was only just and equitable that the majority in a parish or a district were to have the right of putting down that which was to them useless. Very well; if they were to have that right in one place, they ought to have it in another. On the grounds of sacred liberty, justice, and equity, the Committee could not stand where they were, and it was for that reason that he thought they ought to do their utmost, even at this tenth hour, to induce the noble Lord or the Government to withdraw support to the clause which was so fatal to the interests of education in the country. Surely, if they had good cause, there was nothing at all factions in their doing their best to point out what they thought the defects of the clause. They were now, however, on the Amendment which he thought would modify the evil effects of the clause; and they had not heard any arguments against it except that it was a small one. He denied that it was a small one, and was of opinion that although it would not altogether get rid of the clause, it would at least modify it, so that it would be less objectionable. He, amongst others, thought that they were only doing their duty when they urged the Government one after another to withdraw the clause. They were more called on to do this, because they had been told from the other side that they did not sympathize with the Amendment and had no interest in it. Now, if every single Member on the Opposition side had spoken, it could only have been a fair answer to that. They did feel it, and felt it strongly. Could it be thought that they would have come down to the House again and again in the month of July to take part in these divisions if they did not feel the matter keenly? From his knowledge of hon. Members opposite, they were as much in favour of education as he and those who thought with him were, and they quite as much as he would be loth to see anything done which would injure education. He believed, therefore, they had no strong desire to see the clause passed, and many, he was sure, would hail with gratitude an announcement from the Government that, looking at the feeling of the House, they did not intend to insist upon the clause.

MR. WHITWELL declared that the country would repudiate this attempt to overturn the Act of 1870. That, if anything, would be the effect of the clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire. He strongly advocated the adoption of the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Bright's) Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 100: Majority 37.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved the following Proviso:—

"That, if after the dissolution of a School Board in any School District the Education Department are of opinion that there is not a sufficient amount of public school accommodation in such School District, they may cause a School Board to be formed for such School District, and send a requisition to such School Board in the same manner in all respects as if they had published a final notice under 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870.'"

The right hon. Gentleman explained that his Amendment would not affect the question whether the formation of school boards should or should not be ordered, but would only refer to the machinery by which such boards should be called into operation if ordered by the Department.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. RYLANDS moved the following Amendment:—

"That the Education Department shall in each case, where it shall assent to the dissolution of a school board, lay before both Houses of Parliament a statement of its reasons for giving such assent."

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, be added to the Bill."

MR. A. BROWN expressed a strong objection to the clause. Notwithstanding ing the alleged unpopularity of school boards, he believed the majority of the people of this country had more confidence in the fairness of the management of schools under those boards than in the management of the old denominational system, and he feared the result of this clause would be to transfer schools now under school boards back again to denominational management, and thereby injure the cause of education.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, this Bill was the most re-actionary measure ever introduced into the House. On the other hand, the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Birmingham was in favour of progress, and replete with good sense and moderation. Those in favour of the progress of education could have no possible excuse in not accepting the Amendment. Although he feared the Bill would pass, yet it would not command the approval of the majority of the thinking people of the country.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, there was one lesson which the Irish Members had learnt in this discussion. They had been charged with favouring a policy of obstruction in Parliament; but he must say that anything the Irish Members had ever advocated was mild in comparison with what had occurred in this Elementary Education Bill. They had now been debating one clause for a whole week. He hoped the Irish Members would take courage, and in the future would be a little more bold in their action. The Roman Catholics of Ireland would not accept of any compromise in reference to their religious convictions and the teaching of their children, and the Dissenters were also against compromise in reference to religious education; but he must say that in his experience he had never heard such intolerance as was expressed in this House in the discussion on the Bill. In justice, however, it must be admitted, that under the provisions of the Bill of 1870 the school boards in their constitution had a fair representation of Roman Catholics; and as between the Church of England Protestants and the Dissenters, the former were far more liberal in their views and actions towards the Roman Catholics than the Dissenters. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had lowered the subject under discussion, whilst the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard) was eminently aggressive. There was more ill-feeling in that House between the members of the different religious Bodies than existed in Ireland between Roman Catholics and Protestants. Being, however, not entirely satisfied with this clause, he should abstain from voting.

MR. WHALLEY said, he was glad to have heard his right hon. Friend's concluding remarks in reference to the Protestant feeling of the Church of England to the Roman Catholics; but when his hon. Friend spoke of the Roman Catholic religion, and of his Roman Catholic constituency, he must tell him that the Roman Catholics had no religion at all. The hon. Member was an Englishman, and was proud to represent an Irish Roman Catholic constituency, and talked about their not submitting to any compromise in matters relating to their religion; but he maintained what he had already said—that Roman Catholics had no religion.

MR. RITCHIE asked whether the remarks of the hon. Member were in Order?

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member for Peterborough that his observations were somewhat wide of the question before the Committee.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would endeavour to make available those quiet hours of the evening for calm discussion. He asked right hon. Gentlemen opposite to consider who they were, and whence they came. Nobody rejoiced more than he did at the last Election, when he saw the Conservative Party placed in power, because he saw that the right hon. Member for Greenwich was sacrificing his country upon the altar of expediency under the influences brought to bear upon him. ["Order, order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN observed that the hon. Member's remarks upon the course taken by the late Government were hardly germane to the question before the Committee. The Question before the Committee was whether the clause proposed by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire should be added to the Bill.

MR. WHALLEY: With regard to the compulsion now sought by this Bill, the object sought to be obtained was to drive the children of the country into the hands of the clerical party, and to deprive them even of the protection of the magistrates. That was the special object of the clause of the hon. Member. He (Mr. Whalley) had asked the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill what the special object of the clause was, and upon what grounds it was proposed, but he could not get any satisfactory explanation. It was clear, however, that it was to give a power to get the children of the country into the hands of the clergy of the Church of England—men who possessed unbounded wealth; who, in addition to the rates, had great aid from the State, and whose neglect hitherto of their duty in not educating the children led to the passing of the Education Act of 1870. They every day had evidence of the impolicy of handing over the education of the children of the country to the clergy of the Church of England, whom they had, by the passing of the Public Worship Regulation Act, declared unworthy of confidence.

MR. GORST rose to Order. He did not see what the Act to which the hon. Member referred had to do with the Motion that the clause stand part of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that any discussion as to the operation of the Public Worship Regulation Act was entirely foreign to the question before the Committee.

MR. WHALLEY submitted to the ruling of the Chairman. He was there like a lamb led to the slaughter. What was the time when this measure was introduced? At the moment when the Archbishop of Canterbury was appealing to Methodists, Quakers, Baptists, and jugglers to help the Church of England to save something of the wreck of Christianity—the Government stepped in and said they would help her, but the Church could not maintain her influence over the manhood of the country, and that her only chance now was to get hold of the poor little children. In the name of the Protestantism of the country he opposed this re-actionary, retrogressive, and Algerine Bill.

MR. W. HOLMS said, the clause would hasten the dissolution of school boards. Why should they do so? Had they not acted with vigour, or had they not efficiently discharged the duties committed to answer these questions he must refer to the last two Reports of the Committee of Council on Education. He had examined them, and the result of his investigation was this—he found that while in 1873 the accommodation afforded by voluntary schools amounted to 2,582,000, and in 1875 had increased to 3,146,000, or barely 25 per cent, and while the average attendance at these schools was 1,482,000 in 1873 and 1,837,000 in 1875, in the school board schools, the accommodation provided was for 125,000 in 1873 and 387,000 in 1875, or an increase of 200 per cent. Therefore, so far as vigour of action was concerned, they had a proportion of 8 to 1 in the advancement of the school board schools, compared to that of the voluntary schools. They had it also in the Report of the Committee of Council that in the voluntary schools the registers had, in several instances, been carelessly kept, if not actually tampered with; whereas the accounts of the school boards had invariably been accurately kept.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he should like to take that opportunity of repeating the protest which he had before made against the passing of the clause. He should also like to ask for an explanation of the extraordinary statement made the other night by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he spoke of the policy of the Government as being continuous of the policy of his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) in encouraging the voluntary system. When this was announced by the Government as the policy of the Bill, the House was justified in examining how far it was really a return to the voluntary system, and it was found that it was not a return to the voluntary system, but to a denominational one. He could not call this a voluntary system under which the noble Lord proposed that the State should find the whole of the expense, and the Church the whole of the management. He would rather call it a system of State patronage. Whether it was intended or not, this Bill would reverse the scheme of his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, and besides, they now had this insidious proposal of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). It was hardly possible to have devised a measure of a more suicidal character. What would be the result? Simply this—the country would have found that the schools were being maintained solely at the expense of the State, that the schools, although called voluntary, were being managed by the denominations, whilst the whole of the money either was granted by the State or came out of the pockets of the ratepayers. There could only have been one result of such a system, for it was always the case that when the State found the money, it assumed the control over it; and in this case it would have come to pass that the Government would have gradually assumed the control over every school. He was therefore free to admit that as that Bill stood before the clause of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, he was willing to let it pass, and to wait contentedly until the time should come when it would be necessary for the State to take out of the hands of the sects all the schools for which it paid the whole of the expense; but this clause was so mischievous that they were obliged on the Liberal side to protest against the further progress of the Bill. The whole object was denominational. The attempt, from first to last, was as clearly one to establish a denominational system in the interests of the Established Church as any that had ever been made in that House. He did not say this as a Nonconformist—only because it was an infringement of the rights of the people. He protested against the further progress of the Bill, and he hoped that the Government would give some explanation of the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the policy and development which he (Mr. Jenkins) had now shown to be of a most dangerous character.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 122; Noes 81: Majority 41.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH moved, after Clause 21, to insert the following clause:—

(Power to officers to enter places of employment.)

“The officer or officers appointed by the local authority to act in the execution of this Act, may, when any child is employed, enter the place of such employment, and examine touching any matter within the provisions of this Act.”

No such power existed in the Bill. It was a hardship alike to honest employers and to parents and children that such a power should not exist to enforce the provisions of the Factories' Acts.

VISCOUNT SANDON could not consent to the very large powers indicated by the noble Lord being conferred upon the officers referred to. To confer such extraordinary powers of entry would be contrary to the whole practice of our law. Her Majesty's Government, however, thought that some provision of the kind, to enable with due safeguards a local authority to ascertain if the law as to the employment of children was broken was necessary, and would see what could be done before bringing up the Report.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RATHBONE moved, after Clause 22, to insert the following clause:—

(Provision for accommodation of pupil teachers.)

"The powers and expenses of a School Board under this Act shall include the provision of accommodation for pupil teachers employed in other than Board Schools at any class or course of instruction provided for pupil teachers employed in Board Schools, subject to such terms and conditions (if any) as the Education Department from time to time direct or approve."

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that this opened up the consideration of a very large question which really did not come within the scope of the Bill, and though he much appreciated his hon. Friend's motives in bringing it forward, he hoped that it would not now be entered upon.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MUNTZ moved, in page 9, after Clause 24, to insert the following clause:—

(Expense of providing offices may, with the consent of the Education Board, be spread over a term of years.)

"Where a School Board have incurred, or require to incur, any expense in providing offices, they may, with the consent of the Education Department, spread the payment over such number of years, not exceeding fifty, as may be sanctioned by the Education Department; and may contract a loan for such purpose in the same manner as if the said offices were a public elementary school; and for this purpose the provisions of section ten of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1873,' shall be held to apply to such loan, and the First Schedule of 'The Public Works Loans Act, 1875,' shall be held to include such work."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Lord Frederick Cavendish

MR. HARDCASTLE moved, in page 9, after Clause 26, to insert the following clause:—

(Exemption of buildings used as school houses from rates.)

"From and after the commencement of this Act every building used as a school house within the meaning of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' or as offices within the meaning of this Act, shall be exempt from any rate for any purpose whatever which any authority but for this Act would have power to impose or levy upon the occupier of any such school house or office as aforesaid, or of any part thereof respectively."

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that he thought the matter of rating ought to be considered as a whole, and hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment at the present time, as it opened up the whole of a very important subject, which ought to be dealt with, if touched at all, by a separate Bill, and should not be partially handled by a clause in this Bill, for the discussion of which it would be impossible now to find sufficient time.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD thought public elementary schools ought to be exempted from rating as well as churches and chapels.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. COWPER - TEMPLE moved, in page 10, after Clause 28, to insert the following clause:—

(The Apostles' Creed not to be deemed a formulary as in section fourteen of Act of 1870.)

"Whereas doubts have arisen as to whether the Apostles' Creed is a formulary within the meaning of section fourteen, sub-section two of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' be it enacted, that the Apostles' Creed shall not be deemed to be a religious formulary distinctive of any particular denomination within the meaning of the said section."

His object was to preserve to school boards a liberty which many of them had lost through a misunderstanding of the Act of 1870. Those catechisms only had been prohibited which might impress on the schools of a whole district an external badge of appropriation to one Church or sect, and the five school boards which were using the Apostles' Creed were justified both by the strict letter of the law and by the intentions of its framers. That Creed could not be distinctive of any single denomination. None could presume to claim it as their own. It was the inheritance of all

Christendom. It was recited before the existing separations of Christian sects had commenced; and it was universally acknowledged as an ancient summary of the leading facts of the Gospel, as received by the primitive Church. Some hon. Members would remember that he had stated in 1870 that this Creed was not included amongst the formularies that were there to be prohibited, and this view was confirmed by the right hon. Member for Greenwich, Sir Roundell Palmer, and others. This Creed would be a help to teachers, and would afford a test for examinations, and might, in conjunction with the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments, furnish a basis of teaching and examination for all schools, whether managed by boards, or by the Church, or by Nonconformists.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that he would remind his right hon. Friend that the Bill did not touch in any way upon the question of religious teaching in our schools; the Government must therefore entirely decline to enter upon a discussion of this most important subject which was not within the four corners of the Bill—a Bill which did not pretend to deal, as he stated on introducing it, with all the various matters connected with our educational legislation on which great public interest was felt—but was confined very much to one branch of the subject. He was very glad therefore to hear that his right hon. Friend did not propose to proceed with the clause.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, after what fell from the noble Lord, he should withdraw the clause. He was confident that the lawfulness of the use of the Apostles' Creed if not affirmed in the Bill, would be declared by a decision of a Court of Law.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GREGORY moved, in page 11, after Clause 29, to insert the following clause:—

(Power to divide parishes.)

“Wherever it shall appear to the Education Department to be expedient or convenient, for the purposes of the Elementary Education Acts 1870 and 1873, or of this Act, to divide any parish into two or more separate parts, the Education Department may, with the consent of the Local Government Board, by Order, direct that each such part of the said parish as shall be defined and specified for that purpose in the Order shall, and the same shall accordingly as from the date of the Order, or any later date specified in the Order, be for the purposes of the said Acts, or any of them, a separate parish by itself, and section seventy-seven of ‘The Elementary Education Act, 1870,’ shall apply thereto in like manner as if such part of a parish were part of a parish situate outside of a borough.

“The provisions of section fifty-six of ‘The Elementary Education Act, 1870,’ with respect to raising a sum from any place which is part of a parish, shall, where necessary, apply to a part of a parish which under this section is constituted a separate parish by itself.”

VISCOUNT SANDON hoped his hon. Friend would not think it necessary to divide the Committee on this question at so late a period of the Session. He admitted the importance of the subject involved in the proposal, and would wish to be understood as giving no opinion, one way or other, on the merits of the clause; but, he could not but think that it was one which could be more appropriately raised, discussed, and settled on a Bill having reference to rating and areas of taxation. As a matter of fact, it would be utterly impossible at this period to discuss so important a matter.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HALL moved, in page 11, after Clause 29, to insert the following Clause:—

(Instruction in Scripture.)

“‘The Elementary Education Act, 1870,’ shall be construed as if there were added to section seven of that Act a sub-section, in the following words:—In any school in which no provision is otherwise made by the School Board or Managers for Religious Instruction, it shall be required of such School Board or Managers, in order to obtain an annual Parliamentary grant, that provision shall be made for the instruction in Scripture knowledge of those children whose parents may signify their desire for the same.”

The hon. Member said, his sole desire in proposing this clause was to remedy what he regarded as a gross injustice inflicted upon the children of the poor by the existing law. He had given some thought to the matter, and had formulated the result of his thought in a moderate clause—some of his Friends thought the clause as he had drawn it was too moderate. There was a disposition in some quarters to treat this question of Scripture teaching lightly; but he looked upon the interest of the children who were to be instructed in the public elementary schools as being altogether too important to allow of a question of the kind being played with. It was the duty of the country loyally to accept school boards among our institutions; but it was equally their duty to make those bodies as efficient as possible for the furtherance of education in its highest as well as in its most elementary branches. A majority had agreed to the appointment of school boards, and it was for the minority now to gracefully concede an extension of what the majority had decided upon. There was a strong feeling abroad in the country in reference to this question. Many parents believed that if their children were educated in schools where no regard was paid to Christianity or to Bible teaching, it would go ill with the children; but, as a matter of fact and law, the Bible could be excluded from the schools in any district at the will of a school board which might have been elected by a small majority only of the ratepayers. The ground on which his proposal was based was one on which Roman Catholics, Nonconformists, and Churchmen could alike take their stand; because there was a cold-bloodedness about the atmosphere of a school from which the Bible was excluded which must be repulsive to all parents possessing the slightest feeling of religion. Putting the question upon broader grounds, he would go the length of saying that the effect of the present law was to work injustice as between class and class in the community, and also taking the sections who came under school-board regulations between different branches of the same class. The school boards absorbed the voluntary schools to which the artizan classes were in the habit of sending their children, and in many cases religious teaching was abolished from the schools into which the children were dragged volens volens. The artizan parent was, therefore, left with no alternative, and he would like to know what would be said if the same principle was applied to the highest schools in the country. As an act of common justice, therefore, he asked the Committee to agree to the clause which he proposed.

New Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

Mr. Hall

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he honoured his hon. Friend for the courageous and hearty manner in which he had brought before the House the all-important subject of the religious teaching in our schools: and, though the Government could not assent to his proposal, as he had already reminded the Committee, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire brought forward his proposal respecting the Apostles Creed—that the question of religious teaching did not come within the scope of the Bill, and that therefore the Government must decline to enter upon a discussion respecting it—he hoped the Committee would not doubt that the Government, and he himself, felt as strongly the importance of such teaching in our schools, as any hon. Member of the House, or as his hon. Friend who had so eloquently and so warmly pleaded for the reading of the Bible and religious instruction as a fundamental part of the national system of education. His own sentiments could not be mistaken on this subject; as, during the Committee on the Act of 1870, when the noble Lord the late lamented Member for Suffolk (Lord Augustus Hervey), whose premature death they all deplored, proposed to make reading of the Bible compulsory, with exemption under the full Conscience Clause for those who did not desire it, in all public elementary schools, he was one of those who voted for the proposal, which he much regretted was not at that time more largely supported by the Conservative Party. As to the Amendment itself, he quite agreed that when the State compelled, in one way or another, parents to send their children to school, and virtually took possession of all the time which the children of the labouring classes had available for instruction, the responsibility of the State was enormously increased as to what the children learnt in those schools. He agreed that a very serious case of conscience might arise if a parent who desired religious teaching was compelled, there being only one school available, to send his child to, and therefore employ all its school time in, a school where there was no religious teaching: and he confessed that he did not consider that they could rely upon Sunday schools or home instruction to supply religious teaching to the mass of the people, if they had it not in the day schools, even if there were no other objections to such a separation between religion and week-day life. Surely the cases of the children of negligent, ignorant, or vicious parents would in any case specially suffer by such a treatment. No one could doubt, after what had passed at the last General Election and at the school board elections generally, that the country as a whole, and the parents belonging to the labouring classes who were primarily concerned in the matter, were strongly in favour of having the Bible and religious teaching a prominent part of the school course. He himself, having twice contested Liverpool, and having been elected by Westminster on the London School Board, could testify as to the earnest feeling of the operatives, artizans, and labourers on this subject. Happily, however, at present, religious teaching and Bible instruction was the rule in our schools. Some 40 or 50 school boards were, it was true, purely secular, excluding all religion from the schools, and some others reduced it to a miserably small and grudging amount; but the portion of the population under this treatment was comparatively very small, and in the great majority of board schools Bible teaching and religious instruction was a real part of the daily schooling. Indeed, he felt a perfect confidence that if there should be hereafter anything approaching to a general exclusion of the Bible, the mass of the population would experience a revulsion of feeling in favour of a return to the former system, by which the State took security that there should be Scriptural or religious teaching in all State-aided schools, for all who desired it. Still, however, they could not conceal from themselves that when education was made virtually compulsory, and a precedent condition to children's labour, and when, under a system of payment by results, the State took no care for religious teaching, it became the pecuniary interest of managers, teachers, employers, and parents to reduce such teaching to a minimum—and looking forward some years, there might, no doubt, be a danger that the teachers would shirk religious instruction, when they saw that the State set no account on religion. Still, at the present moment the teachers attached the greatest importance to being able to use religious influence in their schools; and the Committee would doubtless remember that remarkable meeting of school teachers belonging to schools of very different denominations which took place in London on the subject of the Act of 1870, and which was assembled to protest against their hands being enfeebled, by religious teaching being forbidden to them in their schools. If, however, as time went on, owing to any circumstances, it was found that teachers began to put religious teaching in the background, he believed there would be such an outburst of feeling throughout the country as would make it necessary for the State to interfere, and secure by legislation this blessing to its people. He hoped this danger would not arise, but it was only right to admit that he did apprehend it might arise, and in the voluntary quite as much as in the board schools. The latter were worked under jealous and watchful public opinion, and as the English people were religious at heart, he did not believe that these schools would for any long period be able to neglect religious teaching. The danger of neglecting it appeared to him to be stronger in the voluntary schools, which necessarily did not work so much under the blaze of public opinion, and in which the temptation would be strong—he regretted much he saw evidence of it in schools already—to reduce the time set apart for religious teaching, so as to employ more time in teaching subjects which would earn the Government grant, and get the children out sooner into the labour market. What, then, was the position of the Government on this all-important subject? It must be remembered that in the Act of 1870 the great change was deliberately made by Parliament, in the face of the country, by which the former provisions of our educational system were abandoned, which made religious teaching a necessary condition of all State-aided schools, and secured such instruction by the examination in religious subjects by Her Majesty's School Inspectors; and that hereafter the State was to take cognizance only of secular teaching, though religion might be taught in all schools under a Conscience Clause. Now, in his first speech, he had stated that the Government was of opinion that they would not be justified, and that it was undesirable, in the highest interests of the country, to attempt to reverse the leading features of a policy adopted deliberately by a former Parliament, unless it was quite clear that the country generally desired such a change. No one could doubt that to make religious teaching now compulsory in all schools, when in 1870 it was made non-compulsory, would be such a reversal. Was there that marked change in the mind of the country which called for, or would justify at the present moment, legislation in reversal of what was done in 1870 on this most grave matter? The Committee must surely agree that there was not sufficient evidence of such a change to make it right for the Government to take such a step. For though he was decidedly of opinion that the country and the great mass of artizans and labourers were strongly in favour of the Bible and some simple form of religious instruction in schools, still the Government must be very much guided on these large questions as to the mind of the country by what passed in Parliament; and he must remind the Committee that no debates had arisen, and no substantive Motions had been made in either House of Parliament since 1870 on the subject, and that the matter had only once been raised at all—namely, last year, by his hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) in the Estimates, when not a single hon. Member on either side of the House supported him. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government, while sympathizing with the object of his hon. Friend, and agreeing cordially with him as to the supreme importance of having simple religious teaching an integral part of the education of the children of the country, did not think they would be justified in re-opening what was settled by the Act of 1870 on this point, unless they saw that there was a very great change in the general opinion of the country on the subject. He felt confident, therefore, that the position of the Government would not, after this explanation, be misunderstood, when he said that they could not assent to the Amendment.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he hoped the Committee would read the clause a second time, but held that it could not be carried out in the spirit in which it was intended, and that no adequate safeguard for the rights of conscience would be afforded by it unless there were added at the end the words "in such a manner as those parents should prescribe." That Amendment he would be prepared to move.

MR. RITCHIE said, he hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Hall) would press his Amendment to a division; if so, he would be followed into the Lobby by a large section of those who sat upon that side of the House and by many hon. Members opposite. The noble Lord had stated that his hon. Friend was not correct in saying that the Bible had been banished, but only excluded from certain schools. For his own part, he was not able to appreciate the difference. He held that it would have a most pernicious effect on the children if the Bible were excluded from the school.

MR. E. J. REED said, he thought the Government had exercised a very sound judgment in declining to adopt this clause. It would be the greatest mistake imaginable to introduce into an Educational Act a provision that children should be instructed in religious knowledge by the promiscuous teaching of school boards. If the clause was pressed he hoped a resolute opposition would be shown to it by all friends of religious freedom. He opposed the clause also on the ground that it was a serious interference with the Act of 1870.

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, he hoped the clause would be pressed to a division. It merely extended to a minority the rights which a majority now enjoyed. If it was wrong to compel a parent to contribute towards religious instruction to which he objected, it was equally wrong to compel a parent who objected to exclusive secular teaching, to send his child to a secular school and to contribute towards the cost of a system of which he disapproved. This clause would make the Conscience Clause a clause for every conscience, and he trusted it would be pressed to a division.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the adoption of the clause would involve a return to something like the state of things which existed before 1870, and which was abandoned as unjust and unreasonable in obedience to a preponderance of opinion on both sides of the House. Even before 1870 the Bill of the previous Conservative Government, introduced into the Lords by the Duke of Marlborough, abandoned the requirement of the daily reading of the Scriptures. His own opinion was that nothing could be more inconsistent with the real interests of religion than to take hold of the managers and say—"You shall give religious instruction, whether you like it or not." Nothing, in his opinion, would be more destructive of the cause of religion. Although he disapproved the plan of the Birmingham School Board, he believed that if Birmingham was wrong, it would right itself in time, and he would not interfere with the action of the local majority.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD supported the Amendment. The principle of religious liberty was not carried out by the Act of 1870, which imposed a restraint on religious teaching, and he could not see why the liberty which was enjoyed in Scotland should not be extended to England.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU was prepared to join the Government in opposing this clause, but not on the ground of religious freedom. It would produce a chaos of religious teaching in a school. The teaching of religion ought to be left in the hands of the parents of the children, and in a religious country like England such teaching would be safe in their hands.

MR. RODWELL opposed the clause, because he considered it a considerable departure—which that of his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) was not—from the principle of the Act of 1870. The clause, too, was imperfect, and would not, he believed, carry out the intention of his hon. Friend who proposed it.

MR. RAMSAY was glad to be able to support the hon. Gentleman in opposing this clause. He should like to see them adopt the principle of the Scotch Education Act, which neither prevented nor prescribed religious teaching, and yet there was not a school in Scotland where the children were not educated in Scriptural knowledge.

MR. HOLT held that if school boards were to be popular throughout the country they must give religious instruction to the children. Parliament ought not to leave it in the power of the local authorities to shut out the Bible from any school. The vast majority of the school boards had decided in favour of religious teaching, and this proved that the feelings of the country were in favour of giving religious instruction in schools. By the Conscience Clause the parent who did not approve of the religious instruction could withdraw his child, and it was only fair that the parent who wished for it should have his child instructed in the Holy Scriptures. At present the only person whose conscience was not considered was the Christian parent whose poverty compelled him to send his children to a board school. He should, therefore, support the clause.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR said, the Amendment was unnecessary, and would be injurious to the cause of religious instruction, instead of promoting it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was anxious that there should be no misunderstanding as to the view the Government took on this question. They did not oppose the Amendment because they were indifferent or hostile to the proposal of his hon. Friend—on the contrary, they attached the highest importance to religious education in schools; but they felt that to undertake to deal with such a question on the present occasion would lead them too far afield. It would be impossible to adopt this clause by itself as a satisfactory mode of dealing with the question. It would be necessary, for instance, to provide again for a system of inspection to ascertain that the religious instruction was satisfactory; and, on the whole, the Government found it impossible to treat a question of this kind, upon which there was such a difference of opinion, in a measure introduced for other objects, and the scope of which could not be conveniently enlarged.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked what would be the practical effect of this proposal, which seemed to be introduced to gratify a sentiment shared by every Member of the House. Could they compel the teaching of religion as they could compel vaccination? An Act of Parliament to compel a school board which did not desire to teach religion to teach it seemed to him one of the most chimerical things in the world. The board would be sure to evade the obligation. It would be better to rely upon the religious feeling which existed in the country. His hon. Colleague (Mr. Hall) had frequently declared that they could not make people sober by Act of Parliament; how, then, could they make them religious by Act of Parliament? He hoped that they would not be forced to a division upon this matter.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) had described the clause proposed by his Colleague the Member for the City of Oxford, as contemplating an impossibility, because his Colleague proposed to extend the Conscience Clause, now that the attendance of children in some schools or other was rendered compulsory, in the sense of giving the parents a right to demand Scriptural education for their children, if they so thought fit, as part of the teaching they were to be forced to accept; but the hon. and learned Gentleman had admitted that the present system of elementary education had superseded a rational system of religious education. How, then, could the far more moderate proposal of his Colleague contemplate or involve an impossibility? The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council had said that since 1870 the question of religious teaching in a national sense had not been stirred. He (Mr. Newdegate) thought that the noble Lord's memory had failed him, for in 1872 he remembered voting in a majority of that House with the noble Lord, whereby the House declared that the system of Scriptural education, according to "use and wont," should be retained in the elementary schools of Scotland. It was quite true that the then Government managed afterwards to rescind that vote by a small majority; still, it could scarcely be said that the House at that time did not entertain the subject of religious education, or that it had not been stirred. The noble Lord had also expressed a serious apprehension that the system now adopted would impair the earnestness of the school teachers in imparting religious instruction, and that it would even tend to shake their religious convictions. The noble Lord was perfectly right; his apprehensions were founded upon the teaching of history and experience. For some years previous to 1848 religious teaching had been discouraged in the German schools, especially in those of Prussia; the teachers either were or became irreligious, and in 1848 and 1849, it was found that these schoolmasters had become the leaders of the revolutionary movement among the people. Irreligious men were apt to be revolutionists. It had been strange to hear in that debate Member after Member rise and declare that the value which the people of this country attached to religious education was so strong that they had forced the school boards to adopt religious teaching; and yet those very Members of an Assembly which opened its proceedings each day with prayer, protested that it would be inconsistent in the House of Commons to give effect to the religious convictions of the people in elementary schools, supported by public money. He (Mr. Newdegate), felt compelled to ask himself—"Was that House really a representative Assembly?" But the truth was that in that House, upon this subject, there was a sad want of earnestness and of moral courage. The House lacked the courage necessary to their genuinely representing the religious convictions of the people. It had been insinuated that the hon. Members near him were not sincere in their convictions. To that there could be but one answer given, and that answer would be found in the hon. Member for the City of Oxford enabling them to record their votes by pressing his clause to a division, and that he (Mr. Newdegate) hoped the hon. Member would do without delay.

MR. HALL explained that his proposal was not to force religious instruction, but simply to provide that it should be given where the parents desired it; or, in other words, it would give a Conscience Clause which would cut both ways. His hon. and learned Friend wanted to know how unwilling school boards could be compelled to teach religion? Now he (Mr. Hall) in proposing his Amendment, thought more of the parents than of the school boards. No doubt, the school boards found great difficulty in dealing with the question of religious teaching, and by way of getting rid of the difficulty they wanted to avoid the question of religious teaching altogether.

BISHOPRIC OF TRURO BILL.

(Mr. Assheton Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

[BILL 185.]

COMMITTEE. [Progress 26th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 6 (Appointment of Bishop of Truro).

MR. DILLWYN proposed, as an Amendment, words to the effect that, in the case of subsequent appointments to the Bishopric, the election should be made without reference to the congé d'elire by the Dean and Chapter, and that the nomination of the Crown should be definitive.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 9, to leave out the words "So long as there is not a Dean and Chapter of Truro."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 135; Noes 67: Majority 68.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported: as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

CATTLE DISEASES (IRELAND) BILL.

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

[BILL 94.] CONSIDERATION.

Further consideration, as amended, resumed.

Bill considered.

MR. BIGGAR moved—

In page 2, line 26, after the word "Funds," at the end of the previous Amendment, to add the words "Provided always, That in every order so made a time shall be specified, not exceeding three months, during which period and no longer such order shall be in force; but it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant, with the like advice, at any time before the expiration of the order, to make an order renewing same for any period not exceeding three months, and so from time to time to renew the order so long as he shall think it necessary to continue same; and so long as it shall be so renewed the original order shall be deemed to be and continue in force:

"All appointments made under and by virtue of such order shall absolutely cease and determine so soon as such order shall cease to be in force."—(Mr. Biggar.)

He said, the object of his Amendment was to prevent a staff of officials after the requisition of their services had ceased.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH pointed out that the officials were only to be kept where required. He thought it would be very unwise to fetter the discretion of the Executive, and the addition of the clause would be a serious impediment in the way of the Privy Council.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, it was possible for the Privy Council to know how long disease might exist in a particular district, and for that reason he thought it was better that the officials should only be appointed for a stated time. The course would prevent the creation of vested interests.

CAPTAIN NOLAN supported the Amendment, and hoped the Government would give way on this point.

MR. WHITWELL also supported the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The House divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 97: Majority 52.

Other Amendments made.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

TRALEE SAVINGS BANK BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Bill to provide for the collection and distribution of the assets of a former Savings Bank at Tralee, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH and Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH. Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 275.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

Navy—Administration of the Navy

Amendt. on Committee of Supply June 26, To leave out from "That," and add "considering the present administration of the Admiralty is practically that introduced and adopted by this House in 1833, on the recommendation of Sir James Graham; and, considering the advance made in Naval armaments and the unsatisfactory condition of the personnel and matériel of Her Majesty's Navy, it is desirable that a Royal Commission be appointed to inquire and report whether the present system under which the Navy is administered is the most efficient and economical, and what improvements or amendments, if any, it would be desirable should be introduced" (Captain Pim) v., 437; after debate, Question, "That the words, &c." put, and agreed to

Navy—Captain Sulivan

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, Captain Sulivan should not have been removed from the command of one of Her Majesty's ships for any alleged error, shortcoming, or neglect of duty, without having been given an opportunity, if he desired it, of explaining or defending his conduct before a competent court" (Mr. Ashley) July 11, 1314; after debate, Question put; A. 91, N. 103; M. 12

Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Hunt July 13, 1397

Navy—Punishment of Flogging

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when the punishment of Flogging in the Navy should be abolished" (Mr. P. A. Taylor) June 20, 147

Amendt. to leave out from "House," and add "corporal punishment in the Navy having been abolished in 1871 for all offences which do not require prompt and immediate punishment, and being only now retained for the case of mutiny and for offences which may imperil the safety of the ship on the high seas, it is inexpedient to take further steps for the total abolition of the punishment" (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn
